Mr. Lang: I fear that the hon. Gentleman's opening remarks about complacency and confusion fall below the actual record of events. I suggest that perhaps he, too, should visit Shetland where he will see that all those involved, including the Scottish Office, which has sent more than 20 officials, other Departments' officials, voluntary bodies, local government and other organisations are working together efficiently and with complete dedication to repair the damage that has been caused in Shetland and to minimise the risk. The hon. Gentleman's opening remarks were completely misplaced.

On the question of the immediate disadvantages faced by the people of Shetland, it was precisely with the interests of those people in mind and the difficulties that can arise as a result of economic hardship and cashflow problems in the short term—before people are able to secure settlement of insurance claims—that I decided to establish the bridging fund that I announced today. An office has already been established in Shetland to manage that compensation fund and the insurers have already advanced £200,000 to the Shetland Islands council to meet immediate, interim and short-term problems on account. The Shetlands Islands council has also made funds available to the agricultural sector. The European Community, through Commissioner Paleokrassas, has already made emergency aid available and it is having discussions with my Department about possible further aid. When one takes into account all those factors, one can see that resources are being brought to bear as needed and that procedures for clearing up this damaging environmental incident will not be in any way inhibited by lack of funds.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport dealt with the routing of tankers in his statement. I understand why the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) was delayed by travel problems and was unable to get to the Chamber in time to hear that statement.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that health is an immensely important aspect of the incident. I underline the importance that we attach to the careful monitoring that is now taking place. That monitoring involves a number of individuals with considerable expertise and access to high-quality advice on toxicological matters. That monitoring will continue for some considerable time and clear advice will be given to the people of Shetland as to how to respond to events.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport also dealt with dispersants. It is worth repeating that today's statement from the director of the Shetland Islands council environmental services, the director of marine pollution control, the director of the Scottish environmental health unit and the director of public health for Shetland indicated that the dispersant, if used according to correct methods, meant that the risk to the public is "so low as not to be measurable".

That helps to put the issue into perspective.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, vital though it is, it is not just with the immediate devastation that the Government must concern themselves? Will he give the House the commitment that long after the television crews have gone, he and his Department will still be working with the Shetland islanders and their leaders to ensure the return to the quality of life to which those people are accustomed and which they deserve?

Mr. Lang: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance. He is right to say that long-term issues, as well as the short-term immediate problems, will be of considerable importance. We will not lose sight of them and the ecological study group that I announced today will be concerned to monitor matters for some considerable time.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I preface my remarks by apologising to the House for not being here earlier. Perhaps I should explain that the weather conditions were atrocious and that I got here as early as I could.

I thank the Secretary of State for Transport for his statement, but I should like to address my remarks to the statement made by the Secretary of State for Scotland. I understand that he has announced a bridging fund, which seems to be along the lines of that which we discussed on Saturday. Obviously, if he is able to provide any further detail on that fund today that would be welcome. He will be aware of the immediate need faced by a number of salmon farmers who would have undertaken a scheduled harvesting of their salmon this week. Substantial cashflow problems could arise. If the fund is not sufficient to meet those needs, will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider it so that the response from Government is adequate to ensure people's livelihoods?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also confirm to the House that the response that he saw on Saturday from the farmers and particularly from the seafood industries, which were ahead of the Government in announcing a voluntary ban, shows their determination to ensure that Shetland will maintain its reputation for the high quality of the produce that it puts on the market? That will be extremely important in the long term.

Mr. Lang: I understand, as does the rest of the House, why the hon. Gentleman was unable to be here earlier. I am happy to pay tribute to the commitment that he has shown to the interests of his constituents in all aspects of this matter.

As I said earlier, we are involved in urgent consultations with Shetland Islands council and others over the precise details of the bridging fund. I will make further details available as soon as I possibly can, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand that it is not possible at the moment to spell out in more detail the way in which it will operate.

I am happy to endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about the actions of the Shetland Fishermen's Association and others in relation to the need to maintain confidence in the quality of the island's produce. I imposed an exclusion order on the area most affected around Sumburgh last week to maintain confidence in their produce, particularly fish and farmed fish. I welcome the support of the Shetland Fishermen's Association, which took an extremely responsible posture in supporting me. I hope that confidence in its products will be quickly restored.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Those of us who represent seats at the other end of the United Kingdom from Shetland and whose constituents rely on farming, fishing and tourism for their livelihood feel for the constituents of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and for the damage that they have suffered. I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who has been on the Shetland Islands this weekend and who also represents Kent, would share that view.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Michael Howard) indicated assent.

Mr. Gale: As chairman of the all-party animal welfare group, may I say how much we appreciate the voluntary work that has been done to help to mitigate this disaster, in particular the work done by the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and others. I echo the request made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) that my right hon. Friend should try to ensure that those voluntary bodies, which have spent considerable sums of their funds in assisting in the clean-up operation, are able to seek recompense from those liable—not in order that they may make a profit, but so that they may continue to help with the long-term work of restitution that will be necessary.

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his earlier comments. I also join him in congratulating and complimenting the voluntary organisations on the dedicated work that they are doing and on the way in which they are working together.

My hon. Friend may like to know that a number of voluntary groups working on the islands, including the World Wide Fund for Nature, the Shetland Bird Club, the RSPB, the Scottish Wildlife Trust and the SSPCA, are getting together to form the Shetland Conservation Consortium. Funding has been provided immediately by the Scottish Office under the special grants environmental programme and by Scottish National Heritage to help that new organisation. SNH is also empowered to give further funding to voluntary bodies as needed.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): The Secretary of State will be aware that I am parliamentary consultant to the National and Local Government Officers Association and in that context I thank him for his kind remarks about the prompt and efficient action taken by local government officers on Shetland. Can he give an assurance that those officials and in particular the environmental health officer will receive the fullest possible support from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, or whichever officials of his Department are appropriate, to deal with this situation and to give the best possible advice and support to the community of Shetland?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks. I repeat that the officials and the councillors of Shetland Islands council, both groups of whom I met on Saturday, are working very effectively to deal with this difficult incident. They are getting as much co-operation and assistance as is possible from officials in my Department, in particular the director of the environmental health unit, Dr. Forbes, has been to the islands, as has the chief scientist of SNH. Contacts are continuing at all levels between those groups. Some 20 or more officials from my Department are on the islands fulfilling various tasks and I intend to ensure that that co-operation is maintained for as long as is necessary.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Is the Secretary of State aware of the widespread concern felt at the lack of priority and lack of urgency shown by the Government in their response to this catastrophe? For example, why did it take more than four days for the Secretary of State to visit the scene of the disaster? Why has he made only a qualified statement about compensation? Why does not the Secretary of State copy Holland's example, where the Government pay victims compensation immediately and then sue the polluter to recover the money?

Mr. Lang: On the lack of urgency, the hon. Gentleman seems to overlook the fact that the Scottish Office Minister responsible for the environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), went to Shetland the day after the incident, as did the Minister for Aviation and Shipping from the Department of Transport. Since then, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my right and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I have visited Shetland and spent a considerable time talking to a wide range of interest groups involved. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment would have been in Shetland again today for his second visit but for the weather. So there is no lack of urgency or commitment on the part of the Government, as is reflected in the statements by my right hon. Friend and I today.

On compensation, I hope that the hon. Gentleman upholds the fundamental principle that the polluter pays. In the meantime, to deal with short-term economic hardship, I have announced the setting up of a bridging fund to help to meet the anxieties that he identified.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): May I welcome the positive aspects of the Secretary of State's announcement and endorse the praise for the Shetland islanders and their response to the disaster. My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) was right about the crucial nature of the compensation to Shetland islanders in the meantime. Is the Secretary of State aware of the pathetic sight that he presents to the House, compared with the Secretary of State for National Heritage, who guaranteed millions of pounds for the repair of Windsor castle? The Secretary of State for Scotland had come forward with £200,000 for the Scottish people. What support will he give the Shetland islanders in pursuing their legal claims against the polluter? What guarantee can he give that, while that legal operation is taking place, no Shetland islander will go bankrupt or out of business because of the disaster?

Mr. Lang: The incident with which the hon. Gentleman compares the circumstances of the Shetland Islands is not comparable. Windsor castle is a Crown property for which the Government have administrative responsibility and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage made that position clear at once. We are concerned about the longer term compensation, legal liability and consequential loss that affect a large number of people following this serious incident. I have tried to identify how the Government can best help to meet areas that are not immediately covered by compensation aspects, in that they will take some time to come through. That is why we have set up a bridging fund to deal with the short-term problems and economic hardship that can arise.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon):The Secretary of State will recognise that the disaster is not simply a local problem for the Shetlands but is of considerable importance to the whole of Scotland because of the importance of tourism and the quality of our food and maritime products. That is one of the reasons why a speedy response is necessary. We must ensure that, wherever possible, money does not constrain protective measures that can prevent extensive pollution, nor does it encourage anybody to break an embargo that is essential to ensure that the quality of products is re-established.

Will the Secretary of State take up the point made by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), that the Government must make it clear that nobody will be denied cash when they need it and that, in the long run, full compensation will be paid?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman will realise that the purpose of the bridging fund that I have announced, the emergency help offered by the European Community, the fund operated by the Shetland Islands council, and the advance payment made by the insurers is to ensure that such short-term difficulties do not arise.

On the quality of food, I agree that it is important to restore confidence in the quality of Shetland's produce. That is one of the reasons why I imposed the exclusion zone and why fish landed is being tested daily and will continue to be monitored in the long term. It is important to restore confidence in the quality of Shetland's produce as quickly as possible.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): Why have I received an appealing letter in the past week from the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds on the disaster in the Shetland islands if what the Secretary of State says about compensation being made available to the voluntary organisations is right? Why does not he give a commitment to the House, as the Secretary of State for National Heritage did on Windsor castle, and say that he will underwrite all costs involved in the disaster?

Mr. Lang: I urge the hon. Gentleman to read what I have said today. He will then understand that I am meeting the area of need that has been identified to help people in the short term until they can secure full compensation, as I anticipate they will be able to do, from the insurers.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I apologise for being late. I am sure that the Secretary of State understands that transport difficulties in Scotland are pronounced today.

Is there a limit to the bridging fund proposed by the Secretary of State? Does he understand Opposition Members' concern that no one should be in cash flow difficulties? No one disputes the principle that the polluter should pay. None the less, we are concerned that no one in the Shetland Islands conducting a business should find himself in straitened circumstances because of delays in compensation. We have very much in mind the fact that the Amoco Cadiz disaster took 14 years to settle.

Does the Scottish Office have a view on rights of passage? In the light of this disaster and bearing in mind the fact that only 20 per cent. of tankers are following the recommended route to the west of the Western Isles, does the Scottish Office agree that there must be a firm new look at rights of passage? Does the Scottish Office intend to have an input to provide some security for the sea passageways?

Mr. Lang: As I explained in my statement, the details of the bridging fund are still the subject of consultation and will be announced as soon as possible. The navigational matters were largely covered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, but I wish to ensure that all Scottish interests are fully reflected in the outcome of any consideration of those matters.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Like the Secretary of State for the Environment who is sitting next to him, the Secretary of State for Scotland had a fruitful visit to the royal botanical gardens in Edinburgh recently. Will he therefore take into account the view of the director, Dr. David Ingram, that there is not only a short-term problem on which great attention and expertise is being deployed, but a long-term—probably 10 to 20 years—problem of maritime algae and marine photosynthesis? It so happens that the deputy director is one of the world's leading experts on such matters. Could a fund be set up urgently or Government money be devoted to a long-term project, which this unique tragedy requires? A long-term scientific study must be funded from somewhere.

Mr. Lang: We must wait until the details of the ecological steering group's remit is fully set up before we can be precise about the specific long-term matters that it will undertake. It may develop long-term strategies, including overseeing appropriate research studies to monitor the impact on and subsequent recovery of the environment and it will report to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and me. On funding, we shall ensure that measures on which we embark subsequent to that report or in the light of advice from the steering group will be adequately funded.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Will the Secretary of State respond to the suggestion by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) that tankers be required to be piloted through the Minch straits? The Secretary of State for Transport has already said that the Government do not have powers to ban traffic entirely. Will he clarify whether they have powers to require that tankers be piloted? Will he investigate that possibility as an interim measure?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman knows that that matter does not fall within my responsibility but I am glad to say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is sitting beside me and has heard the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): The Secretary of State will realise that the Opposition echo his compliments to the Shetland Islands council. I hope that he also understands that we applaud it for its work outside times of crisis because he has attempted to cut its budgets and staffing over a long period. There is therefore much cynicism about the vagueness with which he has answered questions on funding and compensation. The only sum that has been mentioned so far is £200,000 for the bridging fund. He has spoken of compensation and support for the voluntary organisations.

How much money is there in the fund? How much money will be made available? Will he let us know later on paper, or even state today, the level of compensation that will be given to the people of the islands? Will they be given complete compensation if money is not supplied by the international fund? What level of reinstatement can be expected? Will the fund ultimately turn out to be something to take the heat out of the issue, not enough to deal with the real problem of recompensing the people and reinstating their lifestyle?

Mr. Lang: The issue of reinstatement is not for the bridging fund, but for the insurers. It relates to the compensation that individuals will seek under the polluter-pays principle. The bridging fund is designed to help, in the short term, people suffering the sort of hardship that could arise from a delay in the settlement of their claims. The £200,000 to which the hon. Gentleman refers is the advance payment made by the insurers to help immediate claims to be met in the short term. I cannot yet put a firm figure on the bridging fund, but anticipate that, if there is a need for several million pounds, we shall seek to meet it.

Points of Order

5 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You have been more than generous to me this afternoon and I am a little shy about raising a point of order. However, I was wondering whether, in view of the alleged Iraqi incursion into Kuwait, the statements from Baghdad about the need for a dialogue among America, Britain, France and Iraq—which some of us strongly support—and as the operation is not conducted under the umbrella of the United Nations—Dr. Boutros Ghali has made it clear that it has nothing to do——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have been enormously generous this afternoon to all hon. Members, especially the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), and if he will be good enough to come to his point of order, I shall deal with it immediately.

Mr. Dalyell: My point of order is simply whether you, Madam Speaker, have received a request from the Government to make a statement on those grave and urgent matters.

Madam Speaker: I have had no approach from the Government for a statement today.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As you will recall, on the day before the Christmas recess our proceedings were interrupted by a demonstration. I make absolutely no criticism of the action that you found it necessary to take on that occasion when you adjourned the sitting. However, is not it a fact that our hard-won democratic freedoms are threatened when hon. Members use the power of numbers to bring proceedings to a halt and your authority in the House is ignored?

Madam Speaker: As the House knows, during the Christmas Adjournment debate, a number of hon. Members, with extreme selfishness, set about preventing the discussion of several important matters on the ground that a subject of their own choosing was not to be raised. I trust that I shall have the active support of hon. Members in all quarters of the House in my determination that such an outrage—which is what I considered it to be—against the long tradition of freedom of speech in the House should never be repeated. The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) was one of the hon. Members who lost their Adjournment debates that day. Those hon. Members were successful in the ballot and I shall see to it that they will soon have the chance to raise their Adjournment debates on days other than Thursday, on which I usually grant such debates. I have written to all the hon. Members involved about the matter.

Orders of the Day

Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

5.2 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Bill is clearly a major piece of legislation and the amendment paper lists a large number of new clauses and amendments. You have kindly selected five new clauses, including Government new clause 6, and nine groups of amendments, including Government amendments. It is now 5.3 pm and clearly it is open to hon. Members to oppose the business motion at 10 pm—indeed, it is expected that the debate may run to midnight.

In view of the serious nature of the Bill and the widespread controversy that it has aroused, especially in relation to clauses 9 and 10—about 1,000 black and Asian people are today lobbying the House to protest against the provisions—if progress is not expeditious, to avoid a vote against the business motion would you, Madam Speaker, be prepared to consider encouraging the Government to halt the business at 10 pm? The Government could return with the remainder of the business at a later date. Will you consider whether we could terminate today's business at 10 pm? Could you encourage the Government to complete the proceedings another day? In view of the serious nature of the Bill and the time already taken up this afternoon on extremely serious matters—about which I make no complaint—will you consider whether it would be proper for us to consider the Bill on Report and complete Third Reading today?

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, as Speaker, I have to strike a balance between how long a statement should take and the remainder of the business on the Order Paper. What the hon. Gentleman has said is a matter for the House to consider, not a matter for me at this stage.

New Clause 6

PROTECTION OF CLAIMANTS FROM DEPORTATION, ETC.

' . During the period beginning when a person makes a claim for asylum and ending when the Secretary of State gives him notice of the decision on the claim, he may not be removed from, or required to leave, the United Kingdom.'
—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.3 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time, and trust, in response to the plea of the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) that I shall be able to do so expeditiously.

I am very pleased to introduce the clause, which follows an undertaking given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State in Standing Committee. The new clause provides that a person who has made a claim for asylum may not be removed from, or required to leave, this country until he has been notified of the decision on that claim. It complements the provisions already contained in schedule 2 of the Bill, which affords the same protection during the period when an asylum appeal is pending. The new clause does not represent any change of policy or practice on our part; but in response to hon. Members who spoke in Committee, may I say that it puts into statutory form the practice which exists. I can assure the House that nobody who claims asylum will be removed from this country until a decision has been taken on his or her claim.

I am pleased to be able to move the new clause because it emphasises that the Bill does not in any way weaken the Government's commitment to meeting their international obligations towards the protection of genuine refugees. We accept our obligations under the Geneva convention and intend to honour them in full. The purpose of the Bill is to enable us to discharge those obligations as efficiently and speedily as possible, first, in order to ensure that genuine refugees are not returned to countries where they may face persecution and, secondly, to curb misuse of the asylum process by people who are not genuine refugees.

Our aim is to establish a system that works in everyone's interests. When applications are made, the key element will continue to be the full and fair examination of individual applications, arriving quickly and efficiently at the right solution for each of the cases we consider. It is not our intention to bundle applicants out of the country before they have had a proper opportunity to make their case. New clause 6 makes that unequivocally clear.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am sure that everybody would be deeply upset if people were bundled out of the country, but when dealing with manifestly bogus asylum seekers, particularly those who make trouble while they are seeking asylum—like the wretched individual who made bogus claims about my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—will my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary ensure that they are kicked out of the country with utmost speed?

Mr. Clarke: The Bill is introducing new procedures to deal with such cases, which are normally described in legal terms as manifestly unfounded claims for asylum. We shall discuss that matter under later new clauses and amendments. It is extremely important——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Clarke: No—the hon. Gentleman must let me deal with one intervention at a time.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said, it is extremely important that bogus claimants are turned round speedily and sent back, first, because they are not entitled to be here and, secondly, because they get in the way of the full hearing of genuine applications which new clause 6 is partly designed to ensure.

I cannot go into the case that my hon. Friend has mentioned except to say that, although it has received a great deal of publicity, I assure him that it was being dealt with in the ordinary way well before the recent newspaper allegations. The gentleman in question had been told in August last year that he had no right to remain in this country and he had been asked to take steps to leave. This will continue to be dealt with as an ordinary case regardless of the man's involvement in matters of public controversy concerning my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. He will be dealt with on the same basis as everyone else: allowed to stay, if there are compelling reasons why he should be, or removed if he has no reason to be here and has abused the immigration process.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman take this opportunity to confirm that when a person arrives at an air or sea port in this country and wishes to seek political asylum he will not be prevented or restrained in any way from leaving the aircraft or ship in order to approach an immigration officer, and that no airline will be allowed—because of the way the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 operates—to prevent such people from approaching immigration officers while in transit at any airport in the country?

Furthermore, will the Secretary of State investigate past cases when it has been alleged that people have been prevented from leaving aircraft at Heathrow because they were likely to seek political asylum here?

Mr. Clarke: I know that the hon. Gentleman has sought to raise this matter before. I think that I am right in saying that a later new clause or amendment will enable us to discuss the matter again. I assure the hon. Gentleman that anyone who has set foot on these shores and who makes a claim for asylum will have the application considered in the way in which the Bill envisages the process. As far as I am aware, there is no evidence that any immigration officer has ever been involved in removing someone without the application first being properly considered. This new clause ensures that no one will be removed until his application has been determined.

I know that there have been allegations about airline staff and others and one such case at least is still under investigation. The Government have made it absolutely clear that if someone reaches these shores and applies for asylum the application will be properly considered. No one will be removed without his case having been properly determined in the light of the rules.

It is important to have proper methods of dealing with these matters because of the pressure that we are under with the number of new asylum applications in modern circumstances, following the sudden and dramatic increase in popularity of asylum applications a few years ago. We now know that the total number of new asylum applications received in 1992 was 24,500. That means that the previous year's total was nearly halved, largely, we think, as a result of new screening arrangements introduced in November 1991 to detect and deter multiple applications.

We took 35,000 decisions in 1992—six times the number we were able to take in 1991. Leaving aside applications that were refused because of failure to attend interviews or to provide information, just over 5 per cent. of the decisions actually recognised refugee status and granted political asylum. We have not changed the criteria; we continue to apply the same criteria as always in deciding these cases: the criteria of the 1951 United Nations convention.

The simple fact is that very few of the applications that we now receive are from refugees as the international community has always defined them. Nineteen out of 20 of those who apply for refugee status turn out on investigation not to come within the terms of the Geneva convention. That is why we need a system that deals properly and quickly with these applications.

Mr. Marlow: So 5 per cent. of these claims are valid claims, and the other 95 per cent., by definition, are not. What proportion of those 95 per cent. have been removed from the country or are in the process of being removed?

Mr. Clarke: Comparatively few at the moment, as my hon. Friend knows and fears. That is another underlying purpose of the Bill, since 19 out of 20 applications eventually prove not to be well founded under the 1951 convention. Many such applications have been made by people arriving in this country as a means of getting around other immigration controls. We must have a good and expeditious system of removing clearly unfounded cases so that we can deal more promptly with genuine ones. Delays in dealing with such cases lead to many people eventually being given leave to remain even though they have no right to be here when they first entered the country. That is why we must press on with the Bill.

We still have a backlog of more than 49,000 undecided applications and new applications continue to arrive at five times the rate they did just over four years ago—another reason why we need this Bill.

5.15 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Will the Secretary of State concede that one reason why the number of applications being dealt with has increased is that the Department has finally taken the advice offered by the Labour party two years ago and employed adequate numbers of staff to deal with the applications received? The right hon. and learned Gentleman is being somewhat disingenous when he quotes figures from four years ago. Comparing last year's backlog with the current year's backlog shows that the latter has not only stopped growing but is diminishing. In other words, the two reasons why the Secretary of State's predecessor introduced the Bill have now been eliminated.

Mr. Clarke: We have increased the number of staff because there has been a dramatic increase in the number of people applying for asylum. It is the hon. Gentleman who is being disingenuous by claiming that this is entirely the result of the Labour party's advice. The fact that the Labour party agrees with the Government that it is right to increase the number of staff is a happy event. We should not have this backlog and it is important to get down to ensuring that we can deal quickly with the large number of unfounded applications so that we can then deal expeditiously with the rest. It is not right that people who turn out eventually to have no claim to be here should be able to rely on the process being spun out for several years so that they can make claims for leave to remain because of circumstances that have arisen since they landed.

The need remains for a system that is resilient, responsive and fair, concentrating efforts and resources on the issues that really matter. I am convinced that the Bill provides the framework for such a system. It contains time limits and safeguards to prevent abuse—I am sure that we will discuss them later—which are part of a balanced package to ensure that the significant new rights and benefits that we are giving asylum seekers are not exploited be people who are not bona fide applicants. I hope that the Bill's improvements to the position of genuine asylum seekers will be properly recognised in our debates today. The Government have tabled a number of amendments to clarify the Bill's intentions and to respond to some—usually misplaced but understandable—concerns expressed in Committee. New clause 6 is the first of those Government amendments and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): The new clause was tabled by the Government because of matters raised by Opposition Members in Committee and we welcome it. I shall deal briefly with it before moving on to some of the broader issues that the Secretary of State mentioned in what seemed at times a short rerun of the Second Reading debate.

New clause 6 affords protection to applicants for the time between a claim being made and notice of a decision, so that they cannot be removed once they have made a claim until notice of decision is given. The prohibition on removal of an applicant does not apply only for the time between the making of the application and the decision; it also applies pending an appeal—I should be grateful for confirmation of that.

Some people have asked whether the protection pending appeal applies also to the period between notice of the decision being given and an appeal being lodged. In other words, there may be a period when an appeal has not yet been lodged but notice of decision has been given. I should be grateful if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would confirm that the prohibition on removal applies also to this period. The issue has recently come up in certain cases before the courts.

Of course no one supports bogus applications, but the issue between us has concerned the method of determining whether a bogus application has been made and whether that method is fair. Because of the serious consequences that can arise, it is essential that the procedures for determining bogus applications are fair. Many people who arrive here are in appalling personal circumstances and are fleeing from tremendous distress and civil war. It is incumbent upon us to ensure that the procedure for deciding whether they are entitled to stay here is fair and gives proper and adequate access to people to make their case.

The Secretary of State implies that there are two types of claims—those that are obviously well founded and those that are bogus. The term bogus does not merely cover claims that are made in bad faith, which is what the word often suggests, but claims which, technically, may not comply with the terms of the United Nations convention. It is critical to realise that that convention gives refugee status only to those who personally fear persecution. Someone fleeing from civil war or from a zone in which there is great risk may be in danger, but he is not being personally persecuted. The UN convention covers the first case but not the second. It does not cover the broader definition of refugee, which is used by many countries to denote the circumstances of a person who is in danger but is not being personally persecuted by the regime in his country.

Before claims are judged to be groundless it is important carefully to examine the basis upon which the judgment is made. It is clear from reading the debates in Committee that the real dispute between us is over the process of determination. The Opposition believe that at many points in that process the appeal procedure is too quick and the ability of people to make a case is foreshortened. That may give rise to injustice against those who have genuine claims for asylum.

It is false to regard all claims that do not fall within the terms of the United Nations convention as claims in bad faith, because they are not. Many such claims are made in good faith but do not fit strictly into the United Nations convention. In such cases it is especially important that the determination and the appeals procedure are fair. We oppose the Bill not just because the removal of the right of appeal in immigration cases is wholly wrong and unfair, but because the Bill will not apply in the way that it should the rules of natural justice, which must be applied to such cases.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I can give the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) affirmative answers to all his questions. The Bill provides that someone should not be removed from this country pending the determination of an appeal. As I have explained, the new clause makes statutory our policy that no one will be required to be removed from this country until his application is determined. The combined effect will be to cover the period between a decision being taken and a possible appeal being filed. The time limit for appeals will be allowed to run before anyone is required to leave this country.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his acknowledgement that those who do not have a well-founded claim for asylum should be removed. It is difficult to understand how the Opposition can reconcile their assertion that people who do not have a well-founded claim should be removed with their amendments, some of which would make it extremely difficult to remove anybody or to defend ourselves against ill-founded claims. The key matter upon which the House must agree is a procedure which, with reasonable expedition and complete fairness, can determine whether someone falls within the terms of the convention or should be required to leave the country.

I agree with some of the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman. Matters are not always in black and white: not all political refugees are obviously political; not all bogus refugees are obviously bogus. Many people have no sensible claim at all and have to be removed quickly. Some are plainly political refugees because they have been political activists in the country from which they are fleeing an unpleasant regime. In between there is a large grey area for which it is necessary to have a proper system to determine whether people fall within the terms of the convention.

We must not conjure up a vision of all refugees in harrowing and distressing circumstances. Many people who flee from imminent persecution arrive distressed and destitute and sometimes in unusual circumstances. However, most applications are from people who have travelled on international airliners and arrive at main airports. Others have been here for some time and, having exhausted all other arguments to establish a right to reside, decide to apply for political asylum because they suddenly recall that if they were returned to their country of origin they might face persecution. No doubt some hon. Members will conjure up visions of all asylum applicants being distressed and arriving hurriedly, fleeing from persecution. Many applications are made in perfectly ordinary circumstances and our procedures are fair and give everybody a proper chance to put his arguments.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Home Secretary agree that the grey area that he mentioned also applies to the many asylum applicants who in the past were not able to establish their rights under the convention but whom the Home Office thought it unconscionable to return? Consequently those people were given indefinite leave to remain. It does not automatically follow that someone who fails in his formal application will be bundled out of the country.

Mr. Clarke: We are reasonably generous in giving exceptional leave to remain. Sometimes we grant it to people who do not qualify, simply because in the two, three or four years over which the case has been spun out people have acquired children, wives or other settled obligations and in all conscience we have allowed them to stay. There will always be people who, although they do not satisfy the convention, should be given exceptional leave to remain because, although they would not face personal persecution if returned, they would face demonstrable hardship. That is the most difficult area and the hon. Member for Sedgefield touched upon it.

The Geneva convention covers those who run a personal risk of persecution because of their political or religious beliefs. In the public mind that becomes tangled with the cases of people who flee here from famine or civil war. We accept our humanitarian obligation to accept some of those people. That is why we are in the process of taking about 4,000 people from Bosnia who have been referred to us by the United Nations. We shall look at individual cases from wherever they come.

There is no point in having an asylum that does not allow the return of anybody in any circumstances to a country in which there is civil war, poverty, famine or whatever. The entire population of some countries could qualify for asylum or refuge here if that definition were applied. That is why we have to look at each case and why exceptional leave to remain must be exceptional. It is a discretion of last resort.

Mr. Blair: It is right for the Secretary of State to concede that there is a grey area between UN-defined refugees and bogus applicants, because that gives a different colour to the debate. However, his remarks about those coming here were callous. He spoke of them coming here on international airlines in a way that implied that they were part of the international jet set. I have never suggested that all those who make asylum claims are in circumstances of acute distress, but many are and many Labour Members have experience of working with such people. He must justify applying the procedures to all cases, whether or not they involve people who are in a good position to make their claim quickly. We measure our system of justice by how we deal with those who are worst off, not by how to deal with those who are best off.

5.30 pm

Mr. Clarke: I accept that some arrive in considerable distress and I am satisfied that the way in which we deal with those cases is fair—indeed, our system goes to considerable lengths to be fair. However, it is wrong, for the purposes of debate, to conjure up a vision of most of those arriving doing so in great distress. Most of those who arrive do so calmly and in comfortable circumstances. Many have been in this country for some time before suddenly realising that they face persecution at home and deciding to make an application for asylum. For that reason, while we have procedures that ensure justice in the case of those in the most distressed and difficult circumstances, we must not be naive in the rules that we apply to everyone else. We shall debate other subjects later—for example, there is an Opposition amendment that would make it easier for people to apply from third countries before they have even got here. Like that proposal, many of the Opposition's suggestions would negate any serious attempts to remove promptly those who can demonstrably and rapidly be seen to have no claim at all.

Some of the arguments against the Opposition's ideas are not just technicalities, as has been suggested. Claims are often manifestly unfounded. I gave an example on Second Reading of a Sri Lankan who has been living in the United States for the past couple of years who would be returned because he has arrived from a safe third country. He cannot get asylum by saying that he would be persecuted if he went to Sri Lanka because he has not come from Sri Lanka and faces no difficulty in the country from which he has come. Many safe third country claims can now be rapidly turned round.

Mr. Marlow: Obviously, the difference between the Government and the Opposition is that we are concerned with the interests, wishes and desires of the people of this country, whereas the Opposition are concerned about foreigners. My right hon. and learned Friend has said that in the past people have used the device of extension to put down roots in the United Kingdom. Inevitably, in certain circumstances, they have been given leave to remain. Would not it be helpful if my right hon. Friend said from the Dispatch Box today that if, in future, people use such devices, it would be most unlikely that leave to remain would be granted?

Mr. Clarke: Those who are not able to demonstrate a well-founded claim will find that the British system of justice comes to a reasonably expeditious decision or a more expeditious decision than has been the custom. No system could be described as just if it takes years to reach finality, particularly with the weaker claims. We should be able to reach a fair decision reasonably quickly, which means that people will not have had a chance to put down roots. When we give exceptional leave to remain, the word "exceptional" is important and we shall deal with foreigners extremely well and fairly, I hope.

This is a civilised country and we shall allow people from overseas to settle here if there is a compelling reason to allow them to do so even when they do not comply with the rules. However, it must be compelling. With the best will in the world, we cannot open our doors to all those who think that they would have a better quality of life here than in the distressed country from which they come.

Mr. Blair: I understand that the debate has taken on a slightly different character, but I want to make one point to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He knows perfectly well—that is what is so deplorable about the way in which the Government play this issue—that when he makes his claim about open-door policy, it is reported outside as if the Opposition say that anyone who wants to come here can do so, while the Government say that that should not be the policy. Nobody is suggesting that.

When the Home Secretary uses the example of a Sri Lankan who has lived in the United States as the basis for the Bill, that is debate by caricature rather than debate by principle. He fools nobody if he thinks that he can retain any credentials as a humane Home Secretary by engaging in such debate. As he has already agreed with me, we shall judge the Bill on how it affects those who are most distressed. If we can make out our claim, as I believe we can, that it treats them poorly, it is the Home Secretary, rather than us, who has the explaining to do.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think for one moment that the Opposition can make out a case that the system treats people poorly. The delays and the difficulty in removing anyone who makes any kind of claim give rise to the circumstances that so annoy my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and many others. The present system gets in the way of our dealing fairly and promptly with the genuine applicants for political asylum whom we want to help.

The hon. Gentleman may think that I am not being fair to his policies, but, as the debate unfolds, we shall listen to what he says. Had we followed the advice of the Opposition throughout the passage of the Bill, we should have made no worthwhile changes or improvements in the present system. The way in which it operates leads to protracted stays in the country of people who turn out never to have had a genuine claim to be here. We have an immigration control system that is fair and effective and we need to extend it to ensure that it covers asylum properly as well.

New clause 6 is part of that. It honours an undertaking given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary in Committee that in no circumstances would we remove people from the country until their applications have properly been determined. On that basis, I trust that this new clause, at least, is non-controversial and I again commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 2

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENTS TO APPLY FOR ASYLUM OVERSEAS

'Where it appears to the Secretary of State that conditions in a country outside the United Kingdom render it impracticable for a person to seek leave to enter the United Kingdom or otherwise to travel to the United Kingdom then the Secretary of State shall make arrangements in that country or in an adjoining country for persons to be able to claim asylum in the United Kingdom in a like manner to persons arriving in the United Kingdom.'.—[Mr. Allen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Allen: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 1, in page 1, line 11, after 'removed', insert 'or refused leave to enter, or refused entry clearance'.

No. 2 , in page 1, line 11 after 'from', insert 'or to'.

Mr. Allen: I like it when I hear Conservatives using the word "bogus" because, as hon Members who served on the Committee will know, nothing was more bogus than their arguments about how much they cared about political asylum-seekers. In Committee, the debate made it obvious that the Bill was designed to make it harder for people to seek political asylum, rather than easier. This talk about bogus needs to be put back in the kennel where it belongs, with the Conservative claim about being caring.

The only bogus part of our debates in Committee was the Conservatives' attempt to paint every individual who seeks refuge and succour in our land as some sort of social security scrounger. They argued by taking a case and extrapolating from it the thousands of people seeking refuge here, perhaps from Bosnia. They tainted such people with the claim that they are trying to twist and turn and manipulate the system and put in multiple applications for social security. That is what bogus conjures up in my mind and that of my colleagues who fought the Bill, line by line, in Committee.

The other interesting argument that we are now getting from the Home Secretary is the almost intellectual point about the grey area between bogus applicants—that is, those with no claim whatsoever—and people who are genuinely seeking asylum here. We need to have a genuine intellectual debate on that point, which is why the argument is so appealing to Labour Members. Sadly, the House of Commons and its Committees are not structured so that we can have that debate properly, but there is a genuine debate about how we define categories of people who do not immediately, technically, fall into the political asylum seekers sector—for example, those who are fleeing from famine or civil war. That is a debate that did not take place in Committee. The issue was not debated on Second Reading and nor will it be debated this evening. It is a debate that will have to take place in a forum that takes itself rather more seriously than, sadly, the Committee did on several occasions.

We contrast the vision that is being offered by the Home Secretary of a genuine discussion on how we categorise those people who are in the middle, as it were, with the practice of the Conservative Government. I do not have the sheaf of press cuttings from which I quoted on Second Reading, but it was possible for me to close my eyes and pick any headline from about 20 from The Sun, the Star and other newspapers. They were headlines such as "Don't let them in" and "Keep them out". That was the sort of nonsense that was pumped out by the Home Secretary's predecessor. There is now a slightly more intellectual feel about the arguments. I am sure that my hon. Friends will make it clear that much of the Bill owes its origins more to the pending leadership contest within the Conservative party than to a genuine effort to try to help those who are seeking political asylum in our country.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that the question of who is genuine can often mean life or death to those who are actually involved? Surely it is important that the organisation that used to be the refugee unit of the United Kingdom immigrants advisory service, and which is now the refugee legal centre —perhaps not all Conservative Members will agree with this but I am sure that it will find the agreement of most hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber—is recognised as one that does a good job. Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be unfortunate if, given the short time that is allowed for appeals and other factors, the refugee legal centre found that it was not in a position to carry out a thorough investigation into whether an individual claim was genuine?

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend speaks with great experience of these matters and Ministers would do well to heed his advice. The organisations that have been involved, especially the UKIAS, have suffered from a degree of internal dissension which has not been helpful. I hope that those days are passed and that every support will be given by the Government to the refugee legal centre and other bodies. I hope, too, that they are given adequate resources and time to pursue individual cases in the way that my hon. Friend would wish.

Long after this measure has been repealed people will remember 1992 in immigration and asylum terms, not for an ill-fated Bill but for the shameful way in which the Government responded to the crisis in Bosnia. It is laughable that only 150 people were initially allowed into the United Kingdom so as to escape from that conflict. It is barely more credible that now just 1,000 people are to be allowed into the country. Of course, the Government have the support of those who are seeking to bump up the numbers to a monumental 4,000. Even the Government admit that the crisis in Bosnia has produced 3 million displaced persons. It defies belief that our country can assist its European partners to the extent of taking in only 4,000 people, or 1,000 and their dependants, when other nations have done so much more. I find it especially shameful that the Austrian Government had to bail out the British Conservative Government when they refused to allow the 173 people who were trapped on the border to be assisted by Leeds Alert. They were taken into Austria to be looked after. That is one of the reasons that caused us to table the clause.

The clause seeks to extend the possibilities for those who are seeking political asylum to pursue that course legally. I am greatly surprised that the Government have said that they will oppose the clause as it is written or as it could be amended if they are dissatisfied with its present wording.

Mr. Madden: My hon. Friend has referred to Bosnian nationals being received in the United Kingdom. I have received a reply today from the Under-Secretary of State to the effect that so far only 79 former detainees from Bosnia have been received in this country. Apparently they arrived on 17 December. There is no sign of when the remaining 1,000 are to arrive. It could be months or possibly years before we see their arrival. Will my hon. Friend confirm that another reply to a question indicates that 29 former Yugoslav nationals were refused leave to enter and were removed from the United Kingdom? They applied to come here as visitors. The Minister does not know to where they have been returned. Surely that must be a matter of considerable concern.

5.45 pm

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend was tireless in his efforts in Committee and on the Floor of the House to highlight the difficulties faced by those who are suffering persecution in Bosnia. I commend his work to the House, and am glad to put that on the record.

It is pathetic—it would be laughable if it were not so tragic—that a mere 79 people from Bosnia have been allowed into our country to escape the evils of the regimes that are persecuting them directly and personally. I understand from my own sources that the 1,000 political asylum seekers that the Government have now agreed to take into the country may not arrive in the United Kingdom before the end of the summer. Only 1,000 people will be rescued from the conflict and the persecution that they face in the next seven or eight months following the imposition of the visa regime. That is deplorable. We need the new clause, or something like it, so that there is a legal means by which individual claims can be assessed in extreme, urgent and difficult circumstances in the country of origin.

That is not something that would have to be done in every instance. I find it difficult to contemplate examples other than those that replicate actual instances in Bosnia. It would have been fortunate—it would have been the only fortunate feature of the conflict—if we had had three or four officials from the immigration department of the Home Office on the border in Bosnia to process claims. That did not happen and the Minister was not prepared to travel to Bosnia. The Government were not prepared to send a small contingent of Home Office officials to Bosnia. All that demonstrates to the entire world how seriously the Government were taking the plight of people in Bosnia.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Allen: I am happy to give way to an hon. Member who is one of the closest in the House, in terms of his constituency, to our continental partners. I have no doubt that he will have something to say about the cross-border controls that still apply at the port of Dover.

Mr. Brazier: I take a particular interest in another conflict about which comparatively little is published, and that is in the Lebanon. When we consider what is going on in the Lebanon, in Nagorno Karabakh, in Cambodia and in Afghanistan, the only difference between those events and those in Bosnia is that the conflict in Bosnia appears on our television screens. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, however well meaning the clause is, the scale of the applications that would ensue would be unbelievably high? Does he expect the terms of the clause to appear in a future Labour party manifesto?

Mr. Allen: If the hon. Gentleman reads the clause, he may be assisted. He might then understand what we are talking about. It begins:

"Where it appears to the Secretary of State" that it is impractical for certain things to happen. In other words, the clause, if it were accepted, would not apply in all circumstances. It would probably not be appropriate in the circumstances that apply in the Lebanon.

In Bosnia, as I attempted to explain earlier—I shall have another go and take it more slowly—we saw a situation in which it was physically possible to have a small team of Home Office officials somewhere near the border of Bosnia. That would be an emergency response, and it would be made only if the Home Secretary considered it to be appropriate. It would not be a regular response. It would avoid, however, a situation which the Government precipitated in the context of the Leeds Alert episode. A number of people on the border wanted to make a claim for political asylum, but there was nowhere in Bosnia to register it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): Of course there was.

Mr. Allen: That is true—but to do so those people would have had to fight their way back through the lines of the advancing Serbian infantry. They would have had to go back to Sarajevo or Belgrade, risking life and limb. They were emaciated, they had come out of camps and many had medical conditions. What sort of Government would put people through that, especially given the suffering that they had already endured?

In fact, those people were quite fortunate because Leeds Alert was to hand. It drove to Vienna to get the necessary application forms and it then drove back to Bosnia so that they could be filled out. It then drove trans-Europe to London because that was the only place where the forms would be accepted. They were lodged with the Home Office, which kept Alert on a string for several days. Finally, it refused 169 and accepted just four applications.

Had the Government really wanted to help in that emergency they would not have delayed the decisions. Then, even if the eventual outcome was the same, at least those individuals whose applications were not accepted would have been put out of their misery at a much earlier stage. That would have demonstrated a caring approach and shown that the Government were serious about wanting to help the asylum seekers. Instead, the Government had Mr. Beasley, Mr. Lamb and others dodging around, jumping through hoops and over obstacles, just to delay the decision on the political asylum applications.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I do not want to distract the hon. Gentleman too much, but I had hoped that he would respond fully to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). The hon. Gentleman said that he hoped that my hon. Friend would comment on the frontier controls still being enforced at the port of Dover. My hon. Friend's constituency has no sea frontier, but I have the adjacent seat which does have a channel coast port. Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that we should abandon our frontier controls?

Mr. Allen: I apologise to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). I met his former agent on the first cross-channel ferry into Britain on 1 January and I obviously confused my facts. It was an entertaining evening. For the benefit of the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), I shall say that the reason that I was on that ferry was that the need to show a passport was abolished on that day. Sadly, Herr Bangemann—and perhaps I should say head Bangemann—the Home Secretary strongly disagreed on removing the requirement to show passports at borders. The embarrassing incident of the arrest of the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman on immigration and asylum was avoided by the deft footwork of some Customs officers, who waved through the coach on which a number of Conservative colleagues from the European Parliament and myself were travelling. I had expected at least to be asked to show my passport, but the officers could not get the coach off the ferry and through Customs quickly enough. I am still not sure about the position of those who travel abroad and return through Dover. Until the Home Secretary can answer that question, it is not for me to bail him out.

Mr. Brazier: What are the hon. Gentleman's views?

Mr. Allen: It is my view that it would assist those seeking political asylum in this country if, in an emergency such as that in Bosnia, there was a facility in the relevant country where people could discuss their applications and their needs. That would prevent the sort of nonsense that happened with Leeds Alert.

I am not saying that the wording of the new clause is perfect. If the Minister gives me the nod, I am sure that my hon. Friends would agree to withdraw it so that it could be worded appropriately. The problem is that for those wanting political asylum in the United Kingdom, the Government are virtually insisting that they break the law. At the very least, someone, somewhere, has to be deceived. It is not possible to obtain political asylum abroad and bring it into the United Kingdom. An asylum seeker has to get to the United Kingdom by some means before he can make a claim. Therefore, by definition, he would have arrived here by a route that probably was not an honest route. For example, such a person would have to pretend to be a visitor or something else before he could land and say, "I claim political asylum."

The new clause would legitimise individuals who go through due process, not necessarily at the port of entry but in extreme circumstances—such as those in Bosnia—in their own countries. I can only repeat that such an arrangement would be extraordinary rather than the norm. It appears that with the Bosnian problem the Government have—perhaps in pursuit of their privatisation policy—subcontracted to the United Nations and the Red Cross the decision on those who may be allowed in to this country. They have been given their tender contract—1,000 people over the next six to nine months. If that time scale is inaccurate, perhaps the Minister would correct me.

It is possible that those two organisations, which are under great pressure in other areas, may nominate people who the Home Office may not regard as satisfactory and who may not meet the criteria. Perhaps they have not been in a camp for long enough, perhaps they have not lost sufficient numbers of relatives, or perhaps they have not suffered sufficient deprivation to qualify for the magical figure of 1,000 out of the 3 million people who have been displaced. In many ways, that is a failure of the European dimension as operated by the Government throughout their presidency. They did not make an adequate response to the Bosnian problem. Grey-suited men waited for photocalls in various European capitals, unable to make any impact on the Bosnian crisis. There was no genuine burden sharing, either in terms of the numbers of refugees coming out of those strife-torn areas or in making a proper financial settlement for those countries that took a greater share of the burden.

Mr. Madden: My hon. Friend referred to visa applications from former Yugoslav nationals. In a reply today, the Foreign Office Minister said that "we are monitoring the effect of the visa regime on former Yugoslav nationals on the visa sections at Belgrade, Vienna, Zagreb, Budapest, Sofia, Rome, Milan, Florence, Naples, Dusseldorf and Paris. At these posts 1,715 applications were received from former Yugoslav nationals—1,251 were granted, 238 were refused and 203 have a decision pending." Can my hon. Friend confirm that, if clause 9 is passed, the 238 who have been refused will have no right of appeal—like the thousands of others who, in the coming months, undoubtedly will also be refused—against those arbitrary decisions?

[Mr. Madden]

Mr. Allen: I have to tell my hon. Friend that I cannot confirm that because I do not know. I listened very carefully, as did my hon. Friend, to the Minister's remarks in Committee—but the more that I re-read Hansard, the more confused I became, and I imagine the more confused will be individuals who want to exercise a right of appeal, if they are allowed to do such a thing. I would like the Minister to answer my hon. Friend's question because I believe that clause 9 and the rest of the Bill will not allow such people to appeal.

The Bill's failure to make provision for people from abroad to apply in emergency circumstances will make life harder for those seeking political asylum. If it appears that people are reaching our country, the Bill introduces other, administrative obstacles. If those obstacles are overcome, the Bill imposes a visa regime. Where a visa regime is imposed, the Bill makes it difficult for it to be implemented by forcing people to go across Europe to obtain and to complete forms.

We want to ensure justice for those people who, in Bosnia-type situations, have suffered, been abused, held captive, and deprived of the basics of human life. New clause 2—modest as it is and however imperfectly it may be worded—would give a sign. Rather than the sign that, the Government usually put up to people seeking our help and aid, it would give a sign that where circumstances permitted, it would be appropriate to send one or two people from the Home Office to vet claims and to allow applicants either to enter our country for political asylum or to tell them, "We are sorry, but you do not qualify."

The fact that, as we understand it, the Government are not prepared to entertain new clause 2 in any form indicates the truth about their concern for those seeking political asylum—it just does not exist.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Clearly, new clause 2 is prompted by the political situation in the former Yugoslavia and the difficulties experienced by many people from that country in seeking political asylum in Britain. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who also led for Labour in Committee, spoke for many when he pointed out the unconscionable embarrassment that Britain has faced because of the small part that it played in dealing with the consequences of the fighting in the former Yugoslavia and in Bosnia in particular.

I believe that the hon. Gentleman also thinks that it is unnecessary to amend the Bill to achieve his purposes because, as new clause 2 proposes, it would be possible for facilities to be made available in Vienna, other border towns of Austria or southern Germany, or in neighbouring countries, to evaluate applications and to determine whether Britain is prepared to play its part in providing a haven for those displaced.

New clause 2 attempts to tackle both the problem of asylum and that alluded to in the earlier debate, to which the Home Secretary made some reply—those people who do not strictly fall within the provisions of the convention but whom it would be reasonable for Britain to seek to offer a home.

The clear sense of making such a provision close to the ground—close to Bosnia—is emphasied by the experiences we have witnessed at the border and the Leeds Alert case. It seems unlikely that many people in the countries in question will look to the United Kingdom for relief, given our record of dealing with such applications over the past year.

Figures made available to me by the Library's research department show that between January and November this country received a mere 4,830 applications for asylum from the former Yugoslavia, refused 110,000, and granted asylum to none. That suggests a lack of enthusiasm on the part of the Home Office for tackling the problem directly, and the belief that if we show ourselves to be tardy in dealing with applications, they will simply disappear.

It is not good enough for Britain, as a member of the European Community, to land the problem in the lap of countries neighbouring the strife—for that is the practical consequence of Home Office policy and why tens of thousands are leaving the former Yugoslavia and arriving in countries such as Germany, which is hard pressed by the adherence of the eastern zone to the republic, and Austria, which is a very small country.

The policy pursued by the British Government is positively dangerous not only for those countries which are receiving refugees but to the whole of Europe. It has undoubtedly strengthened the fear of foreign influx, where that influx has been large. If we look at the totality of the picture during the period to which I referred, the number granted asylum in this country from all over the world was a mere 1,040. That compares with 17,270 refused applications.

Britain is not a country to which refugees would look for a haven in the times in which we live. It is striking, particularly if one considers the state of African countries languishing under dictatorships and tyrannies, how in many cases we have simply turned away all applications. It is open to question whether, if more were known, those applicants would be eligible for asylum status. On the face of it, one must take the view that it is the Government's policy strongly to discourage applications for asylum from abroad.

Although the Government will undoubtedly refuse to accept new clause 2, saying that it is not strictly necessary—and, in a purely legal sense, it is not—I hope that they will indicate how they propose to share the burden, particularly with other European countries, of offering relief to those from the former Yugoslavia who are able to enter the other countries of the European Community. I hope that the Government will also tell us whether they are prepared to reconsider the exiguous numbers to whom they have undertaken to offer room and the criteria on which they will determine which cases to accept.

Many people in this country believe that what is being done in their name to tackle the problem is wholly inadequate. They believe that it is stoking up trouble and making more likely disturbance and civil strife in other, at present more peaceful, parts of Europe. This is a matter of great urgency and in tabling new clause 2 the Labour party has given the Government an opportunity to demonstrate that their views have advanced somewhat since the Christmas recess.

Mr. Charles Wardle: As I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), I found it hard to repress a wave of nostalgia for the time that we spent in Committee. There he was, rambling up hill and down dale without touching too frequently on the subject in hand.

When he discussed asylum applications, the hon. Gentleman forgot to mention the fact that some 75 per cent. of asylum-seekers apply after they have entered this country. I hope that he is not suggesting that the great majority of those applicants arrive as bogus visitors; many arrive as genuine visitors and then apply for asylum.

The hon. Gentleman talked of his adventures on new year's eve and new year's day. He forgot to tell the House that, at Dover, an inspector—an immigration officer—boarded his coach, asked whether everyone on board was an EC citizen and then got off the coach. Immigration controls were clearly in place.

Mr. Allen: It is true that a gentleman boarded the coach; but he asked whether everyone was having a good time.

Mr. Wardle: I do not wish to malign the hon. Gentleman, but it is possible that he was having such a good time that he did not hear the rest of the sentence which, I am sure, was pronounced by the immigration officer.

As the House will of course be aware, on 1 January there were no changes in controls at ports of entry in any EC country. If the hon. Gentleman had taken himself to Rome, Brussels or anywhere else in the Community that day, he would have found that that was the case.

Mr. Madden: If any members of the party on the coach had admitted that they were not EC nationals, what would the immigration officer have done?

Mr. Wardle: He would have wanted to ascertain their identity. Having done so, he would have exercised the appropriate controls. Had any such person proved to be a genuine non-EC national, the controls would have followed the pattern that they follow at every port of entry in regard to non-EC nationals—a pattern that will continue.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North also referred to our record in the former Yugoslavia. He mentioned the 79 arrivals—helped by an intervention by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). It should be borne in mind that we rely on the UNHCR and the International Red Cross to pick out the cases that come to this country; the UNHCR selected the 79 and their dependants and will continue to send us further groups in the months to come.

The passion of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) can never be doubted, but his logic sometimes defies belief. He referred to the role played by this country in Yugoslavia. I hope that he did not mean to slight the efforts of our soldiers, medical teams and technicians to deal with the terrible conflict in that country. He seemed to suggest, however, that the Germans, the Austrians and others had made a political decision to take the large numbers that had arrived, and that simply is not true. Perhaps 600,000 people have arrived in Germany as a result of that terrible conflict, but that was not the consequence of a political decision: they just turned up there.

Both new clause 2 and amendments Nos. 1 and 2 seek to broaden the United Kingdom's current international obligations to asylum seekers by including references to entry clearance procedures. The 1951 convention imposes obligations on signatory states in relation to refugees on their territory or at their borders. There is no obligation to allow refugees a free hand to choose where in the world they would like to live. New clause 2 seeks to put asylum seekers who are not in the United Kingdom—and thus have not engaged our obligations to afford protection—on the same footing as those who have arrived here. That would distort the concept of asylum, as understood within the terms of the Geneva convention, into just another category of immigration.

Mr. Maclennan: The Minister mentioned logic earlier. What is the logic of his argument about whether or not the German Government sought to give asylum to 600,000 people? Is not it a fact that those people are there and that our country is a fellow member of the European Community? The Minister is simply not addressing our duty to deal with the problem.

Mr. Wardle: It is the hon. Gentleman's logic that is faulty. Is he suggesting that because 600,000 people have arrived, without the express invitation of the German Government, to add to the large Yugoslav community in that country, every other country should take the same action? If so, he is ignoring agreements reached within the international community, and recommendations made by the UNHCR and the International Red Cross.

The hon. Gentleman said that the applications of the nearly 5,000 former Yugoslavs who applied for asylum in this country last year had not been resolved. Perhaps, in that context, he will understand the purpose of the Bill.

Amendment No. 1 seeks to achieve a similar result to that of new clause 2 by including an entry clearance application in the definition of an asylum claim. It also seeks to include the ground that a refusal of leave to enter would breach our convention obligations. That is an unnecessary addition; removal following a refusal of leave to enter is the action that could breach our convention obligations and that is already provided for adequately in the wording of clause 1.

Mr. Allen: The Minister seems to find no difficulty in meeting our international partners through the ad hoc group of Immigration Ministers, the Trevi group, and the Schengen group—although we are not a member of that group, we receive information from it. He has no problem in negotiating arrangements such as harmonised visa and border controls. Why can he not, in the same fora, meet our European colleagues and negotiate a proper settlement for people who seek political asylum—either by sharing the burden of the numbers that we accept, or by sharing the financial contribution?

Mr. Wardle: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are playing a part in the international community. As was said many times in Committee, we are also turning to the experts—that is, the UNHCR—for precisely that purpose. We do not want, however, to see movement on a scale that would give way to the evil goal of ethnic cleansing.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham) rose——

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) will understand that I wish to make progress. He will then, no doubt, want to listen to the reply of his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North.

Mr. Grant: Will the Minister give way on this point?

Mr. Wardle: How can I resist the hon. Gentleman's entreaties?

Mr. Grant: I thank the Minister for being so kind as to give way on this matter. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees will be referred to constantly in the Minister's speeches, so can he settle this matter once and for all? Does he agree that the UNHCR is not an independent body, as he claims, but that it comes under the United Nations and is accountable to the Security Council, of which Britain, France and the United States are permanent members? When the Minister refers to the UNHCR, therefore, he is talking about an organisation that is the servant of the United Nations and a lackey of the British Government.

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman has skilfully introduced a point that he made frequently in Committee —his views about the United Nations generally and of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in particular. He is right that the UNHCR is an arm of the United Nations. We, and the international community generally, regard the UNHCR as the experts on the ground who can make the decisions that really matter for the Bosnians.

The simple fact is that we must inevitably take a different approach to asylum seekers in this country from those who have found safety in other countries and from those who might at some point have a claim to refugee status but who have not yet left their own countries. The United Kingdom cannot be the guarantor of every individual around the world who might fear persecution. We cannot undertake to evacuate everyone who claims to be in danger and to bring them here.

The Geneva convention was very sensible and practical in its limitation of the definition of refugees to those who are already outside their own country. That does not mean that the international community has no interest in what happens to people in their own country. Major humanitarian efforts have often been made to assist the internally displaced, such as those in Bosnia, in those circumstances, but to hold out the prospect of emigration as a refugee, with no need to move or interrupt one's normal life while the application is considered, seems, in the real world of migratory pressures and strict immigration controls, to encourage unfounded applications and misuse.

At present, we consider outside the normal immigration rules all applications that we receive for entry clearance to come here to claim asylum. The criteria that we apply are that the person is prima facie a refugee within the terms of the 1951 convention and that the United Kingdom is a more appropriate country of refuge than where the person is. I am sure that this is the right approach. It enables us to respond to cases where links with this country clearly make it right that the person should come here, but it does not open up a formal channel that would be open to misuse. No other European country adopts an approach that is significantly different from ours. The proposed amendments would be likely to add substantially to the number of applications that we receive.

The particular example of refugees from the former Yugoslavia has already been debated extensively. The availability of procedures of the sort proposed in new clause 2 would make it more rather than less difficult to deal with that matter in a coherent way. It is not practicable for everyone who might be at risk, or who might claim to be at risk, in the former Yugoslavia, or anywhere else, to come to this country, but in making our contribution to the international response to that terrible conflict we are working with the UNHCR to identify those humanitarian cases that it would make sense to bring to this country. As the House knows, I announced on 30 November that we were prepared to receive up to 1,000 ex-detainees and their dependants, which will amount to about 4,000 people.

Mrs. Barbara Roche (Hornsey and Wood Green): I noted with interest what the Minister said about the close working relationship that the Government have with the UNHCR. If that relationship is so good, why did the Minister resist the pleas of the Opposition for the UNHCR handbook to be incorporated in the Bill?

Mr. Wardle: Because there is no need for it to be incorporated in the Bill. That does not mean that the handbook is disregarded, as I reminded the hon. Lady in Committee and seek to do now.

We are ready to consider in the normal way any applications for entry clearance that we receive from individuals, as well as those put forward by UNHCR. I repeat that the Government remain ready to consider applications from abroad to come to the United Kingdom to seek asylum. I am convinced, however, that we should not create a new immigration channel for that purpose, as new clause 2 seeks to do. Instead, we should continue to deal with those applications on a discretionary basis, outside the normal immigration rules. That, together with a readiness to work with the international organisations to find solutions to refugee-producing situations, seems to me to be the proper and practical approach and the one that is most likely to produce a helpful outcome. For those reasons, I urge the House to reject new clause 2.

Mr. Allen: By leave of the House, may I say in reply that by tabling new clause 2 we have attempted to open up the debate and to allow the Government to show whether they really want to assist genuine political refugees who are in absolutely appalling circumstances. There is an almost unique set of circumstances in Bosnia. Had we been able to send people to Bosnia to assist them in making their applications—and to reject, where necessary, their applications—we should have been in a position to do some good. By tabling the new clause and probing the Government to find out whether they were prepared to seek a solution to the problem of political asylum seekers, we were hoping for a good response. Sadly, we have received the response that we expected. The Government have rejected our overtures to find better ways to help asylum seekers.

The same applies to the grey area between those who are so obviously political asylum seekers and those who are so obviously not—the victims of civil war, famine and so on. It is apparent that that grey area needs to be looked at by a new Government. As the Conservative Government have refused even to consider the possibility of helping genuine political refugees, we intend to press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 3

EXAMINATION: OFFENCES

'.—(1) A person shall be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction by a fine of not more than level 5 on the standard scale or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both, in any of the following cases:—

(a) he either by himself or in conjunction with any other person prevents any asylum seeker who has arrived or attempted to arrive in the territory of the United Kingdom from being lawfully examined by an immigration officer;

(b) he either by himself or in conjunction with any other person or persons hinders or delays the asylum seeker who has arrived or attempted to arrive in the territory of the United Kingdom from being lawfully examined by an immigration officer;

(c) if being an immigration officer he conducts the examination either without authority or in such a manner as to render that examination unlawful;

(d) if as owner or agent of a ship or aircraft he procures, assists or permits any employee, servant or agent or any other person to commit an offence under subsection (a) or (b) above;

(2) Subsection (1) above applies to matters both within and outside the territory of the United Kingdom.'.—[Mr. Fraser.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

One welcome aspect of the Bill is that, for the first time, applicants for political asylum who arrive at a port in the United Kingdom will have a statutory right of appeal. About three quarters of those who are already here and apply for political asylum already have that right, but it is generally agreed that those who flee from another country and arrive at a port probably have the most pressing need to claim refuge.

There are many unwelcome aspects of the Bill, but the one that I have mentioned is a welcome one. However, it is tarnished and corroded by two main elements in the Bill: first, the removal of the right of appeal for visitors, with which I shall deal later; and, secondly, the legislative barbed wire barrier which the Bill flings out. The barbed wire barrier is designed to prevent people from ever availing themselves of the right to claim political asylum in the United Kingdom in the first place.

The underlying principle of the Bill is getting one's foot in the door. Unless the applicant gets his or her foot in the door, it is impossible to exercise the right to claim asylum and a right of appeal. The Government have a hidden and rather sinister strategy to ensure that as few people as possible get that foot in the door. If people do not get their foot in the door, the Government do not have to say yes or no or provide any right of appeal.

There are two particular barbs on the legal barbed wire barrier to refugees. The first is the practice of requiring visas to be granted to people from countries from which people are likely to flee and to seek political asylum. The rule is easily forecast. If Kurds want to come from Turkey to claim political asylum, impose a visa regime on Turkey. If Tamils want to come from Sri Lanka to claim political asylum because of undoubted problems in that country, impose a visa. If people want to come from former Yugoslavia to claim political asylum in Britain, impose a visa to prevent them from getting a foot in the door to make that application. That is the first barb in the legal barbed wire barrier that has been put around the country.

The second barb is the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987. If people who know that they need a visa to come to the United Kingdom are foolish enough to apply in an overseas country for a visa to visit the United Kingdom and disclose, as did the Bosnian refugees, that they are likely to claim persecution, it follows as night follows day that the application will be refused. Therefore, people have no possibility of making an application for asylum which is subject to an appeal. That brings into play the carriers' liability Act.

If an applicant boards an aircraft or ship without a visa, arrives in the United Kingdom and claims political asylum —that is to say, if that person gets a foot in the door—the carrier of the applicant for political asylum will be fined £2,000 without any right of appeal. The Act puts a £2,000 premium on the carrier. It physically prevents people from making an application to an immigration officer in the United Kingdom.

United Kingdom law will perhaps not apply for the whole of the journey. It depends on the carrier and the ship. The system which the Government have put together to prevent people from arriving here almost encourages bounty hunters who will pick out prospective applicants whose presence in the United Kingdom could otherwise cost the carrier £2,000 per person. We know that the fines imposed on carriers amount to many millions of pounds.

I understand that there have been examples of people being physically prevented from reaching an immigration officer in the United Kingdom. The new clause would make that a criminal offence.

The new clause also deals with the rarer circumstances —I do not suggest that they arise often—in which an immigration officer might interview an applicant for admission to the United Kingdom but not admit of the fact that an application for political asylum was made and then return that person to a third country. That is what happens to people who arrive in the United Kingdom and claim admission. If they come from a visa country and do not make an application for political asylum, they can be removed almost within hours and sent back to a third country. The new clause would equally make a refusal under those circumstances a criminal offence.

The carriers' liability Act puts a £2,000 price on the head of every visaless refugee who comes to Britain. The new clause would at least be a discouragement to claiming that price. The evil with which the new clause proposes to deal is not imagined. There have been several examples in which a price has been claimed. It is possible that the increase in the fine on carriers from £1,000 to £2,000, together with events in various parts of the world, will make the process of claiming a price on the head of prospective applicants more attractive than ever to carriers and disreputable people.

If the Government are making it a criminal offence for applicants for political asylum not to give their fingerprints, surely they should make it a criminal offence for anyone to prevent such people from reaching an immigration officer to have even the opportunity to have their fingerprints taken.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I want to ask the Minister a question which arises from subsection (1)(c) of the new clause. Unless I am seriously misguided, I hope that the Government will not accept the new clause because of the massive problems that paragraph (c) could create for immigration officers.

Most of the debates today, in Committee and elsewhere have been based on the false premise that the British Parliament and Government control immigration policy and the right of people to come to this country. As we well know, significant changes have been imposed on us by our membership of the European Community. First, every citizen of a European Community country is entitled to come here. Secondly, we will shortly face the problem of citizens of some overseas colonies who will have the automatic right of admission. The citizens of a small Portuguese colony, not far from Hong Kong, will shortly be fully entitled to come to this country, as the Government are well aware, which could create problems if people from Hong Kong go to that colony.

I have a high regard for the Under-Secretary of State and have never doubted his integrity. I hope that he will give us some guidance on the position of the Government and of immigration officers in the event of a case being taken to the European Court, as is likely, to decide whether a person coming to an EC country from a third-world country will have the automatic right of admission to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Allen: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would help me to understand his argument. Is he criticising the fact that most immigration decisions are made by meetings of European Community Ministers? Is he criticising the fact that none of the decisions comes before the European Commission or the European Parliament? If that happened, would it not give us a better chance to scrutinise what goes on in the Trevi group and the ad hoc group of Immigration Ministers?

Sir Teddy Taylor: If the hon. Gentleman believes that argument, he should consider the matter more carefully. As he well knows, there is no way that the European Parliament, or any other such body, could consider such matters. It would be different if we were to start all over again and have a European Government and a European Parliament, but the hon. Gentleman is living in cloud cuckoo land. As he is well aware, the decisions will be taken by the European Court—a political court, which is not controlled by any democratic body. Irrespective of whether one considers that that is a good or a bad thing, the basic issue is important.

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

The Government will be well aware that the Home Secretary has had long discussions with Commissioner Bangemann because it was assumed that article 7 might allow any person from a third-world country who was entitled to come to any part of the European Community to come to the United Kingdom. It was assumed that a bona fide visitor to Greece, Portugal or Italy would have an automatic right of entry here, despite our laws. The Home Secretary has had long discussions with Mr. Bangemann and it seems that a decision has been delayed for a year or more. However, as the Minister knows well, that agreement does not prevent anyone from a third-world country from going to the European Court to claim that, because of article 7, he or she should have right of admission into the United Kingdom. Although we cannot prejudge such matters, the signs are that the European Court would find in favour of such an application and in those circumstances we could face considerable problems. Italy is virtually an open house country, to which it is easy to gain admission, and Greece poses a problem because, although Athens is tightly controlled, it is easy to gain entry to the rest of the country.

I do not wish simply to peddle an EC argument; I wish to point out the dangers if we do not have effective controls. I think that all hon. Members have been horrified at recent events in Germany, which have happened not because the Germans are nasty people but because they gained the impression—rightly or wrongly—that there was no effective control over people coming to their country from the eastern bloc. For that reason, some horrible things happened, horrible deeds were done and horrible things were said.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House who are anxious to preserve good race relations in this country are also anxious to prevent a situation in which we will have limited control over the admission of people from third-world countries to this country. We are well aware that there is a huge demand from people in third-world countries to come here because of economic considerations, although those are not as vital during a time of great depression, and because of the bonds between the United Kingdom and parts of the third world. Every hon. Member knows of the numbers of people from Bangladesh and Pakistan who want to come to this country because of our historic links and the successes of fellow citizens who have settled here. The Minister knows that if we did not have effective immigration controls the good relations that many people—including some Ministers in the Department—fight hard to maintain could be undermined.

Can the Government give us any indication of the advice that they will give to immigration officers if such a case should be taken to the European Court? We know that court decisions take about one year and all kinds of problems could arise during the deliberations. If, after one year, the decision went against the Government, what on earth would be the position of immigration officers and Department officials who had refused entry to people in the meantime? Considerable damage could result. Considerable difficulties can arise in law if one deprives someone of something to which he is later found to be legally entitled. Can the Minister tell us what advice he will give to immigration officers if we were to lose such a case?

I have sat in this House for far too long not to appreciate that he and other Ministers must get fed up with people asking hypothetical questions. However, the Minister and officials at the Department are well aware that this is in no sense a hypothetical issue. The problem will arise, either because someone takes a case to the European Court, or because of the eventual agreement between the Government and Mr. Bangemann because of what is contained in article 7.

I hope that the Minister will give us some guidance about what he thinks will be the legal position of immigration officers while a court decision is being taken, and what Government policy will be if the decision goes against them, which I fear will be the case. That will pose a serious problem and I am sure that it worries Members on both sides of the House. We cannot run away from it.

Knowing the Minister as I do, I hope that he will make a statement now, rather than causing panic if such a case came to the European Court. How much better it would be for the Government to face up to the decision and to make an early statement about what they intend to do.

Knowing the Minister as I do and knowing of his integrity, as I said before—something that I have said of only one other Minister—I hope that the Minister will take the matter seriously, will face up to it and will tell us, on behalf of the Government, about their approach to the issue.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is a man of considerable charm, but I am not used to his laying it on with a trowel in the fashion that he has just done. He is inviting me to speculate on a hypothetical situation—a case that he has dreamt up. I shall respond, as best I can, by saying where we are now, and I shall let him draw his conclusions and take what he will to the debates on Maastricht later this week and in following weeks. The Government will strongly resist any such case. On the back of expert legal advice, we are confident that we would be successful.

I shall make three points which may help my hon. Friend, although I appreciate that he is an expert on the Maastricht treaty. The House will be aware that only two immigration issues come within treaty competence: a common visa list will be established for member countries, as well as a standard visa format. Everything else to do with immigration which is sometimes debated in this House and elsewhere will come under the pillar of co-operation, with Immigration Ministers of the different countries meeting on a regular basis and seeking to harmonise their policies, but not seeking to establish a standard set of policies.

Mr. Fraser: Are we not being a little misled? Is there not a provision in the Maastricht treaty to the effect that a majority, which could exclude the United Kingdom, could impose a visa restriction when, in the words of that treaty, there is a threat to entry to the Community?

Mr. Wardle: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right about that, but, in terms of the practical arrangements for our normal day-to-day immigration controls, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree that the two features I have outlined will come within treaty competence. However, I accept the advice that the hon. Gentleman has offered to the House.

I should like to raise two more points in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East and then I shall consider the points raised by the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser).

Undoubtedly the Commission has a different interpretation of these matters and we dispute its interpretation of article 8A. We are absolutely clear that it does not apply to third-country nationals—people from non-EC countries—who were at the crux of the hypothetical situation which my hon. Friend described. We shall continue to maintain the check on the identity of all passengers coming into the United Kingdom to establish whether they are third-country nationals or not.

As the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) frequently reminded us in Committee, we are not a member of the Schengen group. However, we applaud the efforts made by the nine EC countries which are members of it to improve their frontier controls. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East rightly said, those countries face huge problems with their long land-locked borders and controls are difficult. That is another reason why we shall continue to hold to our interpretation of article 8A and maintain our checks on non-EC nationals.

The hon. Member for Norwood spoke of allegations that some asylum applicants have been physically prevented from gaining access to an immigration officer to make their application. The whole House shares the hon. Gentleman's concern that people who come to this country wishing to claim asylum should have an unfettered opportunity to do so.

I am aware that it has been alleged that, in some cases, passengers have been prevented from disembarking or from approaching immigration control. I assure the House, as I assured the Committee on the same subject, that the Government would not condone such behaviour. Immigration officers have clear instructions that a person who claims asylum while on United Kingdom soil must have his or her application referred to the asylum division of the Home Office.

I am pleased to say that there is no evidence that immigration officers have been involved in unauthorised removals, which would be contrary to their instructions. Having said that, I very much doubt that the creation of the new criminal offence, as proposed in the new clause, would be an appropriate response to that issue.

It is equally unacceptable that airlines should seek physically to prevent a passenger from approaching immigration control. Once the passenger has arrived in the United Kingdom, it is too late for the airline to ask itself whether it should have carried that passenger.

I must take issue with subsection (2) of the new clause, which says that an offence would be committed even if the act in question took place outside the United Kingdom. That would be an extraordinary extension of extra-territorial jurisdiction and, in any case, it would not be enforceable. I assume that it is intended to render the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 unworkable, because airlines would argue that they were prevented from denying boarding to undocumented passengers.

I have already made clear, as did my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State earlier today, that we shall abide by our obligations under the 1951 convention in relation to people who have arrived in this country and who seek our protection. There is no obligation upon us, however, to facilitate the passage of that person to the United Kingdom. Moreover, as the hon. Member for Norwood allowed, it is frequently the pattern these days that passengers do not embark for the United Kingdom directly from the country of alleged persecution; they first find their way to a country of transit.

The new clause would effectively render the 1987 Act unworkable, and for that reason I urge the House to reject it.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 4

PERIOD OF NOTICE AFTER NOTICE OF DECISION TO APPEAL

'.—(1) No rule made by virtue of Schedule 2 of this Act shall provide for a notice of appeal against an asylum decision to be given, unless it provides for a period of ten days after receiving notice of the decision to give notice of appeal.

(2) Asylum decision in this section means a decision to refuse leave to enter the United Kingdom or to remove a person from the United Kingdom or to refuse to vary the leave of a person in the United Kingdom, or to make a decision to deport, or to refuse to revoke a deportation order, or to refuse entry clearance to the United Kingdom where the grounds of appeal are that the decision is contrary to the United Kingdom's obligations under the Convention.

(3) Where the Secretary of State has given a certificate under paragraph 4 of Schedule 2 to this Act the period of ten days shall be read as a period of five days.'.—[Mr. Blair.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Blair: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 24, in page 13, line 28, at end insert—

'(4)(A)(1) The time limit for giving notice of any appeal shall be no less than 10 days unless the Secretary of State has certified that in his opinion the person's asylum claim is without foundation.

(2) In the event that he shall so certify, the time limit shall be 2 days provided that the person is in detention and has submitted a claim for asylum on arrival to an immigration officer.'.

No. 25, in page 13, line 33, leave out from 'he' to 'refer' and insert 'shall'.

Mr. Blair: The new clause and the amendments raise two issues: first, when the accelerated procedure for lodging appeals arises under the legislation—in other words, the 48-hour rule—and, secondly, whether that time limit is sufficient for those with appeals to be able to lodge them properly.

In respect of the first issue, the category of cases to which the 48-hour rule applies, the intention of the Government was put on the record in Committee when the Minister made it clear that the accelerated procedure—the fast-track procedure—for hearing appeals should apply only to port entry cases where the person was in detention and the Secretary of State had certified the claim as groundless. It was made clear that those two preconditions should apply. That is somewhat at odds with the explanation of the legislation given by the Secretary of State on Second Reading, but we will let that pass.

[Mr. Blair]

The problem is that the interpretation and intention of the Government is by no means clear from the legislation and the rules themselves. Rule 5(2) of the draft appeal rules states:

"The time limit for giving notice of appeal shall be two days in a case where the appeal is made under section 7(1) of this Bill."

Clause 7(1) applies in any case where there has been personal service on the appellant of the notice of decision. On the face of it, the combination of the rules plus clause 7 means that this accelerated procedure applies in any circumstance when notice of the decision is served personally. As I understand the Government's answer to that is that, as a matter of practice, it will apply only to those in detention and, again as a matter of practice, the only people detained will be those whose claims are deemed groundless. Therefore, the Government say that the practical effect of their procedure is that the accelerated procedure will apply only to those with groundless claims who are in detention.

I should be grateful if the Minister would address the following two points. First, the limitation on the plain meaning of the rules and the clause is not stipulated anywhere in the rules. Secondly, it does not appear to accord with practice. I am advised, and I have checked with a number of those operating in this area, that some people are detained even though their claims are not groundless, while some are served notices personally even though they have neither been detained nor are their claims groundless. The notion that this applies in practical circumstances—that personal service is effected only on those in detention whose claims have been certified as groundless—does not appear to be the case. Some notices are served personally even though that applicant is neither in detention nor is his claim groundless.

If the Government's intention is clear and not in dispute, the simple solution would be to alter the rules to ensure that the stated intention accords with the precise letter of the rules. Since it is now three months since this matter was first raised on Second Reading, I should have thought that the Minister would be able to give us an undertaking about the rules and their nature.

The other issue on which I seek clarification is the time limit. I do not want to go back over the territory that we explored in relation to clause 6, but it has become increasingly clear from debates in Committee and in the House that when we talk about an accelerated procedure weeding out bogus claims, in reality the term "bogus" is a misdescription and a particularly pejorative one. Claims will be made in good faith but will concern the category of people who, although not strictly refugees under the United Nations convention, are in fear of their lives because they are fleeing from civil distress, civil war or some other calamity.

The two days for the accelerated procedure has been criticised by many of those who operate in that area. It has also been criticised by the Law Society, the Bar Council, churches, and experts on and representatives of refugee groups. As there is a procedure for that time limit to be extended, our amendment extending the two-day period to five days is not unreasonable.

I draw the Minister's attention to the strong case that was made in the other place, when the matter was debated before the general election. Lord Ackner said that if the appeal procedures are truncated and there is insufficient time for people to prepare and launch an appeal satisfactorily, the only danger that we face is an increase in the number of applications for judicial review. That is a much more protracted and costly process and would slow down the procedure for determination. If there were a possibility of that happening as result of shortening the appeal period, it would not be in the interests of applicants, the Government or those with a view of the public interest.

Will the Minister respond, first, to the time limit, which we believe is too short to allow proper preparation of the case, and, secondly, ensure that the draft appeal rules are brought into accordance with the Government's stated intentions so that there can be no mistake about people's rights or to whom the accelerated procedure will apply?

Mr. Charles Wardle: First, I give the assurance which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) seeks. I confirm that the draft rules will be amended in accordance with the undertakings that I gave in Committee. If those who are detained are refused but it is deemed that their case is not groundless, the accelerated timetable will not apply, so there will be a longer period. I hope that that clarifies another point which the hon. Gentleman raised.

New clause 4 and amendment No. 24 deal with time limits for bringing appeals and the accelerated procedure for certain unfounded cases. Although the hon. Member for Sedgefield said that he was reluctant to go back over that ground, I hope that he will be patient with me if I cover a little of it rapidly with the aim of clarification.

Paragraph 4 of schedule 2 sets up a special procedure for appeals against refusal of entry, refusal to revoke a deportation order or directions for removal as an illegal entry where the Secretary of State certifies the asylum claim to be without foundation. Where a special adjudicator agrees with that view, there is no further appeal to the tribunal. Where he does not agree, he may either allow or dismiss the appeal or he may refer the case back to the Secretary of State for reconsideration.

In addition, the draft procedure rules contain a provision for a shorter time limit for lodging an appeal against refusal of entry—two days instead of 10—where the notice of refusal is served in person. In practice, that means that the applicant will be detained. My right hon. and learned Friend made it clear on Second Reading that this shorter time limit is intended to apply only in cases where the claim is certified to be without foundation and I confirm that that will be incorporated into the draft procedure rules when they are revised.

Amendment No. 24 correctly summarises the position in which the shorter time limits will apply. However, time limits are appropriately dealt with in the procedure rules, rather than the primary legislation.

New clause 4 is misconceived in a number of ways. For example, it includes in the definition of an asylum decision a refusal of entry clearance to come to the United Kingdom. The Bill does not confer a right of appeal to a special adjudicator against refusal of entry clearance, since a person must be in the United Kingdom to claim asylum here.

Amendment No. 25 would require a special adjudicator who disagreed with the Secretary of State's view that a claim was without foundation to refer the case back for reconsideration rather than allowing or dismissing the appeal. In most such cases reference back will be the appropriate course as there will not have been substantive consideration of the claim—for example, where my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State considers the claim not to engage our obligations under the convention because it is proposed to remove the appellant to a safe third country. In cases where there has already been substantive consideration of the claim, however, the special adjudicator may have before him the necessary information to enable him to dismiss or allow the appeal and there is no good reason to prevent him from doing so.

I therefore urge the House to reject the new clause and both amendments.

New Clause 5

CREDIBILITY OF ASYLUM-SEEKERS

'Notwithstanding anything in any asylum or immigration rule, the credibility of an asylum-seeker may not be judged by reference to any of the following grounds—

(a) a failure to make immediate disclosure of all material facts;
(b) the destruction of documents;
(c) a failure to apply forthwith;
(d) political activities in the United Kingdom.'.—[Mr. Allen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Allen: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause refers to the credibility tests that will apply to people applying for political asylum. It is another example of law being made outside the parliamentary process. It is deplorable that the draft immigration rules do not appear on the face of the Bill. They are important to people applying for political asylum and it should not be left to us to devise ways of discussing them in the House. They should be in the Bill, so that those who want to can ask questions about them.

The rules list the criteria that can be taken into account when dealing with asylum applications. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees office has made its position quite clear. It is of the opinion that the draft provisions

"do not ensure the full implementation of the 1951 Convention [relating to the status of refugees] in the United Kingdom and some of them appear to vary from internationally adopted principles relating to asylum and the protection of refugees.'

That is a clear warning to the Home Office that its proposals may not meet international standards. It is not even clear why the Home Office thought many of these proposals necessary in the first place.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) referred to the moves towards European harmonisation, although he did not seem too keen to introduce an element of European accountability to this matter. It appears that the United Kingdom is adopting a tougher line than are many of our European partners. In an interesting exercise the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants compared the text of the draft immigration rules with the text of the resolution adopted by the ad hoc group of European Immigration Ministers. There are a number of revealing comparisons between the allegedly hard-line attitude of some European countries and the actual words used by the ad hoc group of Ministers—words with a softer ring to them than many of the phrases that appear in our immigration rules.

The ad hoc group resolution mentions an asylum seeker who has "deliberately made false representations about his claim, either orally or in writing, after applying for asylum".

The words "deliberately" and "after applying for asylum" do not appear in the English text. Throughout the ad hoc group's document one is aware of more qualifications and greater sensitivity in what is, after all, a brutal political area. Far from harmonising our rules with those of Europe, it seems that we are bringing our European partners down to our level—that level being the lowest common denominator.

One of the conditions in the rules is that the applicant "has made false representations, either orally or in writing". That provides no safeguards for asylum seekers and does not mention the motivation that may have been behind untrue statements. So the Home Office could decide to refuse an application merely because of its own misunderstanding that a false representation had been made. Further, there are no time limits on this, so it would mean that the person who had sought entry as a visitor because he did not understand the procedures for claiming asylum, and who had therefore maintained that he would leave the country after a visit, could be refused on credibility grounds.

The Home Office notes to the rules also state:

"Self-evidently, if the applicant has been shown to have lied on specific points there will be more general doubt about his story", but there is no explanation of the reasons why many asylum seekers do not feel secure enough to reveal all the details of their suffering immediately after meeting an official.

The second criterion is that an applicant has "destroyed, damaged or disposed of any passport, other document or ticket relevant to his claim".

That needs further examination. As it stands, the rule means that if a passport has been accidentally damaged, that can be held against the applicant. There is no requirement to show that the damage occurred deliberately. The Home Office notes assume that such damage is always deliberate so as to make it more difficult to remove people if their applications are refused. The other assumption is that passports may be re-used by agents helping other people to escape. Some asylum seekers are badly advised by agents before reaching the United Kingdom.

The third criterion reflecting on the credibility of an application is that the applicant

"has lodged concurrent applications for asylum in the United Kingdom or in another country".

An interesting example of recent pedigree would be that of someone who has lodged an application in Germany and whose close family members have either reached another country or been granted asylum there because of the dangers that they faced in their first country of asylum. Such people may have been persecuted by racist gangs in east Germany, for instance. How might such cases be dealt with in practice?

Another criterion concerns

"failure to comply with a notice issued by the Secretary of State requiring the applicant to report to a designated place to be fingerprinted".

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) may want to comment on that shortly. The rules go on:

"or failure to complete an asylum questionnaire, or failure to comply with a request to attend an interview concerning the application".

At first sight these last criteria appear relatively innocuous—but a requirement to be fingerprinted has nothing to do with the substantive nature of an asylum claim. The Home Office frequently writes to the wrong address or gives inadequate notice of interview or fails to provide an interpreter. Such circumstances should not be held against applicants. The rules will mean that asylum seekers will be penalised for factors unconnected with the strength of their claims; and people who have followed bad advice or who have genuinely lost documents will find their cases prejudiced and may be returned to danger.

It is therefore vital that the rules be amended at least to provide the minimal protections suggested in the ad hoc group's resolution. At best, these restrictions should be removed altogether so that each claim can be considered on its merits.

The UNHCR suggests that it is not advisable

"to list . . . the factors which should be given special consideration when assessing an asylum-seeker's credibility. Evaluation of credibility is a process which involves the consideration of many complex factors, both objective and subjective, which are impossible to enumerate. Since all these may be equally important, singling out any of these factors will, by necessity, be incomplete and arbitrary."

New clause 5 is designed, in short, to make it clear that we should not attempt to define applicants' credibility by such arbitrary means. We believe that these are questions of judgment and that if we introduce such rules, mistakes can be made and people will be excluded. Given that these are matters of life or death, the significance of such exclusions must be plain for all to see.

Mr. Corbyn: I rise to support my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) and to ask the House to think seriously about what he has said. It is often not understood in this House—and certainly not in most newspapers—what it is like for someone who seeks political asylum. Many such people feel a sense of defeat because they have had to flee from their own country to seek a new life elsewhere and transfer their energies into a different society. Many of them have to travel in great danger.

The history books record the heroic deeds of people who sought asylum and those who escaped from religious persecution in the middle ages in western Europe. Many people fled from Nazi Germany in the 1920s and 1930s and from Fascist Spain in the late 1930s and 1940s. More recently, people had to leave South Africa or flee from oppressive regimes in central and south America or Africa. People have had to flee from the regime of Saddam Hussein in Iraq. There are numerous other examples. [Interruption.] Perhaps the Home Secretary would listen to the debate on the new clause rather than gossiping with his hon. Friends. Presumably he is discussing football results. He should take seriously my description of what it is like for people who seek political asylum because he makes the decisions and he framed the legislation.

The new clause seeks to remove the destruction of documents, failure to disclose all material facts, failure to apply immediately or political activities in the United Kingdom as bases upon which an application may be refused. Let us consider the case of someone who has been consistently opposed to the regime in Iran. He is forced to live and work underground and to change his name and identity. He manages to flee the country, often paying people to guide him at night, and arrives in Peshawar in Pakistan. He then seeks to buy an identity and to travel to a place of safety in another part of the world. That example is based on an actual case.

When that person finally arrives at, say, Heathrow, he would be loth to reveal all that information. He would seek to enter Britain as a visitor before considering with friends the next step and would apply for political asylum. The fact that such a person does not make an immediate application and has destroyed all evidence of his identity on the way here would be detrimental to his case. He would have destroyed that evidence by throwing documents away, flushing them down a toilet, tearing them up or burning them. People do such things because they are frightened and want to get away to a place of safety. If someone carried such documents during his night time journey in Iran, he would be liable to arrest, detention and possible execution and his family, relatives and friends could suffer a similar fate.

I mentioned political activities in the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and others represent a rather curious lunatic element in the Conservative party. The hon. Gentleman is not here, but I shall later tell him what I have said about him as I am sure he would be interested to hear it. Political activity in Britain is detrimental to a person's chances of gaining political asylum. Is it so wrong for someone seeking political asylum from a repressive regime to undertake peaceful political activities against that regime? I see nothing wrong with that if he had been consistently opposed to that regime throughout the time that he lived under it.

I know people who have been asked by the immigration service what they had been doing in this country to oppose the regime from which they had fled. They said that they had not done much because they were worried about their position. That was counted against them. The new clause seeks to make clear and specific what can or cannot be used in forming a judgment of an asylum seeker's credibility. I hope that no hon. Member will ever have to seek political asylum.

Many refugees have made enormous contributions to science, art, literature, politics and medicine. Many such people hold senior positions in the health service and in universities and other places both here and in the United States. Many of them sought political asylum, but if the judgments outlined in the Bill had operated in the 1930s, many would not have been granted political asylum. If such judgments had been used against people fleeing from Chile in 1973, they would not have gained asylum. There are many other examples.

The new clause would make the legislation more credible and would lead to a greater understanding of the needs of people seeking political asylum because it would ensure that decisions were based on the entire experience of the asylum seeker. Many people have grown up in a society in which people have been taught to mistrust officialdom in any form because it does not work for their benefit and to mistrust anyone in uniform because he may have taken part in attacks or murders of family members. Political asylum seekers with such experiences are unlikely to reveal their entire life story at the first point of entry; such people are often psychologically disturbed and would be incapable of doing so anyway.

We seek to ensure that all such factors are taken into account and that officers conducting interviews do not try to extract all the information at the first point. People must be given a chance to recover from the nightmare of the journey and the reality of the escape. They should be allowed to consider their situation and their safety and that of their families and friends who may still be living under a totalitarian regime. Unhappily, the world contains far too many such regimes and many countries in western Europe and the United States support them economically and militarily. We should think of the wider implications of what we say and do. I hope that the Minister will recognise the force of the arguments for the new clause.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I do not disagree with the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) about some genuinely harrowing cases to which he has alluded in the debate and raised more than once in Committee. I hope that he appreciates that the Bill will enable us to move more swiftly through unfounded cases so that we can deal more rapidly with precisely the sort of harrowing case that he describes. As I said earlier, about 75 per cent. of those who apply for asylum have already established themselves here as visitors or in some other way.

As the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) will appreciate, the rules that he criticised have to be laid before Parliament and if prayed against can be debated and, in theory, can be disapproved. The new clause is misconceived and impractical, as I shall seek to explain. It would undermine the provisions of the draft rules relating to credibility. There are several reasons for the way in which the factors are set out in the rules.

First, the rules make clear to applicants and advisers and to those determining the claim the factors that may be considered important. In Committee, Opposition Members frequently asserted that an asylum seeker arriving here may be unfamiliar with our procedures and may not know what is important and what is not in presenting his case. The rules form a useful guide to the points that may be deemed of interest. Secondly, the rules are drafted to address quite specific problems of which we have become aware through vast experience of processing claims.

Let me give one or two examples. The first is of a person who applies for asylum only after several unsuccessful attempts to extend his or her stay in some other capacity and having exhausted all other rights of appeal under the normal immigration laws, or where there has been no change in the situation in the country of origin. Another is of the person whose story changes markedly when he is confronted with a rebuttal of part of his original story, which changes several times more with each successive interview. Another is of the person who destroys identification documents en route to, or after entering, the United Kingdom in order to delay removal. I understand that that will happen for other reasons, as the hon. Member for Islington, North has pointed out.

We fully appreciate the importance of an asylum claim and of making the right decision. For those reasons, it is vital that all the relevant factors of a case are examined. The general credibility of the applicant is crucial to the eventual decision. Therefore, it is somewhat unworldly to suggest that certain key factors should be taken entirely out of the frame and should play no part in reaching the final decision. It is surely natural to question why a person who has been here for two years suddenly makes an asylum claim in the absence of any obvious changes in his circumstances.

I have stressed on many occasions, and I am pleased to do so again, that the draft rules are framed in conditional language. Some factors may count against an applicant if no reasonable explanation is given. If a credible explanation is forthcoming, applicants may considerably enhance the strength of their claim to asylum. However bizarre the behaviour may have been, if there is a credible explanation, that will be taken into account, and so it should be.

However, it is simply not an option to ignore the fact that someone has deliberately sought to hide his identity or the fact that he has taken part in political activities in which he has never previously taken an interest and thereby placed himself in a particularly difficult situation. It is not unreasonable to explore such behaviour and seek explanations of it as part of the overall assessment of the case. That is what the draft rules provide for. For those reasons, I urge the House to reject new clause 5.

Question put and negatived.

FINGERPRINTING

Mr. Mike Watson (Glasgow, Central): I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 20, leave out from line 20 to line 47 on page 2.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: Government amendments Nos. 29 and 30.

No. 5, in page 2. line 3, at end insert

'; except that no claimant or dependant under the age of 16 years shall be fingerprinted.'.

No. 6, in page 2, line 3, at end insert

'; except that the claimant of dependant under the age of 18 shall not be fingerprinted unless in the presence of their parent or guardian or social worker.'.

Government amendments Nos. 31 and 32.

No. 28, in page 2, line 47, at end insert—

'(11) Where a child under 16 years of age is an asylum seeker or is the dependent of an asylum seeker, an appropriate adult shall be present during the fingerprinting procedure; and an "appropriate adult" is a parent or guardian, advocate, social worker aged 18 or over and who is not employed by the police or immigration services'.'

Mr. Watson: Of all the clauses in the Bill, clause 3 is seen by Opposition Members and many outside as the most offensive. That is one reason why it was vigorously opposed and resisted in Committee. Despite some minor concessions squeezed from the Minister, which appear in the form of four Government amendments, the Opposition are no more convinced than they were when the Bill was first published that fingerprinting of asylum seekers and their relatives is anything other than a denial of basic civil liberties.

Amendment No. 4 offers the Government an honourable escape from the opprobrium that has been heaped upon them by the simple device of deleting the whole clause from the Bill. That would be the easy way out, although we do not anticipate that the Government will accept it, and it would go some way to easing the fears of a wide range of organisations and concerned individuals who have expressed their disgust at the relish with which the Home Secretary and his colleagues appear to wish to criminalise every man, woman and child who arrives on our shores seeking sanctuary.

It is no use the Home Secretary doing what his Minister did in Committee and consoling himself with the thought that fingerprinting is not a humiliating process or, as the Minister said, an unpleasant one. People associate fingerprinting with criminality in this country because hitherto only those charged with, or convicted of, a criminal offence have been forced to submit to it. When this odious Bill becomes law, the situation will be dramatically changed and, on a wide-ranging basis, fingerprinting will be carried out on every asylum seeker.

Opposition Members stressed consistently, both on Second Reading and in Committee, that the provision is not even necessary because the powers that it will bestow already exist. Under the Immigration Act 1971 and the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, fingerprinting is carried out when an offence has been committed or, in some circumstances, when a person is charged with an offence.

I see that I have the honour of facing the Home Secretary this evening. I do not know whether he believes that all asylum seekers would be criminalised by the introduction of fingerprinting, but that is not of much significance. What is important is that those facing the fingerprinting process will feel that they have been criminalised, will feel guilty, and will feel that they have to prove themselves innocent when they arrive here. Perhaps even more importantly, the people of Britain will view such people as criminals because that is the way in which we customarily view those who are subjected to fingerprinting. Only rarely have people been fingerprinted and then not been charged with a fairly serious offence. That is undoubtedly how it will be perceived by the British people.

It may be that that latter point serves the Government's overall strategy which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said in the opening debate, has been aimed at characterising all applicants as frauds, scroungers or impostors. It is assumed that their applications are bogus. Only on rare occasions are people treated at face value when they arrive here. The situation will worsen dramatically once the Bill becomes law.

Any country that claims to be a democracy should be able to offer asylum seekers more than that assumption when they arrive at its shores. Neither I nor my colleagues have ever argued, either here or in Committee, that there are not some instances of people applying for asylum in a less-than-honest manner. Sometimes there are multiple claims. That has always happened. What we are talking about here is the scale of the problem. Our argument has always been that the scale fails to justify the knee-jerk reaction embodied by the Bill.

Furthermore, it comes nowhere near justifying the universal assumption of guilt being applied to each and every asylum seeker. I do not believe for a moment that much of this will make any impression on the Home Secretary or his colleagues. They have set out their stall clearly. Many of them were involved with the Asylum Bill that was debated last year. Their aim has been clear, and in Committee they have wavered only slightly.

This is a modest amendment in the face of widespread opposition both inside and outside the House. The latest event in that process is what we are seeing this afternoon, with the effective lobby organised by the anti-racist alliance, as a result of which many people were here lobbying their Members of Parliament. I am sure that Conservative Members felt the sharp end of the tongues of many who feel themselves and their families threatened by the Bill.

That process has gone on for several months and doubtless will continue even after the Bill is on the statute book. It is unfortunate that the Government have failed to take account of the widespread views of people, but once they have set their course, they sit back rigidly to fight rather than listening to the arguments put by others.

One of the minor concessions made by the Minister in Committee was his promise of what he called a "tighter form" of words in terms of who will be permitted to fingerprint asylum seekers. The wording is rather loose, with its references to other persons, apart from policemen, immigration officers and prison officers, being permitted by the Home Secretary to take fingerprints. We pressed the Minister strongly on that and, although Government amendment No. 29 clarifies the procedure and goes some way towards restricting those who can become involved, it is not clear what it meant. The amendment states that persons other than those to whom I referred—policemen, immigration officers and prison officers—are officers of the Secretary of State. However, all those people are already officers of the Secretary of State, and it is not clear why the other category is needed. I do not understand why it has to be left so vague. The Minister said in Commitee that he did not imagine that the practice would be applied widely. If that is so, why not restrict it to the three categories which, reasonably, have been included in some detail?

Those who framed the 1991 Bill, when the previous Conservative Government were in office, did not seek to drag into the net of fingerprinting the relatives of asylum seekers. Yet this Bill seeks to cast the net considerably wider to ensnare the dependants of asylum seekers.

In Committee, my hon. Friends and I left the Minister in no doubt about the consequences of clause 3. Indeed, we highlighted in considerable detail the effect that it would have on children. I do not propose to go into that detail again because it would seem that we advanced our arguments to little avail. Some sympathy was forthcoming, however, from some Conservative Members in Committee. It is fair to say that some of them participated in debates on the clause. None the less, I regard the Government's concession to be of little value.

My hon. Friends and I argued in Committee that children should be excluded from fingerprinting, and we talked about children of certain ages. The Government's amendment does not represent an attempt to meet our arguments and it is clear that they remain resolute in their aim to exclude no children.

I find little solace in the Minister saying, in effect, that it is not the Government's intention routinely to fingerprint children. Under the Bill, any child who arrives at our shores can be fingerprinted if those who receive the child feel that that is necessary. The door that faces those who arrive in the United Kingdom is open far too wide. Unfortunately, the Minister's undertaking to produce an amendment to meet our fears has not been fulfilled. Government amendment No. 30 provides that children under the age of 16 years who are fingerprinted should be accompanied by someone who is termed to be "a person of full age who is not an authorised person."

That is a welcome concession, but it does not go far enough. It means that all children will or can be fingerprinted. It goes only part of the way to allaying our fears. Further, it goes only part of the way to meeting the commitment that my colleagues and I believe that the Minister entered into when he responded to the debates on fingerprinting in Committee.

The Government's amendment does not define who the accompanying adult should be. My hon. Friends and I and the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) introduced amendments in Committee which were considerably more detailed and referred exactly to who the accompanying adult should be. Under the Government's definition of who an "authorised person" should be in amendment No. 29, it follows that any adult apart from those referred to who happened to be passing at the time could, in theory, be asked by the officers of the immigration authorities to witness the fingerprinting of a child under the age of 16. The only people excluded are the officers of the Secretary of State. In theory, anyone else could be brought in as a witness.

Surely that is unsatisfactory. That is leaving aside Muslim girls and women who, due to their religion, could become most distressed on being faced with fingerprinting by a man or by being accompanied by a male person. If a child is to be accompanied, and if the provision is to have any meaning, the accompanying adult should be the parent or guardian. It should be a person who the child knows. At the very least, it should be someone who has experience of asylum legislation, of some aspects of social work care and of the feelings of children in what will be inevitably a distressing situation, quite apart from the actual fingerprinting.

We are disappointed with the Government's response. There must be some assurance that the person accompanying the child will provide some reassurance to the child. It should be someone in whom the child can have some confidence and feel able to turn to in what will be a difficult situation.

In contrast to Government amendment No. 30 there is amendment No. 28, which offers a much more useful definition of the sort of person who should be permitted to accompany a child in these circumstances. It should be made clear that the accompanying person should have some knowledge of child welfare and of asylum procedures. It is made clear in amendment No. 28 who the accompanying adult should be. The amendment is consistent with the views that were expressed by many Opposition Members in Committee. To provide that someone should be an authorised person and not to go any further fails to secure what we regard as the safeguards that are necessary to build confidence in a child. The Home Secretary must make clear why he feels that Government amendment No. 30 is adequate in that context. It would have been far better if children below the age of 16 had been excluded. That has not happened, and that is regrettable.

The impression that has been gained by my colleagues and I is that the Government failed to appreciate the situation that will face children who are fingerprinted. There has been no adequate explanation of why the Bill requires children to be fingerprinted when the previous Bill did not. The Government have failed to give serious thought to the awkward position in which they are placing children.

The Government are over-reacting in believing that it is necessary to go to such lengths. The provisions in clause 3 are distasteful. Our relations with other European countries may lead to certain obligations—in other words, we are seeing an alarming drift. I was not assured by the responses of the Minister in Committee about the exchange of computerised information that may take place on asylum seekers. It will become increasingly difficult for people outwith the European Community to enter any of the EC countries, and that is a matter of great regret. The clause cuts across what has been seen in some senses as a commitment by the United Kingdom to many parts of the developing world, not least those which were part of the Commonwealth.

The amendments highlight the Government's insensitivity to the needs of asylum seekers when they come to the United Kingdom and the Government's failure to grasp their obligations under international conventions. We debated at length in Committee the 1951 convention, which should be taken into account, and the United Nations convention on the rights of the child, which would outlaw the taking of fingerprints if the Government were prepared to be bound by it in relation to the inhumane and cruel treatment that the convention seeks to circumscribe. It is not surprising that the Government have decided not to be so bound, but it is regrettable. We oppose most vigorously the Government's fundamental approach to fingerprinting.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Much was said in Committee—the argument has been advanced again this evening—to the effect that fingerprinting is associated with criminality. But I was fingerprinted when my car was broken into. That was done to ensure that my prints were excluded from any others on the car. When my grandparents' home was the scene of a robbery, they were fingerprinted to exclude them from any possibility of being associated with the prints of those who broke into the house. There are, therefore, aspects of fingerprinting that are good, to which no credence is given by Opposition Members.

When I was in the United States last year I saw many children—they were accompanied by mums or other members of the family—who were lining up voluntarily to have their fingerprintes taken because of the rising problem—[Interruption.] Perhaps hon. Members will agree to listen the second time around. They may learn something this time. Children were being fingerprinted because of the rising incidence of child abduction. The fingerprint records mean that such children can be traced at a later date. People thought such fingerprinting to be a good idea. In the culture of the United States—indeed, in our culture too—if someone has his fingerprints taken it does not necessarily mean that he has committed a criminal act, or even that people might think that he had done so.

Mrs. Roche: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman with great interest. Does he think that there is a difference between parents in the United States accompanying their children during fingerprinting as part of a voluntary exercise, and the horror felt by children who are fleeing persecution, civil war or torture and are confronted by figures in authority—however kind or benevolent—who insist on taking their fingerprints?

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her remarks. I have tried to show that the act of fingerprinting does not necessarily mean that the person has committed a criminal act. I recognise the trauma of refugees coming to this country, but surely having their fingerprints taken would be one of the least worrying acts that they will have faced during the past four, five or 10 years. People flee from their own countries because of persecution, so having their fingerprints taken in this country would be the least of their concerns.

I believe that the Government's amendment will be beneficial. In Committee many of my hon. Friends made known their concern that someone in uniform might, in certain circumstances, worry some refugees. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has dealt with that specific point and we are grateful to him for that. We have no qualms about his amendment. Opposition Members have blown the fingerprinting issue out of all proportion. Refugees coming to this country will have no cause for concern at having their fingerprints taken.

Mr. Maclennan: It would be ungracious of me not to acknowledge that the Government have moved some way towards fulfilling their undertaking in Committee to introduce an amendment to deal with the problem of children being fingerprinted. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) well described the limits of the Government's concession and properly drew attention to the doubt whether it goes far enough.

In answer to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), may I say that one reason why people have focused on the fingerprinting issue is that there is a much more widespread concern about the treatment of children in general under the Bill. During the Committee stage of this Bill and its predecessor, that concern was manifestly shown on all sides of the House, not least by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley and other Conservative Members. I confess that I had hoped that the Government would recognise the advantage of supporting young children seeking asylum and that they would move some way towards the appointment of an advocate or social worker to look after them during consideration of their asylum applications. I still hope that that matter will be considered in another place.

These amendments inevitably are confined to the issue of fingerprinting. I agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central that the way that the Government have drafted their amendment would open the door to inviting almost anyone—perhaps a secretary in the next office who is not technically an officer of the Secretary of State—to witness what was being done. That is not what lay behind the original proposition. We did not want to ensure that the circumstances were regular in a purely legal sense; we wanted to ensure that a young person, who might well be fleeing from the circumstances described by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central, did not view the act of fingerprinting as a sign of hostility by those handling the case.

8.15 pm

A number of questions arise about the fingerprinting of children. The Minister said in Committee that he would consider specifying the locations where fingerprinting could take place. He said:

"It is easier for all concerned if prints can be taken in a variety of suitable locations by trained personnel."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 19 November 1992; c.194.]

There is no amendment on the Order Paper to put that statement into practice. It would be helpful if the Minister said again that that is the intention and that fingerprinting will be done only at a number of properly supervised locations—presumably, ports of entry, the immigration and nationality department, perhaps Home Office public inquiry offices—and that they will be taken only in connection with asylum applications. None of that has been spelt out in the primary legislation. Perhaps it is not important that it is, but it should certainly be clear beyond argument that that is the firm intention and policy of the Home Office.

I prefer the wording of amendment No. 28, which was tabled by myself and hon. Members from both sides of the House, to that of the Government amendment. However, I do not intend to press my amendment over the Government's amendment—at least, not until the Minister has explained why he has chosen such extraordinarily wide language to meet the concerns expressed in Committee and why he did not think it appropriate to ensure that the person who is to accompany a child is supportive in some way, and not merely a witness to the event.

Mr. Corbyn: I endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) and the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). There are serious concerns about the fingerprinting of asylum seekers. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) portrayed a picture of lines of happy children in United States' supermarkets queueing up to be fingerprinted, having had the position fully explained to them. That may be true. However, in this country even when children are fingerprinted simply to eliminate them from inquiries—to protect them—they are worried about it. It has to be carefully explained to them why they must be fingerprinted. People allow themselves to be fingerprinted only with the greatest reluctance, even when it is in their own interests. The hon. Gentleman's example is not suitable as support for the case for fingerprinting children seeking political asylum. Most of them do not have English as their first language and they may not even speak it at all. Their only experience of fingerprinting will have been in extremely hostile and dangerous circumstances.

There is also the question why fingerprinting is being done in the first place. In Committee on both this and the original Bill, much concern was expressed about the effects of fingerprinting on children and why it need be done. The Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), said:

"Fingerprinting will maintain our system's integrity and help check cases where there is evidence of multiple social security claims . . . that is what it is intended to do."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 28 November 1991; c. 61.]

Those remarks related to the original Bill, which fell because of the onset of the general election.

The new Bill has brought the return of the whole fingerprinting issue. We were told repeatedly in Committee that the purpose of fingerprinting was nothing more than to check against multiple applications for political asylum, yet when introducing the Bill the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) spent a great deal of time explaining that multiple social security applications were the real reason for it. He could not provide details, state their total volume, or confirm the level of fraud. Happily, that individual has gone on to do nothing and is no longer a Government Minister—for which we are all grateful.

When the hon. Member for Fareham made his statement in Committee, I believe that he let the cat out of the bag. While the real purpose of introducing fingerprinting is to check against multiple applications, with the very existence of that fingerprinting bank in the Home Office, what is there to stop the Home Secretary's friend, the Secretary of State for Social Security—after reading exaggerated stories in the Daily Mail and other newspapers—deciding that it is necessary to check on social security fraud and to introduce a little Bill giving social security inspectors the right to fingerprint people during the course of their investigations, to eliminate them from inquiries?

The public take their civil liberties and the fingerprinting issue very seriously. I doubt that they accept that the Government amendments go anywhere near meeting the wide range of concerns and opinions expressed on Second Reading and in Committee.

All that has been said in answer to criticisms from the children's legal centre and a number of other organisations concerned with child welfare is that a suitable adult must be present during fingerprinting. Obviously, that is better than no adult or independent person being present—but it would be even better if there were no fingerprinting of children at all.

At no stage has the Home Secretary or his Ministers said what will be the minimum age for the fingerprinting of children. We asked whether it would be 17, 16, 15, 14, 13, or 12 years of age—right down to children aged two or one, or even babies—but the Government were not prepared to state the lower age limit. Are we to permit the indignity of frightened children arriving in this country as asylum seekers being fingerprinted? That is on the cards.

I remind the House—perhaps the Minister will confirm this—that the fingerprinting provisions are retrospective. Some current asylum applicants arrived in this country three years ago or longer. I know of some applications that remain under consideration after five years. I do not complain about the length of time involved, because some applications require detailed examination and the collection of evidence. However, because of the retrospective nature of the Bill, those applicants—who arrived in this country long before the right hon. and learned Gentleman became Home Secretary—will also have to be fingerprinted.

I hope that the Minister appreciates that we are unhappy about the fingerprinting provision and do not accept that the Government's amendments go anywhere near meeting our objections. First, children should not be fingerprinted. It is wholly inappropriate, disturbing for the children, and unnecessary. The Government have not convinced me or anyone else of the need for fingerprinting other than as part of the process of curtailing individual rights by the creation of a central fingerprinting bank that can be used for other purposes.

Even if we cannot defeat this part of the Bill, I hope that it will be radically amended or defeated when it reaches another place, or will subsequently be ruled inadmissible because the Government are a signatory to other conventions—such as the United Nations convention on the rights of the child—which prohibit them from implementing this particularly nasty undertaking.

Mrs. Roche: My hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) graphically described why the Opposition object so strongly to the Bill's fingerprinting provision. The idea of fingerprinting children is the most abhorrent of all.

I listened with interest to the description by the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) of children being fingerprinted in the United States and of his experience of being fingerprinted in this country so that he could be eliminated from inquiries into a car crime. That was a perfectly natural and understandable use of fingerprinting of a kind that arises every day. There is, however, no way in which the hon. Member for Ribble Valley can equate those harmless instances with the taking of fingerprints of children arriving in this country in a traumatised state.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said, the Government have not imposed any minimum age on the fingerprinting of children. If the Government win the day and the fingerprinting of children is done in our name, that will bring shame on us all. That is the reason for our series of amendments. I would like no fingerprinting at all, but if that cannot be done, there should be no fingerprinting of children.

Amendment No. 28 has cross-party support, including support from the hon. Members for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) and for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith). It seeks to ensure that if fingerprinting is to be undertaken, an appropriate adult—a parent, guardian, advocate or social worker—will be present. In Committee, the difficuties affecting unaccompanied children arriving in the United Kingdom were described. The numbers are relatively small. In 1991, 128 children aged 16 or below applied for asylum on arrival—when they are often traumatised by conflict in their home countries. They may have suffered torture or bereavement.

Local authorities face many difficulties in catering for their needs—not least because it is impossible to predict their arrival, or their linguistic or cultural background. My own borough of Haringey experienced a number of cases of unaccompanied refugee children and I know that my hon. Friends the Members for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) and for Islington, North have had similar experiences of these cases.

Such considerations led to a certain amount of cross-party support for a panel of advocates with statutory responsibilities for befriending children who have been through horrific traumas and for ensuring that they receive appropriate and co-ordinated services. That would apply to children living in the community as well as to those in local authority care and would extend to representing a child's interests in the determination of the process.

Right hon. and hon. Members may have read in the The Guardian today a persuasive letter signed by a wide range of children's organisations, including Save the Children Fund, Refugee Council, children's legal centre, Barnardo's and the Association of Directors of Social Services. Many other organisations concerned with children and with refugees also support the proposals.

That letter points out that,

"at the moment, asylum law in the UK makes no distinction between adults and children . . . A small change to the current Asylum Bill would remedy that . . . and would be of great benefit to an extremely vulnerable group of children."

In Committee, amendments were withdrawn because the Government promised to discuss the matter with the Department of Health. Since then, we have heard nothing about the progress of those discussions. I should be grateful if the Home Secretary would tell us how they are progressing; as I am sure he will appreciate, there is a great deal of interest in and support for the proposal on both sides of the House.

It is often said, in the Chamber and elsewhere, that a civilised society should be judged according to the way in which it treats children—not only children who are British citizens, but children who come to this country traumatised, frightened and threatened by what they have seen and experienced elsewhere. That is why our proposal is so important; and that is why it is so invidious even to contemplate fingerprinting children.

8.30 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At least the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) made it clear at the outset that the main purpose of amendment No. 4—the principal amendment in the group—was to remove the requirement for fingerprinting from the Bill altogether. The hon. Gentleman rightly anticipated that we would resist that proposal: we believe that it would largely destroy the measures that we have put together to combat misuse of the asylum system.

Let me begin by addressing the main question: why we have decided that we must take this power to fingerprint applicants. Our straightforward aim is to establish a system whereby we can identify individual applicants. We need to establish the exact identity of people who present themselves—as people frequently do—with no documents at all, or with forged documents, to guard against multiple applications. Such applications may involve the same person applying in several different identities for the purpose of social security fraud—there is a substantial history of that and we have recently been tackling it—or the same person trying repeatedly, with a different story and in a different guise, to obtain entry.

If we are to establish the fair and proper system of assessing each asylum claim that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and I have described, we must first establish the identity of the applicant. Currently, nearly two thirds of asylum seekers at ports arrive either with no documents or with forged documents. In the second quarter of 1992—the latest period for which I have figures—46 per cent. of applicants had no documents at all, 14 per cent. had forged documents and 1 per cent. had mutilated documents. That represents nearly 300 asylum seekers a month arriving in the United Kingdom whose identities could not be satisfactorily established in any objective way.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) gave examples of why that might be. In our debates on the Bill, he has frequently given dramatic examples of escapes by persecuted people who felt the need to destroy their documents on the way. I acknowledge—as has my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State—that such cases can occur. I feel, however, that it is naive in the extreme to believe that nearly half the people who arrive at our ports seeking asylum have arrived there in the circumstances described by the hon. Gentleman. The fact is that the vast majority do not turn up in a particularly distressed condition, having either destroyed the documents in the course of their journey or handed them back to the agent who arranged their provision so that they can be used by another applicant. Given that, for one reason or another, those people have arrived with no documents, it is surely not unreasonable to provide a straightforward, foolproof way of establishing their identity once they are here.

Let me also remind the hon. Gentleman that a majority of applicants for asylum are already living here. They have entered the country on some other basis and, after they have been here for a while, have applied for asylum. Between one third and 50 per cent. of such applicants now present themselves without documents. The hon. Members for Islington, North and for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) have described traumatised people fleeing persecution. Many more people who come here claiming asylum have destroyed their documents—frequently on advice—simply to throw confusion into the system, believing that that will somehow help them to extend their stay here. We need a method of distinguishing the traumatised people seeking asylum from those who have destroyed their documents as a device to extend the time that dealing with their claim will take, and fingerprinting is the most straightforward method.

Mr. Corbyn: Does not the Home Secretary accept that people destroy documents, or try to hide their identities, because if it is known to the authorities that they have sought asylum in certain countries, their families are liable to be taken into custody and may be imprisoned or badly treated?

Will the Home Secretary also concede that the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987, which he supported, encouraged the use of agents and the spiv culture because of the fines that it imposed on airlines? Is not that Act the main cause of the problem—although it recognised the need for people to use forged documents in the first place?

Mr. Clarke: We never disclose to the country from which an applicant has come that the applicant has made an asylum application, precisely to avoid reprisals in that country. It may be that a small proportion of those who destroy documents—for some reason best known to themselves—fear that somehow the news of their applications will get back to their own country, although I do not know why they should believe that.

Although we cannot specify the exact figures, I think that the cases cited by the hon. Gentleman represent a small minority. We all know that people who come here in the knowledge that they have no grounds for entry according to the rules are frequently advised to destroy their documents on the journey and to leave the aeroplane or port saying that they are asylum seekers in order to cause confusion and delay in this country. We also have considerable experience of multiple applications—by which I mean either the same person seeking asylum in several different identities to substantiate several social security claims, or the same applicant presenting himself with a variety of identities and a variety of stories.

At present, 1,600 cases of multiple application are under investigation. So far, 11 convictions have been obtained for fraud against the Department of Social Security. In one investigation, 15 individuals were found to have used 76 identities and to have obtained overpayment of £80,000 in benefits. The main defendant pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to four years' imprisonment. In another investigation, five individuals were found to have used 19 identities and to have obtained overpayment of £50,000. One individual, with his wife and two children, has been identified as the subject of no fewer than 54 separate files in various identities. I think that that establishes sufficient reason—even on the ground of social security abuse alone—for wanting to establish specific identities.

The Opposition propose no measures to protect against multiple applications. They propose to allow people to present themselves with no identity checks of any validity. Internationalism has become important. Under the Dublin convention, we have agreed that asylum applications will be dealt with by the country to which the first application is made. There is plenty of experience of people presenting themselves to different countries with different identities trying to establish different claims. Our partner countries in the European Community, all of which have the same civilised values as ourselves towards asylum applications under the Geneva convention, are moving towards fingerprinting.

All Community countries, except Ireland, have the power to take fingerprints. France introduced a system of fingerprinting all asylum applicants in January 1990. When France introduced its system it found initially that almost a fifth of the applications involved false identities. When the Dutch introduced a fingerprinting system they found that 10 per cent. of the applications were multiple applications. The Opposition ignore all that. All that they talk about are traumatised people arriving at our ports, terrified of the country from which they come.

We have already established that 19 out of 20 applications in this country turn out not to be well founded when investigations are made. I have now revealed that a fifth of French applications for asylum are made under a false identity and that 10 per cent. of the Dutch applications are multiple applications. What protection do the Opposition urge against that? None whatsoever. They argue that we should not have this protection because the very fact of taking fingerprints is, somehow, criminalising, an argument with which my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) dealt very adequately.

Mr. Allen: Oh, dear. We have just heard the press release that has been drafted for The Sun and other newspapers tomorrow. The minuscule percentage of people whom the Secretary of State quoted as defrauding social security have been discovered under a system that does not use fingerprints. The question that I have for the Secretary of State, who is a reasonable man, is this: let him imagine that he is being politically persecuted and is fleeing for his life with his family and that to get out of the country he must obtain forged documents, perhaps from dubious sources, and that other members of his family have perhaps acquired dubious documents. What would the Secretary of State then do on the aeroplane?

Mr. Clarke: In such a case, I believe that under our proposed system we would grant that person political asylum.

Mr. Allen: Would the Secretary of State destroy the documents?

Mr. Clarke: No, I would not. I know that to destroy the documents would be of no earthly assistance in obtaining asylum and would add nothing to my story. I believe that our system identifies those people and that they would be given political asylum. I am sure that occasionally we make mistakes, but the circumstances in which such people are returned to a country where they face persecution are few and far between. I have not encountered one such case during my comparatively brief period as Home Secretary. They are not typical cases. I know that there are campaigns when such cases arise. I well remember the Sri Lankan who was holed up in a Manchester church. Although he was passionately believed in by those who campaigned on his behalf, his case turned out to be total nonsense.

The fact is that 19 out of 20 applications turn out not to fall within the description just given by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North. We have had cases of multiple applications. There have been spectacular frauds of the kind that I have just described. Other countries with the same values as ourselves which have introduced fingerprinting have discovered almost straight away that there have been large numbers of false and multiple applications.

What defence do the Opposition offer against that? None whatsoever. They continue to produce arguments as though 100 per cent. of those arriving here are fleeing from dictatorships and that they are in a traumatised state when they arrive. I remind the hon. Gentleman that three quarters of them have not arrived from anywhere. They are living here when they make the application.

8.45 pm

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): The person to whom my right hon. and learned Friend referred was holed up in a Manchester church with the full authority of the bishop of Manchester and the curate. The curate went back to Sri Lanka with that person and found that there was no problem whatsoever. When he arrived in Sri Lanka the only people who met that person were members of the press—nobody else. He had no difficulties whatsoever.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am sure that, like me, she does not traduce the sincerely held views of those who supported that man at the time. I encountered some of them. They all believed profoundly that they were protecting this man against persecution. What they proved guilty of was naivety in the extreme, a naivety that is frequently repeated by Opposition Members. They have conjured up for themselves this picture of men, women and children arriving here after torture in a traumatised and shocked state. They refuse to take the slightest notice of what we say: that three quarters of those people are already living here and that they said that they were visitors or students before they even made their application. They take not the slightest notice of the evidence we have of multiple applications and fraud, although they concede that there are unpleasant agents who batten on to these people and tell them that they can get them here, if they take advice about how to make an asylum application. They take not the slightest notice of experience in other countries where fingerprinting has been introduced and has exposed multiple applications. They offer no defence against abuse. They present a naive and emotional picture of the applicants and then resist the procedures that we put forward to protect this country against fraud.

It is said that fingerprinting is wrong because it means that people are accused of having committed a criminal offence. It does not mean that, unless that is what they are told. Children in particular will not think that, unless someone has told them so, which encourages them to believe it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley rightly said, there can be few people in this House who have not given fingerprints at some stage in their lives. I have; my hon. Friend has. It depends for what purposes the fingerprints are asked. In this case it is perfectly clear to almost all the applicants that they are not being asked for fingerprints because they are being accused of a criminal offence but that it is in order to establish their identity when they—as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North says, for good reasons—have destroyed every other proof that they might have of who they are and where they come from. A system without any identity check has been proved to be porous in the extreme and not valid.

It is just possible that people will believe that they are being accused of a criminal offence. Therefore, we propose to present each applicant with a written notice explaining that they are not being singled out and that this is a routine fingerprinting test to establish identity and does not involve any allegation of crime. Without there being any serious suggestion as to how else to identify individual applicants and stop them turning up again using another name, or to stop them applying to every other country in Europe for asylum, using a different story, or to stop them making 10 claims so that they can have the benefit of 10 social security benefit entitlements, I believe that our system is the right one to adopt. The Opposition will not face up to the fact that there are such people who bedevil the system for genuine asylum seekers who will benefit, if we get rid of all this nonsense and have a practical system that identifies who they are.

Mr. Madden: What puzzles me and a number of other hon. Members is why the Home Secretary wishes to extend the identification to fingerprinting when his Administration introduced what are called standard acknowledgment letters that include photographs and details of each asylum applicant, including their dependants. That is an adequate safeguard against social security fraud and multiple applications for political asylum. Why is the Home Secretary so enthusiastic about going down the fingerprinting route? I suspect that he gave the game away when he said that this had already been agreed as a general policy throughout the European Community. That I think is the truth. Why on earth does he not admit it?

Mr. Clarke: We are under no Community obligation, if that is what the hon. Gentleman thinks. We are following a practice that other European countries have followed, bar one. It is the only foolproof way of establishing identity. Photographs are not so foolproof. I have just returned from a visit to our entry clearance officers in the Indian subcontinent. I have seen at first hand the way in which applications for entry clearance or visitors' visas are being handled. It is a pity that more people cannot see the process. The criticisms and fears that have been expressed about the way in which applications are handled would be considerably allayed if people could see the professionalism and care with which they are entertained.

I saw cases of multiple applications. I saw a case of a man who undoubtedly was applying under the second identity that he had used in the past two to three years to find a fresh basis for settlement in the United Kingdom. One of the bases with which he was confronted was his photograph. The man in the photograph certainly looked like the same man to me and it looked like the same man to the clearance officer. The man said that it was his brother, thereby seeking to disclaim the close resemblance between the man in the photograph and himself. Subsequent questioning about his relationship with his brother and everything else rapidly revealed that he was talking a lot of nonsense. He was not able to answer the questions in a way which correlated with the answers that his so-called brother had given about the family.

Such cases do occur. A photograph is not an adequate defence. Fingerprints are straightforward and foolproof. It is not the case that the very act of taking fingerprints in all circumstances implies an accusation of crime. That argument is used by Opposition Members, but they do not do themselves credit when they use it.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that most people, certainly my constituents who have read about these matters in the newspapers, would be appalled by cases such as those listed by my right hon. and learned Friend of people who have made multiple applications so that they can defraud social security, which costs the country thousands of pounds? Most people would wholeheartedly welcome the measures being taken by the Government to prevent such fraud from taking place in the future. The Government's measures will have the wholehearted support of the country.

Mr. Clarke: I do. I do not think that the support is confined, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North always tries to make out, to the redneck reactionaries in the United Kingdom.

Opposition Members pay lip service to the view. Of course, they are against bogus and multiple applications. I doubt whether any Opposition Member would defend somebody who enters the United Kingdom with 15 different identities and makes 15 different social security claims. Opposition Members say all the right things about such applications because they know that the view is held not just by shell-back reactionaries. All sensible members of the public know that we should take steps against multiple applications and social security fraud.

Every time the Government table a proposition to deal with the matter, Opposition Members are against it. They retreat into a Mickey Mouse, make-believe world in which everybody who applies for asylum in the United Kingdom is a traumatised victim of torture who arrives trembling on our shores. In so far as traumatised victims of torture arrive on our shores, we give them political asylum. Opposition Members should face up to the common sense of having a system which protects us against other people.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: Before I give way I shall emphasise the extent to which the Government have tabled amendments to meet some of the fears expressed, although we think that those fears are exaggerated.

Amendment No. 29 clarifies the classes of person who will be authorised to take the fingerprints of asylum seekers and their dependants. The powers will normally be exercised by civil servants in the asylum division of the Home Office or by immigration officers at ports. In some circumstances it may be necessary for the fingerprints to be taken by a police officer or prison officer. The wording in the amendment, makes it clear that only Home Office civil servants will be so authorised, occasionally together with police or prison officers.

"officer of the Secretary of State authorised for the purposes of this section"

We do not anticipate having to fingerprint routinely every child. However, there is no particular reason why a child of 16 or younger should not be involved in somebody else's fraud plan. Indeed, children are frequently involved in such plans. It is just as important to establish the identity of children who may otherwise be presented under a variety of different identities. If we simply excluded the fingerprinting of all people under the age of 16, as amendment No. 5 suggests, there would be the danger of deciding the exact age of a child, which could create difficulties in some cases in which there is no documentation. In some cases children will be presented in multiple identities with different fraudulent claims.

We are persuaded that it should normally be necessary for somebody to be present to protect the child if he or she becomes frightened or to give some independent oversight of what is occurring. Hence, we have tabled amendment No. 30 to meet some of the concerns expressed in Committee.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department undertook to consider including in the Bill a requirement for an independent person to be present when a child is fingerprinted. Amendment No. 30 incorporates such a requirement. The amendment is drawn in wider terms than the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland would like and an alternative amendment specifies rather more tightly the adult who should be present when a child is fingerprinted.

I accept that normally the child should be accompanied by the parents or guardian or, when a child is unaccompanied, a local authority social worker or a person from the refugee legal centre or some other suitable voluntary body. If such a requirement is prescribed tightly in the legislation, as the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland would wish, the effect could be that on occasions it will be difficult to give effect to the requirement or it will cause more delay while someone in that category was obtained. A suitable independent volunteer may be required on occasions, outside any tight definition that we could devise. Therefore, we prefer the wording set out in amendment No. 30.

In this debate hon. Members have expressed concern about multiple applications and possible abuse of the system, but those who oppose the Government have not tabled any serious proposals of their own. Fingerprinting is a straightforward way of ensuring that we know the identity of each applicant. The applicant can then have the case fairly and properly considered. No one has any reason to fear adverse consequences as a result of being fingerprinted by our officials in the United Kingdom when they seek asylum. I ask the House to support the amendments that the Government have tabled and to resist amendment No. 4 and the other amendments tabled by Opposition Members.

Mr. Corbyn: With the leave of the House, I would like to say that the Home Secretary has failed to answer two questions. He has failed to say whether the Bill is likely to lead to the extension of the use of fingerprinting to, in his words, deal with social security frauds. All the cases of multiple applications and so on which the Home Secretary has quoted at length have all been discovered without the use of fingerprints. They have been discovered only by the use of photographic evidence which is available at present on the standard acknowledgement form, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) said.

Secondly, the Home Secretary referred in a jocular fashion along with several of his hon. Friends to the case of Viraj Mendis. Many Opposition Members strongly supported his case at the time. He sought asylum in the Church of the Ascension in Manchester.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: You were wrong.

Mr. Corbyn: We were not wrong, with respect to the hon. Lady. We were correct and honest at the time and we remain so.

Mr. Mendis spent 16 years in this country. He was eventually bundled out by the most enormous police phalanx I have ever seen in my life. He was dragged out of a church in the process. He spent a year in Sri Lanka. During that time he had to change his identity every several days. He had to go from hiding place to hiding place. His mother's house was surrounded by—[Interruption.] I do not know why the Under-Secretary finds this so amusing. Mr. Mendis' mother's house was surrounded by jeeploads of armed police asking for him and looking for him. He managed to escape and change his identity yet again. He sought another place of safety and sanctuary in another part of Sri Lanka.

Mr. Mendis spent a year of absolute nightmare. The reason why he survived the death squads in Sri Lanka was that he had international support and friends in Sri Lanka. Six people went from Britain specifically to look after him in Sri Lanka during that year. If he was not in any danger whatever, why were so many people and organisations in Britain and in Europe so prepared to support his case? He has now been given permission to live in Germany. Yet he was refused asylum by the British Government.

The Minister should be ashamed of himself. If he thinks that it was correct to deport Viraj Mendis from Britain, perhaps he will have the courtesy to read the information that Viraj Mendis has provided of his experiences during that year in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Bernie Grant: The Home Secretary has not answered the points that have been raised by Opposition Members. He stated that in any event three quarters of applications for asylum are from people who are already in Britain as either visitors or students. If that is the case, presumably their identities have been established because they are living in Britain and attending colleges and so on. They are here legally. I do not understand how the Home Secretary can give that reason to support his case.

If the Home Secretary now believes that photographic evidence is not enough to support a case, whether for asylum or anything else, is he saying that people who provide photographic evidence to entry clearance officers to enter Britain as visitors or to settle will be required to be fingerprinted? That is obviously the import of what he says. I wish that the Home Secretary would answer that point. If photographic or other evidence is not sufficient to support the case of an asylum seeker, why should it be sufficient to support a case for settlement or to visit Britain?

Mr. Clarke: Photographic evidence in itself is not always conclusive. I am not sure what photographic evidence we are talking about. Obviously, a photograph is one proof of identity, but if one has a database, it is extremely difficult to check every photograph to discover multiple applications. The entry clearance officers in Delhi whom I visited had turned up this chap's previous application. However, it is not always easy to do so. If one is lucky, sometimes it is possible to do so.

It is the intention that eventually all applicants for asylum will have given their fingerprints so that we have a quick and foolproof way of establishing their identity. Any future applications by that individual will be dealt with in the light of the previous application. I see nothing wrong with that. As we all know, fingerprints are a foolproof way of establishing identity. It merely means that every applicant will apply only once. Whatever name applicants choose to give, we shall have some previous record of the basis on which they applied before.

A tremendous amount of froth has been worked up about fingerprinting by Opposition Members, but they are silent about how we should protect against multiple applications, which plainly take place on quite a scale. In the absence of any explanation of what the Opposition would do, I invite the House to reject their various proposals.

Amendment negatived.

Amendments made: No. 29, in page 1, line 21, leave out from beginning to 'may' in line 22 and insert

"an 'authorised person', that is to say, an immigration officer, constable, prison officer or officer of the Secretary of State authorised for the purposes of this section".

No. 30, in page 2, line 3, at end insert

"but in the exercise of the power conferred by paragraph (a) of that subsection, fingerprints shall not be taken from a person under the age of sixteen except in the presence of a person of full age who is not an authorised person".

No. 31, in page 2, line 44, after 'section', insert '(a)'.

No. 32, in page 2, line 45, at end add 'and

(b) "dependant", in relation to the claimant, means a person—

(i) who is his spouse or a child of his under the age of eighteen; and

(ii) who has neither a right of abode in the United Kingdom nor indefinite leave under the 1971 Act to enter or remain in the United Kingdom'.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

HOUSING OF ASYLUM-SEEKERS AND THEIR DEPENDANTS

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 3, line 42, at end insert—

'(6) "Dependant" in this section or section 5 does not include a person who has leave to be in the United Kingdom other than as an asylum seeker or a person who has been granted political asylum, or who is a United Kingdom citizen.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 33.

Mr. Gerrard: The amendment deals with the housing clauses and in particular the definition of who is a dependant of an asylum seeker. The housing clauses refer to not only asylum seekers but their dependants. I welcome the Government amendment which is similar to my amendment but I suggest that its scope is not as wide as that of my amendment. I shall return to that later.

It is important to clarify exactly who is to be treated as a dependant as such people will fall within the scope of the Bill. While it may be a minor point in terms of the scope of the Bill and it is certainly minor in terms of clauses 4 and 5, it is something that we need to clarify.

We still object in principle to clauses 4 and 5, which deal with housing and we believe that it is wrong to single out one group of people for inferior status and treatment when they apply for local authority housing. Harsher criteria will be applied to determining their applications. They will be eligible only for temporary housing and, once their asylum status is determined, they will have to reapply and be reassessed, which does not apply to other applicants. We argue that that is unnecessary and that it is based on, at best, a misunderstanding of the way in which the homelessness legislation works.

At the moment people have to overcome three hurdles and must prove: first that they are homeless; secondly that they are in priority need; and thirdly that they are not intentionally homeless. The latter is particularly relevant to someone who comes to a local authority from another area.

As it stands, the legislation will deal with intentional homelessness. I believe, and I think that my hon. Friends would agree, that the housing provisions are based on the myth that homeless people, and asylum seekers and their dependants, are responsible for the present housing and homelessness crisis. However, that crisis is entirely due to lack of investment. Although resources may be short, at least local authorities are operating a system which does not discriminate against one type of applicant.

Local authorities should not have any part in asylum control and, inevitably, if they are drawn into it, people who apply as homeless at the housing department will be treated differently if their name is not English or if their face is black. Those people will be asked to produce passports and to prove that they are eligible for rehousing because they are homeless.

The removal of the reference to dependants will at least remove some people from the group that will receive inferior treatment. As the Bill is worded, it applies equally to asylum seekers or to anyone who is classed as a dependant of an asylum seeker. People who have permanent right of residence in this country may become dependants of asylum seekers. For example, it is conceivable that someone might marry an asylum seeker and thus become a dependant—they would certainly then be regarded as such by the Department of Social Security. The Government accept that asylum seekers may have been in this country legitimately for some years before applying for asylum and so it is feasible that that could happen. As the Bill is worded, anyone who becomes a dependant of an asylum seeker will lose his rights and we must safeguard against that.

Perhaps the Minister could clarify the point of Government amendment No. 33 and the differences between it and amendment No. 7. The Government amendment applies only to people who have neither a right of abode nor indefinite leave under the Immigration Act 1971 to enter or to remain in the United Kingdom. As a result, someone who might well have been in the country for some years and have been given exceptional leave to remain by the Government—exceptional leave which could be renewed in due course and which would often become indefinite leave—will not be covered by the Bill.

They may still be treated as a dependant even though they have been in the country for a number of years and have leave to remain. Amendment No. 33 is narrower than amendment No. 7, which seeks to limit the effects of the clause to deal with asylum seekers only.

Ideally, we should like the clauses relating to housing removed altogether, but at the very least it is important that people who have rights of residence—people who have had rights to housing—should not lose them simply because they become the dependant of an asylum seeker.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I should like to deal first with amendment No. 33 because that is the one on which the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) sought clarification. That amendment defines "dependant" of an asylum seeker for the purpose of the housing provisions of the Bill in the same way as amendment No. 32 defined "dependant" for the purposes of fingerprinting powers—that is as a spouse or child under 18 who does not have the right of abode or indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom.

Amendment No. 7, which relates only to the housing provisions of the Bill, like amendment No. 33, would exclude from the definition of dependant anyone who had a limited leave, as well as those who have indefinite leave. In response to the question posed by the hon. Gentleman, the exclusion relating to those with limited leave would avoid the situation that could arise if, for example, a woman obtained leave to enter as a visitor and her husband then arrived to claim asylum. It is right that a person in that position should be treated as a dependant.

For those reasons I urge the House to support amendment No. 33 but to reject amendment No. 7.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 33, in clause 5, page 4, line 18, at end insert—

'( ) In relation to an asylum-seeker, "dependant" means a person—

(a) who is his spouse or a child of his under the age of eighteen; and

(b) who has neither a right of abode in the United Kingdom nor indefinite leave under the 1971 Act to enter or remain in the United Kingdom.'.—[Mr. Charles Wardle.]

Clause 6

CURTAILMENT OF LEAVE TO ENTER OR REMAIN

Mr. Charles Wardle: I beg to move amendment No. 34, in page 5, line 7, leave out 'rejected' and insert 'given to the person notice in writing of his rejection of'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment No. 35, amendment No. 8, in page 5, line 8, after 'person', insert 'at the same time as the notice of refusal'.

Amendment No. 9, in page 5, line 23, after 'order', insert 'only if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the applicant will not comply with restrictions placed on him to report to an immigration officer at an appointed time;'.

Amendment No. 10, in page 5, line 26, at end insert—

'(5) Any decision to detain and the grounds therefor must be given to the person detained, in writing in a language which he understands.'.

Mr. Wardle: The amendments require that if the power to curtail a leave under clause 6 is exercised, the notice of curtailment must be served at the same time as the notice refusing the asylum application. I am pleased to repeat the assurance that I gave to the Committee that curtailment of leave will not automatically follow refusal of an asylum claim. Each case will be considered on its merits.

The key question will be whether the asylum application has raised doubts about the continuing entitlement of the person to stay in this country under the immigration rules. When it is decided at the time the asylum claim is determined that a person no longer qualifies to remain here the intention has always been that the notices should be served simultaneously: the person would be notified of the refusal of his claim, the curtailment of his leave, and the decision to make a deportation order against him. He would then be entitled to appeal to a special adjudicator against the deportation decision. Where the decision is not taken at the time the asylum application is refused, we accept that it would be wrong to leave the person uncertain as to his status in this country: for example, it would be unfair to leave a student pursuing long-term studies in suspense as to whether his leave was to be curtailed at some later date. Clarification was sought in Committee about that and I am happy to give it. Amendments Nos. 34 and 35 therefore make clear the way in which the powers should be operated and I commend them to the House.

Amendment No. 9 would provide that a person could be detained only if there were reasonable grounds for assuming he would not comply with other restrictions requiring him to report to an immigration officer. This is already our practice when considering detention in immigration cases generally. It will continue to be so under the specific power in clause 6. We will exercise the power to detain only if we do not think that the person would keep in touch; and that a failure to detain would frustrate our intention to enforce departure.

Detention is not undertaken lightly. As well as having an obvious impact on the individual concerned, it is also costly and it is generally undesirable for the Department to tie up limited detention accommodation unnecessarily. However, it must remain an option for those—relatively few—cases where we have reason to believe that an applicant will not co-operate or comply with other restrictions that might be placed on him.

Amendment No. 10 provides that a person who is to be detained should be supplied with the reasons in writing and in a language that he understands. Few would disagree with the view that applicants should be informed about the processes affecting them, particularly where a matter as serious as detention is concerned. However, I am not convinced that such a requirement needs to be placed on the face of the Bill.

Applicants who are to be detained will be notified in person by the detaining immigration officer in a language that they can understand and via an interpreter if necessary. We are considering what written information should be given to detainees to reflect the procedures that will affect them.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister amplify the question of the translation of information to be given to people being interviewed? The trained officers often have no access to a sufficient number of interpreters who can translate into the appropriate languages. When one asks for more unusual dialects or languages, the Home Office is unable to assist. What progress has been made in that matter? During the last round of Home Office questions, the Minister promised progress.

Mr. Wardle: That point will arise under a later set of amendments. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are now discussing information on the intention to detain. That will be available in a limited number of languages. It is impracticable to expect notices to be available in every conceivable language, but every attempt will be made to explain what is happening to individuals concerned in those relatively few cases. When we discuss amendments Nos. 22, 26 and 27, I shall be pleased to comment a little further on the question of interpreters if the hon. Gentleman presses me.

I think that further written information is available in about 10 languages in the immigration detention accommodation and staff are available to deal with detainees' inquiries.

[Mr. Wardle]

For those reasons, I urge the House to support amendments Nos. 34 and 35 and to reject the other amendments grouped with them.

Mr. Fraser: The Government amendments have met the point that I raised in amendment No. 8. Although they have not amended the Bill, the Minister has given assurances, so we shall not take the matter further. As we cannot vote against the clause, may I say that we are deeply concerned about the principle of curtailment of leave because it can discourage an application for political asylum. It is particularly severe when a student who may be doing a three-year degree course is considering whether to make an application, because the effect of applying for asylum if conditions change in the student's home country may lead not only to a refusal but to the student being returned to the country from which he appealed for safety. However, I made that point in Committee and we do not wish to divide on the matter.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 35, in page 5, line 8, after 'person', insert

'concurrently with the notice under paragraph (b) above'—[Mr. Charles Wardle.]

Appeals to special adjudicator

Mr. Fraser: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 5, line 30, leave out 'in consequence of the refusal.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take amendment No. 12, in page 5, line 47, at end insert—

'( ) Nothing in section 15(5) of the 1971 Act shall be taken to prevent a person appealing against a refusal to revoke a deportation order under the preceding subsection where that person remains in the United Kingdom.'.

Mr. Fraser: The amendment may seem to make a trivial point, but we propose to leave out the words because the appeal should be based on whatever grounds are available rather than simply on the consequence of the approval. I cannot understand why it is necessary for those words to appear in the Bill as they seem to restrict the right to appeal. The Minister may have an explanation. If he assures us that they do not inhibit the appeal, then so be it.

"in consequence of the refusal"

Amendment No. 12 was raised in Committee. As the Minister knows, section 15 of the Immigration Act 1971 prevents an appeal against a revocation of a deportation order while the appellant is in the United Kingdom. The Minister promised to ensure that the law was amended so that, if the application for revocation of the deportation order could be made to raise a political asylum matter under the convention, section 15 of the 1971 Act would not prevent that application from being made. Unless it was intended for the issue to be covered by Government new clause 6, it is still not clear to us how an application for revocation can be made while a person remains in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Amendment No. 11 is unnecessary since removal is only at issue following a refusal. The wording of the current draft thus accurately and clearly reflects the appeal rights of a person who has been refused leave to enter.

Amendment No. 12 appears to reflect misunderstanding about the way in which the new rights of appeal against a deportation decision for asylum seekers will work. I am grateful for the opportunity to clarify the issues raised by the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser).

Clause 7(3) confers a right of appeal against a decision to make a deportation order under section 3(5) of the 1971 Act. It also confers a right of appeal against a refusal to revoke a deportation order which has already been made, either under section 3(5) or, on the recommendation of a court, under section 3(6). Unlike the equivalent provision in the 1971 Act, there is no requirement in the Bill that an appeal against a refusal to revoke a deportation order should be made from abroad. The only restriction is that a person may not bring an appeal against a refusal to revoke a deportation order if he has already appealed under clause 7 against the decision to make the order.

Amendment No. 12 seeks to provide that nothing in section 15(5) of the 1971 Act shall prevent an appeal under clause 7 against a refusal to revoke a deportation order being made while the person is still in this country. But the key words of section 15(5) are:

"A person shall not be entitled to appeal under this section against a refusal to revoke a deportation order so long as he is in the United Kingdom".

The restriction clearly applies only to appeals under section 15 of the 1971 Act, not to appeals under clause 7 of the Bill.

Therefore, I trust that, on reflection, the hon. Member for Norwood will accept that both amendments are unnecessary, and I urge the House to reject them.

Mr. Fraser: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Appeals from Immigration Appeal Tribunal

Amendment proposed: No. 13, in page 6, line 22, after 'law' insert 'or fact'.—[Mr. Allen.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 14, in page 6, leave out lines 23 to 25.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I am sorry for my delay, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the hours have been dragging on and I get the strong impression from the helpful hint of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) that I may deal with the amendments fairly swiftly.

Both amendments seek to widen the scope of clause 8. In respect of amendment No. 13, the final tier of appeal in immigration and asylum matters from the immigration appeal tribunal to the Court of Appeal is intended only for the resolution of questions of law. Questions of fact should already have been resolved by the appeal structure leading up to this tribunal. Asylum claims are initially decided on behalf of the Secretary of State by officers of the asylum division. Appeals against the initial decisions can be made on questions of either fact or law to a special adjudicator. Provision is made for appeals, with leave, from the special adjudicator's determination to the tribunal on questions of either fact or law. As a matter of general practice, the Court of Appeal does not usually interfere with a tribunal's findings of fact, particularly where such findings turn on which witnesses are to be believed or the weight to be attached to particular evidence. I can see no reason to make an exception to this practice in the situation covered by clause 8.

With regard to amendment No. 14, a leave requirement is routinely provided for in the case of appeals to the Court of Appeal from courts, such as the county courts, and tribunals, such as the employment appeal tribunal. I can see no reason why a special exception should be made in the present case. In addition, the absence of a leave requirement would be likely to result in an unacceptably large number of unmeritorious appeals having to be heard by the Court of Appeal, thereby causing significant delays in those courts and consequent hardship for litigants.

For those reasons, I urge the House to reject the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 9

VISITORS, SHORT-TERM AND PROSPECTIVE STUDENTS AND THEIR DEPENDANTS

Mr. Allen: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 6, line 36, leave out from line 36 to line 5 on page 7.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 16, in clause 10, page 7, leave out lines 6 to 33, and Government amendments Nos. 36 to 39.

Mr. Allen: It is hard to choose the most obnoxious clause in this Bill, but I suppose that this one would get my vote. In its previous incarnation this Bill was known as the Asylum Bill; it has now turned into the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill. Why "Immigration"? My colleagues and I do not believe that immigration matters have any place in an asylum Bill. If the Government were serious about helping people whose desperate plight we outlined so vividly in Committee, they would have introduced measures that related only to political asylum. The Government threw in immigration only in order to make what they see as political capital out of the Bill. This looks more like a ploy to assist the Secretary of State's campaign for the leadership of the Conservative party than a conscious effort to help people seeking political asylum or wanting to visit relatives and friends in this country.

This deliberate confusion is a smokescreen to sell the idea which the Secretary of State tried to sell in his wild contribution on fingerprinting—that asylum seeking is somehow linked to the mass immigration policies pursued 30 years ago. He tried to raise the spectre of mass immigration. That pre-election scare is also part of the new ideology which the Secretary of State is using to improve his image with the right wing of the Conservative party.

What worries me most about the Secretary of State's cavalier attitude to civil liberties, in fingerprinting and other matters, is that certain fundamental principles which have long been part of British law are being undermined because there is seen to be political advantage in that. I am thinking particularly of the principle of natural justice. In almost every other walk of life there is a right of appeal. Even a convicted murderer has a right of appeal. A social security claimant who believes that his claim has been wrongly assessed has such a right. For all systems of administration this right offers the possibility of redress when a decision has been wrongly taken. This basic tenet of natural justice has survived intact for several hundred years—until the advent of this Government.

It is a dangerous step to throw away such a principle of natural justice. Today, the right of appeal for people refused applications for visitors visas is being dispensed with. What group will be the next to lose their right of appeal? Let us not forget that this is not a little-used appeal system. Only last year, 1,700 successful appeals were heard from the Indian sub-continent. If a similar number are unjustly refused next year, however, they will not have the chance to put the matter right by appeal because their right to do so will have been abolished. It is argued that many more might have lodged successful appeals had they wished to pursue them.

As the Secretary of State pointed out, in his usual callous manner, at the press conference that launched this Bill, there is no point in giving these people the right of appeal as many of them have now lost their reason for coming to this country because of delays. He took an almost perverse pride in the fact that the weddings, funerals, christenings or religious ceremonies which had provided the original reasons for coming had now taken place—so why give these people the right of appeal? That was the Minister's attitude when he should have been admitting that officers in his charge continually make wrong judgments that require to be put right on appeal. He almost took pride in saying that there was no need for appeals.

9.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) hit the nail on the head when he spoke about the European dimension. In the harmonisation process, Britain seeks to become the lowest common denominator in the Community. Britain still retains a right of appeal which does not exist in many other countries. In seeking the abolition of the right to have a visitor's visa refusal heard again the Secretary of State is lowering to European level one of the few areas of immigration law in which Britain can take some pride.

Thousands of unjustified refusals are being brought to light and corrected by the appeals system and only Conservatives would think that the answer is to abolish the appeals system rather than to find out why so many appeals go wrong and why so many unjust decisions are taken in the first place. There is a 20 per cent. failure rate by the civil servants. What an outcry there would be if one in five income tax assessments and one in five social security applications were wrong. The right of appeal has brought the problem to light, and rather than abolishing appeals the Secretary of State should find out why the system allows so many wrong decisions to be made in the first place.

We shall later discuss the better training and supervision that is required for officials who take the decisions. Once again it is a question of openness versus secrecy and the way that the Government have pushed the Bill through Committee. When the Trevi group was meeting in the Queen Elizabeth conference centre the Committee was in session. The Committee was not informed about what was going on until we demanded papers from the Trevi meeting. It was almost as if the Trevi group had a life of its own and did not need to worry about what Parliament was deciding.

An example of that is the way in which immigration officers are virtually immune from having their responsibilities scrutinised in this place. Despite my best efforts and those of my hon. Friends, the immigration officers' training manual is not open to public view. On the day that we were debating that and the Trevi group were meeting we were told that there would be a European manual on immigration officers' practice and that it would be publicly available. However, the British manual is not to be seen.

There is no rational justification for removal of the right of appeal against an administrative decision. It will give unfettered powers to civil servants and immigration officials and can only lead to worse decisions since they will not be subject to review by an independent authority. That is exemplified by experience. When the courts decided in 1976 that there was no right of appeal against a refusal to vary leave if the application was made late, more late applications were refused. When the Immigration Act 1988 removed the right of appeal on the merits of people threatened with deportation who had been in the United Kingdom for less than seven years, the number of deportation decisions shot up from 863 in 1987 to 3,440 in 1991. The removal of the right of appeal can therefore be expected to lead to a rise in the number of refusals.

Many refused visitors do not appeal and, of those who do, many more do not pursue their case after the initial anger and humiliation and the need to understand have faded. That makes it clear that the number of people who win such appeals is only a small percentage of those refused wrongly and unjustly. Many more would have been successful had they pursued their case or kept in touch with their representatives and provided documents and information as necessary. There is room for reform of the immigration appeals system to ensure that all cases are heard and decisions are reached more speedily, but this should not be at the expense of justice.

The Home Office reacted to the widespread criticism of this part of the Bill—in Committee and elsewhere—by issuing a press release on 8 December 1992 when the Minister made his response to the Committee. I will not delay the House by describing the pantomime in Committee, when the Minister as the dame was dragged, feigning reluctance, to announce one or two supposed concessions. As I hope to demonstrate, the concessions amounted to nothing.

The Government's response does not meet the main concerns about the loss of the right of appeal. The main proposal is that refused visitors should receive a far more detailed refusal notice, setting out the reasons why a visa had been refused. This might help to explain the thought processes of the entry clearance officer dealing with the case, but may also be intended to pre-empt any application for judicial review of decisions—the only method of challenge remaining open. It was interesting to hear Lord Justice Taylor's remark, in the Dimbleby lecture, that if the due process is not gone through one will necessarily end up with more and more judicial reviews. If the intention is to speed up the process, the exact opposite may occur.

The press release also stated that a previous refusal would not prejudice any subsequent applications. This should be a matter of course. Every application should be considered on its own merits, but it is known that this is not the case. The standard entry application form asks, in question 19:

"Have you ever been refused a visa or entry clearance at a UK diplomatic mission or Post?"

It then asks people to complete an additional form if they have been refused. It is clear that the purpose of the question is to enable the entry clearance officer to find any previous papers about the earlier application and to compare them with the present one. It is not unknown for people to be asked whether anything has changed since the previous application and, if they say that it has not, for the application to be refused.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Does my hon. Friend agree that the so-called concession that the Under-Secretary announced in Committee, and to which my hon. Friend referred, is only what is happening at the moment? Any constituent can go to his Member of Parliament, who writes to the Foreign Office and gets a detailed response. There is nothing new here.

Mr. Allen: A number of practices set out by the Minister in his press release are already standard. Equally, one does not need an asylum Bill to make the amendments that the Minister announced in Committee. If he wishes to make those amendments, they can be done easily, and with the agreement of many hon. Members on both sides of the House, provided that they are not a substitute for the right of appeal, which is the backdrop for all these matters.

The press release issued by the Minister also sets out the other courses of action that are open to would-be visitors, and my hon. Friends have referred to them. The Home Office also states that the Foreign Office will revise its information leaflets for visitors and will consider a leaflet for sponsors. At present the leaflets are produced only in English and do not explain the pitfalls of immigration rules. It is our view that any leaflet produced should be translated into appropriate languages and should be accessible. They should be widely available, and not only on request, at British posts.

Most seriously, the Home Office press release is exclusively about visitors and visas. It does not mention the other forms of entry clearance, entry certificates, letters of consent, refusals at ports of entry of people who do not require visas or students or prospective students.

The Minister said in Committee that he meant to include all forms of entry clearance, but he said nothing about people who do not require prior entry clearance who are refused at a British port or airport. If the statements in the leaflets do not apply to port refusals, they amount to a further attempt to introduce a universal visa requirement through the back door. If they do not apply to students, there is no justification for this further discrimination against them. It is important that the Home Office provides further clarification.

The clause will hit hard British families—black British families, Asian British families and other British families whose only crime will be the wish to see relatives—parents and grandparents, for example—on occasions such as holidays, religious ceremonies, marriages, christenings and funerals. It is one of the worst parts of an extremely poor Bill and the Opposition will divide the House when the Question is put on the amendment to ensure that the clause is thrown out of the Bill. If that is not done in this place, we hope that the clause will be seriously revised, if not thrown out completely, in the other place.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have a substantial Asian or Commonwealth community residing in their constituencies. Much resentment has been expressed to me—I am sure that this has been the experience of many other Members with such a community—about the clause. It is difficult to understand why it is in the Bill. Such a clause was not in the 1991 Bill. Goodness knows what considerations led the Minister to decide to include it in this measure.

The Minister has not taken aboard sufficiently the fact that settled in our country are hundreds of thousands of people from new Commonwealth countries who are here legitimately. Visitors from those countries have to obtain a visa to come here, and that puts them apart—in a sense it discriminates against them—from others who come to the United Kingdom who are not required to surmount the same hurdles. I talk, of course, of visitors from visa countries and their families who are in this country.

Taking account of that, is it not extraordinary that given the number of appeals—it is not huge in relation to the number of appeals generally that remain outstanding within the system—the Minister should ask the House to remove entirely the right of appeal for visitors who have been refused a visa and entry to the United Kingdom?

I take the view that officials are nothing other than people who are trying to do their best in administering our laws. I am not mounting an attack on entry certificate officers, but obviously they are not infallible. Mistakes are made occasionally, and they are duly recorded, as is the number of successful appeals. As my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) said when addressing the House from the Opposition Front Bench, about 1,500 successful appeals were made last year. I think that that is the Minister's own figure. Are we saying that we are not interested in 1,500 examples of injustice that would otherwise be allowed to stand?

Is it not the fact that the availability of appeal is an important element in the decision making of entry certificate officers generally? It is only a back-up power, as it were, but to some extent it enables there to be surveillance of their decision making. It is an important factor in the decisions that they make.

9.45 pm

The Government have made a grave error and I shall explain why. First, I want to emphasise the number of people from visa countries who want to come here simply as visitors for family reasons. Surely families, especially grandparents, have the right to see their children and their children's children. Unlike those of us who have our families of all generations with us in Britain, those families are separated not by 50, 100 or even 300 miles, but by thousands of miles. It requires great effort simply to get to this country. The Minister knows the considerable cost of air fares. For the most part they are poor families—and, quite frankly, their families in this country are often among the lowest paid workers. Those families already have to overcome many obstacles.

There is another point of which I do not think the Minister has taken any account. However, I assure him that it is well understood and resented in our settled immigrant communities. I am referring to the fact that the Minister is actually imposing a double discrimination system—the visa system and the abolition of the right of appeal—at the very moment when the Single European Act has come into force and 300 million Europeans can come to this country at will. They are not required to prove that they will not be a burden on public funds or that there is adequate housing and accommodation for them. They do not have to show that they will stay here for only six months—they can stay here for six years. That is what the Government have granted to 300 million Europeans, very few of whom have the human and family contacts with people in this country that is enjoyed by many of our constituents whose parents and grandparents come from the Indian sub-continent and some of the African Commonwealth nations.

That policy is discrimination. It is granting truly extraordinary rights to millions of Europeans who do not have close family connections with this country, while erecting a new barrier, by abolishing the right of appeal, against the millions of people who have family connections with people who are settled here. The Minister has made an appalling error and I ask him to think carefully about what has been said. The matter was thoroughly turned over in Committee, when the arguments were put very powerfully. I ask him to think about the effect of such a double discrimination on the sentiments and thinking of hundreds and thousands of people in this country who believe—or at least hope—that all political parties are determined to rule and administer our laws in a way that is equitable to all.

Mr. Madden: There is a common view that the clause represents a new and sinister dimension to the Bill that goes well beyond the provisions of the previous Bill. When news of the clause swept through our black and Asian communities there was panic among the Conservative Members who represent some of them. Soon after the Bill had been published and been given its Second Reading, there were newspaper reports that Conservative Members were concerned about the abolition of the right of appeal for those refused a visitor's visa. The reports suggested that those Conservative Members had warned the Government that they could not be certain of their support in the Lobby tonight during Report stage and Third Reading.

We were told that Members of Parliament, including the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller)—I am pleased to see him in his place—the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) and eight other Conservative Members were so concerned about the matter that they would not automatically support the Bill.

In Committee, the wriggling and squirming of the hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) was a spectacle to behold on almost every occasion that the Committee sat. There were all sorts of gossiping and chats about how the hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth and other Conservative Members could be got off the hook on which the Minister and the Home Secretary had put them. There were meetings at the Home Office between those worried Conservative Members and the Minister.

Lo and behold, the day came—and on 8 December, in Committee, the Minister was able to read from a prepared press release that a number of concessions were to be made, which would meet the concerns and worries of the Conservative Members in question—it would be all right, lads and lasses, because they could all vote for clause 9 tonight with a clear conscience.

As you have already heard, Madam Speaker, those concessions do not amount to a row of beans. In reality, if clause 9 becomes law, large numbers of people refused a visit visa will have no remedy. They will be able to write to, or otherwise contact through their sponsors, Members of Parliament—including those worried Conservative Members who had doubts about clause 9 in the first place. We will then be able to write to a Foreign Office Minister responsible for visit visa administration, urging that a person refused permission to visit relatives, to attend a family wedding or funeral, or to visit for some other legitimate purpose should be allowed to do so. No doubt we will receive the same kind of letter that we already receive, expressing regret but saying that there is nothing that the Minister can do and that the applicant will just have to lump it.

At present, such people have a right of appeal—and we heard that a large proportion of those who appeal are successful. That right is of central importance, and it is extremely worrying that the Government are proposing to abolish it—which is triggering in the minds of many black or Asian people in particular concern over further action and whether other rights of appeal might be abolished.

I wonder how many other hon. and right hon. Members shared my concern when I saw tonight the gleam in the eye of the Home Secretary when he was saying how unsatisfactory are photographs as a means of identification. How much longer before a fiancé applying to enter this country to be married, or a spouse seeking to join his or her partner in this country, will have to be fingerprinted before applying? How much longer will it be before settlement refusals will no longer be capable of being appealed against?

In Committee, the Minister failed miserably to justify clause 9. He said:

"With a backlog of 23,000 appeals awaiting hearings by adjudicators, it must be recognised that the system is not delivering a fair, effective and timely remedy either to would-be visitors or to those seeking to settle here. It is necessary to concentrate resources on those cases which vitally affect a person's future. We do not undervalue the importance to many people born or settled here of visits by relatives. We recognise that what we need is to develop measures to ensure that the small proportion of would-be visitors who at present succeed in their appeals are not disadvantaged."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 8 December 1991; c. 649.]

What disingenuous gobbledegook is that?

The Minister was arguing that the inefficiencies of the appellate system, which have created a backlog of 23,000 cases, is the justification for abolishing a longstanding right of appeal.

Mr. Bernie Grant: My hon. Friend speaks of justification. Is he aware that the right of appeal for visitors came about as a result of an initiative by the Wilson Government, and that a commission was set up specifically to examine the way in which new Commonwealth citizens were being treated at our ports of entry? Is it not strange that it takes a commission to establish a right of appeal, and that this Government can destroy that right of appeal at a stroke without even having the courtesy to justify their wish to get rid of it?

Mr. Madden: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. No doubt that is why the director of the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, writing to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 5 January, said:

"We must convey the now widespread belief that there can be no rational justification for this proposal"— that is, clause 9.

"Removal of a right of appeal against an administrative decision, thus giving unfettered power to a civil servant or immigration official, can only lead to more careless decision-making since the officials know that their decisions will not be reviewed by any independent authority."

Mr. Moraes continued:

"You will already know from the statistics that this removal of an appeal right will disproportionately affect black British people and those settled here, as people from black and third world countries have a much higher chance of refusal."

In the new spirit espoused by the Minister in Committee in November, I deliberately delayed writing to him until 17 December about a constituent of mine whose 63-year-old mother wished to come here for medical treatment that she had been advised urgently to undertake when she last visited the country in 1990. She wished to come accompanied by her daughter. Her son, who has lived here for five years, had arranged for private medical treatment to be provided in Bradford; he was already prepared to pay the £2,500 that was required. As a home owner in full-time employment, he was perfectly willing to accommodate his mother and sister during their stay.

I was surprised to receive, on 31 December, a reply from a Foreign Office Minister, who informed me that he, rather than the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Home Department, was responsible for such matters. An official in the migration and visa correspondence unit told me:

"Because of the break in diplomatic relations between the United Kingdom and Iraq and the closure of the Embassy in Baghdad, Mrs. A and Miss A have no alternative but to apply for entry clearance at one of our visa-issuing posts outside Iraq. I enclose a list of our visa-issuing posts in Europe which have a waiting time of two weeks or less for non-resident applicants, which I hope your constituent will find helpful. I suggest that Mrs. A and her daughter first telephone or write to the post they choose in order to answer any preliminary enquiries and to book an appointment for a personal interview, which is an essential part of the entry clearance procedure. This will save time and avoid the risk of a wasted journey."

That came as very bad news to my constituent, who told me this weekend that there was no European country to which an Iraqi national could obtain a visa within Iraq, and that the nearest place where his mother and sister could obtain a visa was in Jordan. That would involve a 16-hour bus ride, and the lady concerned is now so badly disabled that she is wheelchair bound.

That case clearly illustrates the difficulties that will confront the Minister, and many other Members of Parliament, in the coming months and years if this wretched clause becomes law. My constituent is right to argue that if the Government hold a compassionate view and want to help those who wish to visit this country for medical and other reasons, the information that I have received from the Foreign Office does not reinforce or strengthen any conviction that the public might have about the true intentions of this Government.

Clause 9 is an integral part of this wretched, racist Bill. I hope that Conservative Members who, when it was first announced, were extremely worried about its consequences—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Bill, not amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Madden: Once again I urge those Conservative Members who initially had reservations about the clause to have the courage of their true convictions and to vote against clause 9. We understand that they cannot bring themselves to vote against this wretched Bill, but I urge them to pluck up the courage to vote against the clause. To do so would reinforce whatever reputation they may have for their belief in principles, the right to natural justice and the right of appeal against judicial and quasi-judicial decisions. It would be appreciated by their constituents who, if the clause becomes law, will lose the right to have their relatives and friends visit them in this country, a right that many of them, as British citizens, hold very dear. I hope that the clause will be defeated, that this important right of appeal will be retained and that we shall be able to say to the British people, whatever their race, colour or religion, that we believe that they, as British citizens, are all equal before the law and have the right to appeal against administrative decisions.

Mr. Maclennan: This is undoubtedly one of the most important amendments before the House and it should enjoy the support of hon. Members in all parts of the House. Certainly it should enjoy the support of those who earlier expressed their anxiety about the importation into a Bill, purportedly dealing with asylum matters, of a further measure to clamp down on visitors to this country who are not seeking asylum.

It might tolerably be argued that a Bill to curb asylum seekers will not cause deep public concern. It may be thought that, after the passage of a modest amount of time, anxieties about fingerprinting and people coming from Angola and other countries who have no relatives in this country to welcome and support them when they arrive here will be blocked out and that no problems will arise from the asylum aspects of the Bill. The Government can have no such hope, however, regarding clause 9. It will directly affect the lives of many citizens in this country for many years to come. It will stimulate deep hostility among those who feel themselves to be discriminated against, when members of their families are denied the right to visit them here. Such people cannot experience the support and joy of temporary visits because the Government of the day believe that it is administratively inconvenient properly to scrutinise their applications. That must be bad for race relations in the United Kingdom.

It may be that Governments of different political complexions have felt it necessary to have a firm immigration policy for the benefit of race relations in the United Kingdom. However, that firm policy must be seen to be fair if it is not to exacerbate the ill feeling among minority communities that those who are in the majority are abusing their power to their family disadvantage.

I hope that the Minister will not seek to justify the inclusion of something in this Bill which even the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker)—stimulated as he was by a desire to split the House on the issue of race before an election—did not think it appropriate to include in his Bill. This nasty inclusion is the creation of someone who postured in the past as a liberal in matters of race. The Home Secretary appeared to relish that reputation, and I will not speculate on why he now chooses to cast off that mantle.

If the House fails tonight to extrude the obnoxious clause from the Bill, I hope that those in another place will examine with particular attention the possibility of restoring what successive Governments accepted as necessary to ensure that applications for visits to the United Kingdom were fairly perused and open to appeal. The obnoxious clause was not included by the Government on a whim in response to pressures from a particular group in society; it was introduced as a result of careful deliberation. It is true that the right of appeal was introduced by a Labour Government, but it was endorsed by Conservative Governments. No political parties were divided on the matter until this Government introduced the amendment.

The Government's method and approach to immigration and race relations are obnoxious because they cause a split in the United Kingdom on not only the grounds of colour but the grounds of party. The Minister must remove the clause and accept the amendment. If he does, he will receive the thanks and appreciation of all hon. Members for having allowed sense to prevail over the corruption of administrative power that has been too long enjoyed.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for listening to the concerns which some of my hon. Friends and I have expressed about clause 9. My hon. Friend listened most courteously. He went away and thought about the issues which we had raised and proposed some changes. I am not critical of the changes. Indeed, I believe that they will help the way in which administrative decisions are made in the future. But they will remain essentially administrative decisions.

I share the anxieties that have already been expressed tonight that there will be no possibility of appeal against administrative decisions which may be wrong because human decisions so often are fallible. One must bear in mind that those decisions are of great significance to many people. It is often difficult for people who have settled in Britain to travel to visit their relatives in their country of origin. People who have settled in Britain often have jobs from which it is difficult for them to spend much time away. Therefore, if a family is to be brought together from time to time, there is no alternative to a journey to Britain by a relative.

Entry clearance officers certainly have difficult decisions to make. The information that they have is often limited. That is why adjudicators are often better placed. They will see the sponsor and perhaps others. As constituency Members we know that, while ultimately it is the intentions of the visitor which are important, the evidence given by sponsors can be absolutely vital. In the communities in Britain, a sponsor would be unlikely to co-operate in a decision to ignore immigration rules because that would do great damage in a close-knit community.

When one reads the adjudicator's decision in the determination of many cases, one appreciates that where successful appeals are made there is often no credible reason for rejecting an application. As we have heard, every year there are 1,500 or so successful appeals. I am not satisfied that, because an applicant will have another opportunity to apply and the evidence will be heard by different entry clearance officers wherever possible, the decision will necessarily be right.

[Mr. Gary Waller]

At present, we have a helpful safeguard and I regret that it will be lost in the future. I have had few representations against clause 9. It is not because of the number of representations that I have received that I intend to vote against the Government on amendment No. 15. I intend to vote against the amendment because of my knowledge of such cases as someone who has represented constituents and dealt with such cases for many years.

If the amendment would make it essentially easier for people to overstay illegally or evade the immigration rules, one would have to think carefully about it. However, in my experience the people who appeal do not intend to overstay or evade the immigration rules. They are often people with a good case. It is because those good cases will not have an opportunity to be heard and because administrative decisions will not be overturned where they are weak that I am afraid that I shall have to go into the Opposition Lobby this evening.

Mr. Corbyn: I compliment the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) on what he said and his decision about how to vote this evening. That is a sign that at least some Conservative Members are not prepared to accept what the Government gave as a great retreat as anything more than a figleaf to cover them during the Committee proceedings. The removal of appeal rights for visitors is a disgraceful removal of the right of ordinary people to a proper hearing. It is also the removal of any accountability for public officials who grant or refuse the right of entry clearance or a visitor's visa.

Earlier today, almost 1,000 people—almost all of them black—were brought to the House of Commons by the National Black Caucus to lobby against this clause. I pay tribute to the National Black Caucus for doing so, for the spirit and intelligence of its lobby and for everything that it said, because it came directly from the heart.

All hon. Members who represent constituencies that contain many people with families living in the Caribbean, Africa, Asia, the far east and many other parts of the world, are aware of the consequences of the system. To put it in context, last year there were 10,000 appeals against refusals of visits to this country. Those appeals were made by people who arrived in this country, sought entry, were refused and were sent back to the country that they had come from, where they went through the appeals system and 17 per cent. of those appeals were granted. Under the Government's cock-eyed system and by their own admission, 1,700 people were wrongly denied entry to this country.

The existing appeals system is seriously flawed because the appeal must take place in the country of application. If someone who has saved up a great deal of money to come to this country from Pakistan, Bangladesh, India or the Caribbean is refused admission on arrival and has to return home, although he might win an appeal it is useless if he has spent the best part of a year's wages on the air fare to come here in the first place.

I do not know whether the Minister understands the heartache and misery caused to families who prepare years in advance for a wedding or some other great family occasion, only to find that the grandparents, distant uncles or cousins whom they so desperately wanted to attend are suddenly not allowed to come. Does he understand the humiliation of it? Families preparing for a great family occasion on a Saturday or Sunday often get an anguished call on Wednesday or Thursday the week before from relatives who cannot get permission to come into the country or who have arrived and been sent back. Hon. Members who represent inner-city constituencies regularly experience the hassle of trying to persuade immigration officers that there is some new evidence, or some merit in contacting the Minister's private office and all the rest of it.

The way in which the system operates is wrong and the Minister should not be introducing clause 9 but should accept its removal and should introduce a new clause to allow an in-country right of appeal so that people would not have to suffer the nonsense of being removed from this country and told that they can appeal in the country that they have come from.

Another side to the question is the way in which entry clearance officers at particular British missions abroad will be making the decisions. I have attended interviews for entry clearance for permanent residency and I am sorry to have to say that entry clearance officers indulge in a large degree of subjective decision-making, based on a person's wealth and on what they choose to call the immigration history of the family concerned. Basically, that subjective decision-making means that if one is poor, black and comes from Africa, the Caribbean or south Asia there is a high chance that one will be refused admission to this country for a visit, but if one is white and comes from the United States, South Africa or Australia one is unlikely to be refused admission to this country.

If the present rather inadequate right of appeal is removed, immigration officials will have totally untrammelled power over the lives of many families and the happiness of many people. There will be no accountability. The system is racist because of whom it is directed at and it is flawed in its approach.

I hope that the Minister will understand that the anger outside the House and throughout ethnic communities in this country will not go away, whatever the decision this evening. There will be challenges and I hope that successful amendments will be made to the Bill in the House of Lords and that the decision will be challenged legally by a judicial review. The Minister has not heard the end of it yet.

I also remind the Minister that, although many people are badly treated when they apply to visit this country, British tourists who seek to visit India, Bangladesh or any other country are treated decently by their high commissions and embassies here. The Minister should think about the small rate of refusal for visitors' visas for British tourists who seek to visit those countries. I can imagine the screaming headlines in the Daily Mail if many British people seeking to visit India as tourists were denied entry. I can just imagine the way in which that newspaper would present such stories. Why cannot such papers turn their undoubted propaganda skills round to attack the Government for removing a basic right of appeal against an unjust decision by an unaccountable official?

I ask the Minister to recognise the strength and justice of our case for the removal of clauses 9 and 10 from what is a wholly inadequate Bill in any case.

Mr. Winnick: I wish more Conservative Members other than the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) had spoken against the clause. He rightly said why its inclusion could not be supported and said that he would vote against it. I welcome that decision, but it will be rather unfortunate if he is the only hon. Member on the Conservative Benches so to vote because many people are deeply concerned about the clause. They rightly understand that it represents a form of discrimination against a section of people who will be discriminated basically because they intend to invite here relatives or friends from the West Indies or the Indian sub-continent.

I regret that the Government have decided to include this clause in the Bill. We were not told that that was their intention when the Bill was submitted to the House prior to the general election. I am particularly worried because if the Bill as it now stands is passed, how long will it be, as my hon. Friends have already asked, before other rights of appeal are taken away? Does it mark the beginning of the end of the appeal system?

The appeal system came into existence 22 years last July. I speak with some experience of it, because in the past I represented people, almost on a continuing basis, who appeared before adjudicators. As the Minister knows, one must prove before the adjudicator the relevance of circumstances at the time that the decision was made by an entry clearance officer. It is no use someone coming before an adjudicator and saying that the situation has improved because the appellant has more money than he did when he originally applied to visit this country. The adjudicator must simply decide whether the decision taken by the entry clearance officer at the time was right in law.

One must argue the case on behalf of the appellant to show that the circumstances at the time of the original decision were such that that decision should have been different. The fact is that in nearly 20 per cent. of visitor cases appeals the adjudicators or the immigration appeals tribunal have found that the original decision by the entry clearance officer was wrong. Surely that is a matter of some concern.

Mrs. Roche: Does my hon. Friend agree that another reason for having the appellate system is that it provides a check on the way in which entry clearance officers and immigration officers carry out their functions? That check is important even if those functions are not subject to an appeal. Recently an immigration officer at a port of entry changed his mind on a decision because, as he said frankly to me, he knew that he could not argue his decision on appeal. The mere existence of the appellate system changed his mind. That is why it is so important to keep it.

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. If a decision is appealed against, the entry clearance officer must write what is known as an explanatory statement, which can run to eight or 12 pages, and in which he or she must give, at length, the reasons it was decided to refuse the application.

If there is no appeal system for visitors, entry clearance officers know that, however much they believe that they have done their job well, it will not be subject to appeal. At most what will happen is that the Member of Parliament representing the sponsor will write to the Minister. In reply the Minister will probably say——

Mr. Madden: Sod off.

Mr. Winnick: Well, he may not say that as such; he will put it in more dignified terms. He will say that the entry clearance officer considered all the facts and circumstances, came to his or her decision and that he, the Minister, can see no reason for overruling it. The entry clearance officer will know that there will be no adjudicator, no immigration appeals tribunal, no judicial review in certain circumstances, and no High Court case. He will therefore have total power to decide whether a person can come to this country on a short visit. I believe that that is wrong.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) referred to the Wilson committee. That committee recommended an appeals system because it believed that if the United Kingdom were to have tight immigration controls, which most of us believe are necessary, there must also be elementary justice and that people who are denied the right to come here should have the right to appeal. That system has operated for some 22 years and if we are to take away certain people's right to appeal, how soon will it be before other rights are also taken away?

Some people may say that few people are involved in sponsoring visitors. That is neither here nor there. Many people invite relatives to this country for perfectly genuine reasons. They want to see their parents or adult children and are willing to make sacrifices so that that close relative can come to the United Kingdom. When the relative from the Indian sub-continent or the West Indies is refused, they believe—rightly or wrongly—that it is because he or she has a black or Asian skin and that, had the person concerned been white, there would have been no trouble. Great harm may come to race relations in this country if people who are settled here, with every right to be here, find that their closest relatives cannot visit them. We are discussing not people coming here to live—that is not the issue—but people who wish to visit. Once they are here as visitors, they have no right to stay. The Minister is not arguing that the appeals system must go because people overstay their visit and go underground. He is nodding in agreement at that.

A fundamental right is being taken away. We shall no doubt lose the vote tonight, especially if only one Conservative Member intends to vote with us. However, the principle is important and I hope that the other place will not reach the same decision as I fear this House will reach tonight. I hope that the other place will recognise that what the Labour party has been saying, supported by the Liberal party and the one Conservative Member, is extremely important and that it will successfully challenge the Government. We shall be unable to do so tonight because, although Conservative Members understand the issue, they fear opposing the Government. They do not have the courage to do so and they are abdicating their responsibility as Members of Parliament.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I could not let the clause pass without making a few remarks because the Bill will affect so many of my constituents and has the potential to affect many British citizens throughout the country.

We have heard that one Conservative Member will vote against the Bill. Although some Conservative Members may have the excuse of ignorance about the Bill's effects, some of them know only too well the misery, humiliation, financial loss, unfairness and racism that will flow from the Bill. If they march through the Lobbies with the Government tonight, they should look to their consciences.

[Ms. Diane Abbott]

One of the strengths of the appellate system in relation to visits is the guarantee of fairer decisions by administrators. I worked in the Home Office and I am familiar with the type and grade of official who makes such decisions, and I cannot understand how Ministers think that it is acceptable to remove checks and balances from middle-ranking, often not entirely satisfactorily trained, executive grade officials in the Home Office. They leave relatives of British citizens liable to arbitrary and unfair decisions.

At this late stage I do not expect to change anyone's mind about clauses 9 and 10, but I should like to convey, both to my hon. Friends who may be wondering why we cannot proceed to a vote and Conservative Members who are to vote with the Government what it feels like to be a Jamaican, a Pakistani or a Turk who has lived in the countryside and saved the equivalent of many years' salary to come to this country for a wedding, birthday or christening. In the religions and cultures of such countries, weddings and christenings mean much more than they do to most of us. I want to try to convey to hon. Members what it means to have saved the equivalent of many years' salary, put on one's best clothes, left the Jamaican or Bengali countryside, travelled to a big city in one's own country for the first time and taken an aeroplane to Heathrow only to be humiliated by the sort of treatment that is ritually handed out to black people visiting this country.

Like many Opposition Members, I have been telephoned at all hours of the night by frantic relatives who, at the last minute, have realised that a loved sister, cousin, grandparent or even parent will not be able to come to a wedding or a christening. It is hard to convey to people who are not familiar with those cultures what such a denial means to the families involved.

It will be starkly obvious to black British citizens whose relatives are unable to visit them for such family occasions that if they were French or German—if they were white—their relatives would be able to visit them without encountering all the hindrances. No other clause in the Bill more clearly reveals the racist nature of immigration control than clause 9, which hits, not those who are coming to settle, but those who genuinely want to visit and who may not have seen their grandchildren, brothers, sisters or other relatives for 10, 20 or 30 years.

The clause is an abuse of the process. It is wholly unjustified. The majority of hon. Members do not understand how much unhappiness, unfairness and wasted money the clause will cause. Anyone in the House who knows, understands and works among those whom the clause will affect cannot, in good conscience, vote for the clauses as they stand.

Mr. Vaz: There is one brave man sitting on the Conservative Benches: the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), who, through his experiences and his daily work dealing with immigration cases, has decided to come to the Chamber today to show his dissent over the Bill's proposals and to vote with the Opposition against the measure.

Clauses 9 and 10 are squalid measures that will hit out at the rights that have, for many years, been accepted as fundamental. Before I entered the House I worked as a lawyer in a law centre in Leicester. When people came to that centre the one guarantee that I could give them when their relatives were refused admission to this country was that they could use the appeal process. That right is to be removed and the one concession that the Minister is proposing to make is an administrative one that already exists.

In Committee—[Interruption.] I am sorry that the Minister does not wish to hear what I have to say because I want to comment directly on his visit to the sub-continent. In his submission to the Committee in which he discussed the administrative changes that he was proposing to introduce, he talked about his visit to the sub-continent. I, too, have visited the sub-continent in the past month and I, too, met the immigration and entry clearance officers whom he met. [Interruption.] He wants to know when and whom I visited. I do not think that the Minister can tell us the name of the First Secretary (Immigration) in Bombay. Can he remember it? It is no use his looking at his officials. Does he know the name of the First Secretary (Immigration) in New Delhi? He does not. I have met Martin Hilson and David O'Rourke and I have discussed with both of them and with other entry clearance officers what the Minister proposes to do by means of this squalid measure. He proposes to put these entry clearance officers in an intolerable position. They are supposed to become judge and jury in both first and second applications.

I looked at the Official Report of the Committee's proceedings to find out whom the Minister consulted before he came to this conclusion. He did not discuss the Bill with the very people who will have to administer its provisions. He said of the system in Committee:

"I then asked myself what could be done administratively to improve it".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 8 December 1992; c. 650.]

So the Minister consulted himself. Those who daily deal with these cases in Bombay and New Delhi have a wealth of experience and if the Minister would only ask them they would tell him that they will not be able to cope with the number of applications that will be made.

The Minister went on to say that three Members of Parliament came to see him to discuss these matters and at the end of a great struggle and fracas he emerged with these concessions. They represent no more than what already happens. If a person cannot get his or her relative into this country as a visitor, he or she goes to see the relevant Member of Parliament. That Member writes to the migration and visas correspondence unit. That unit then writes to the post abroad and the post abroad writes back setting out reasons. It is not clear how the Minister's proposals differ from what already happens.

The Minister goes on to talk about exceptional and compassionate circumstances. I refer him to the case of the gentleman who came to visit one of my constituents in Leicester. His former wife was dying in the royal infirmary in Leicester. Her last wish was to see her former husband whom she had not seen for several years. I submitted to Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials, the very people to whom the Minister suggests Members of Parliament should write, a doctor's certificate, signed by a consultant at the royal infirmary. It was faxed to the office of the Minister and from there to Bombay. We asked that exceptional and compelling circumstances be considered because the woman in question was dying.

When the visa was refused, I raised the matter with the Under-Secretary of State at the Foreign Office, who is not here tonight even though these measures touch on his area of responsibility. He refused to overturn the decision. I gave a personal undertaking that if the person was allowed to come here he would return a month later, after he had seen his dying wife and attended her funeral.

In the meantime, the woman died at the royal infirmary —while the administrative procedures on which the Minister wants us to rely were under way. Finally, I went and begged the Under-Secretary of State, in his office, to reconsider the matter and allow the man to come to this country. The Minister refused to make a decision until he had been briefed. He would not accept the personal undertaking of a Member of Parliament and a doctor's certificate. He saw me in the House at 11.30 pm the night before the funeral and on the basis of that meeting he at last overturned the decision of the entry clearance officer.

Is this what Members of Parliament will have to do to get people into this country for exceptional and compassionate reasons?

When in New Delhi I dealt with the case of a gentleman of substantial means—one of the wealthiest industrialists in India. He wanted to send his son to a university in this country and was prepared to pay the full overseas fee of £10,000. He was able to show that this young man had invested £500,000 in this country. The entry clearance officer in New Delhi would not allow that young man to undertake the course of study because he said that the last time that the young man was here he went through the appeal process and therefore manipulated the situation in order to stay longer.

I appealed to the First Secretary (Immigration) in New Delhi and tried to contact the high commissioner, Sir Nicholas Fenn, who was unfortunately suffering from food poisoning that day and was unable to see me. I tried to get through to the deputy high commissioner, but unfortunatley he had gone to Uttar Pradesh and was also unable to see me. I left my discussions with the First Secretary, who would not change his mind. He said that he would look at the case and he discussed it with his officers, but could not overrule the decision.

I gave a personal undertaking. I said, "This gentleman will return to India because his father is a substantial industrialist. He wants to remain in India and does not want to remain in Britain. He is prepared to give our country £10,000 a year in overseas fees." However, the First Secretary (Immigration) would not change his decision. He told me, "This young man has the right of appeal." I said, "That right is to be taken away by the Government." He said, "That does not matter: the right exists at the moment."

I called a press conference to publicise the case in India so that people realised in advance of Prime Minister Major's visit on 26 January how Indian citizens were being treated. Lo and behold, half an hour before my press conference the visa was issued. Those are the lengths to which hon. Members will have to go to get genuine visitors into this country and that is totally unfair.

The procedures outlined by the Minister will not solve the basic problem. During the general election campaign Conservative Members promised people that they would protect their rights, but at the first opportunity they are prepared to renege on those promises. The Minister knows that the legislation will double the workload of every hon. Member who deals with immigration cases, but he has said that he will not restore it because of the backlog of cases.

I shall tell the Minister what happened to me when I went to the immigration appeal tribunal on Thursday. He may not like to hear about it, but he shall. I went to give evidence for a constituent who had been waiting 12 months for a case to be considered. I arrived for the hearing, but the Home Office officer who was to present the case was not there. The appeal could not proceed and the adjudicator had to telephone my office and give me a personal apology because of the way in which the Home Office had operated. Does the Minister want us to place our confidence in people who cannot turn up for agreed engagements?

It is getting late and hon. Members want to vote, but this right is extremely important and we should not be ashamed to stay here for as long as it takes to change the procedures. If the Minister does not change his mind, he will be remembered in the history of immigration law as the Minister who removed the right of appeal and wherever he goes in the country to whatever community event, he will be reminded of that.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Understandably, strong feelings have emerged in the debate. Some hon. Members have spoken with passion and sincerity. However, the debate has not been without some confusion and humbug. I am frequently impressed by the contributions of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). If it were not for a trace of self-importance that seems to creep in, he would more frequently advance most impressive arguments.

I will not stand by while any hon. Member seeks to malign officials. It is entirely wrong to name officials who cannot answer back. Some hon. Members said that entry clearance officers treat badly people who apply for visit visas. It has also been suggested that Home Office officials treat people badly and the calibre of immigration officers has been impugned.

There has been confusion. For example, a person from the Indian sub-continent, as the House knows, will require a visa. Therefore, a citizen of that part of the world who has no visa should not travel here without it and would most definitely waste an air fare if he did so. However, if that individual has a proper and valid visa and arrives here having spent the air fare but is refused entry for whatever reason, he will still have a right of appeal because he would have been turned away while he had valid documentation.

Other hon. Members spoke of the Caribbean. As was pointed out in Committee, most of the Caribbean islands are not countries whose nationals require a visa to visit here. Jamaica, which was once my home, has been mentioned. Jamaicans are not visa nationals for the purposes of visits to this country. In 1991, some 26,000 people from Jamaica visited the United Kingdom and just 392 were refused entry. As well as confusion, there has been humbug and not a little scaremongering to boot.

It is worth bearing in mind the fact that in 1991, the last full year for which records are available, some 5,700,000 visitors were welcomed to the country, of which some 400,000 came on short stays, in one capacity or another, from the Indian sub-continent. The confusion and the humbug do not end there. Let us look at applications for 1991, globally, for visa applications. Some 919,000 applications were received, and 91·6 per cent. were successful at the first attempt. Of those refused, 12,300 appeals were made, of which 1,542 were allowed. I agree with Opposition Members that that is 1,542 cases about which one should think long and hard.

We had a little humour and some fun from the hon. Member for Leicester, East—why not—when he spoke about me drawing my own conclusions. The hon. Gentleman told me that he has recently paid another visit to Bombay and Delhi, but he knows that I met every entry clearance officer on post there and listened to their advice. I did the same in Islamabad, Karachi, Colombo and Dakha. When I draw my conclusions, they are based on the research that I have carried out.

Mr. Vaz: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wardle: I wish to make some progress and the hon. Gentleman had a full go, but as he asks so charmingly, how can I resist his entreaties?

Mr. Vaz: Let me try to be charming again. When the Minister went to see the entry clearance officers and immigration officers, did he discuss the removal of the right of appeal? Did he discuss the implications for their daily workload of removing the right of appeal?

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman's question is a little disingenuous because, if he had any pretensions to government, he would know full well that no Minister could talk about a Bill that had not been published and presented to Parliament. He will appreciate that the line of inquiries that I followed enabled me to learn a great deal while I was there.

The appeals backlog on immigration cases is about 23,000 and about half those cases involve visas for short-term visits. Opposition Members are right, of course, to say that we should look to staffing, to the calibre and training of our entry clearance officers in posts abroad and to improve the facilities and training of personnel in the Home Office. It is right for me to say that we do all of those things. Why, I wonder, is there humbug when someone makes suggestions which, if implemented, would improve administrative measures? Why should it be said, "That is not a good thing"?

Why not take a hard look at the reality of visit visa appeals, bearing in mind that no other country has quite the same mechanism? It is a creaking, improbable out-of-date appeal mechanism. It seems that its principal justification revolves round sponsors. The person who intends to make the visit will find under the present machinery that the term of his visit has long passed and the purpose of it has eluded him because it takes so long for an appeal to be sorted out. It must make much more sense to take a hard look at the procedures, instead of wallowing in compassion, and to say, "How can we improve the service for anyone who has to apply for a visit visa to come to the United Kingdom; what can we do to serve him or her better?" I assure the House that to leave the current creaking and outmoded appeal mechanism in place will do the applicant no service. It must make more sense to consider the realities and to abolish the appeals that run for so long, and instead to offer a service that will enable the genine visitor—let us bear in mind that there were 5·7 million such visitors in 1991—to continue to enjoy the object of his plans, which is to come to the United Kingdom.

Amendments Nos. 15 and 16——

Ms. Abbott: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wardle: Not for the moment—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I gave way to hon. Members throughout the consideration of the Bill in Committee and I have done so on the Floor of the House, so why should I make an exception of the hon. Lady, as long as she will be brief?

Ms. Abbott: I listened with great care to the Minister and he has failed to clarify the matter for Opposition Members. Even if there is a creaking right of appeal, how will there be an improvement in the service if we take away people's rights?

Mr. Wardle: People have a right to a decent, well-run service. Instead of indulging in all this compassion, the House should look for effective administrative measures, some of which are listed in the press release. It is a document that won much interest when it was published before Christmas.

Amendments Nos. 15 and 16 would, not surprisingly, delete clauses 9 and 10 from the Bill. Clause 9 amends section 13 of the Immigration Act 1971 to provide that a person shall not be entitled to appeal against the refusal of an entry clearance, or against refusal of leave to enter, if he is seeking to enter the United Kingdom as a visitor, if he is a short-term student on a course of not more than six months duration, if he is a prospective student or is a dependant of a person in one of those categories. Appeals remain in place for someone who is about to be deported or for someone who is seeking to obtain settlement in this country.

Clause 9 is necessary to streamline the appeal system to make it work properly and so to enable it to provide an effective and timely remedy to those to whom I have just referred, who will be challenging decisions which vitally and centrally affect their lives. It is not an attack on the entitlement of people who are settled in this country to have their relatives come here to visit them. Those visitors —genuine visitors—will always be welcomed to this country. It is scaremongering to suggest otherwise. The measures that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is putting in place, which were the subject of the press release, will provide a speedier means of having disputed decisions reviewed and treated.

Clause 10 removes the right of appeal against decisions taken on certain specified grounds where the applicant does not meet a mandatory requirement of the immigration rules. It is worth explaining why such appeals cannot succeed at present. Again, there has been confusion. The power of the appellate authorities in determining an appeal are set out in section 19 of the 1971 Act. Subsection (1) provides that an adjudicator shall allow an appeal if he considers that the decision involved was not in accordance with the law or any applicable immigration rules, or, where a decision involved the exercise of a discretion, if he considers that the discretion should have been exercised differently. In all other cases he must dismiss the appeal. Subsection (2) provides that a decision which is in accordance with the immigration rules is not to be treated as involving an exercise of discretion simply because the Secretary of State has declined to depart from the rules.

It is right and necessary that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State should retain a residual discretion to waive the requirements of the immigration rules in exceptional circumstances as no set of rules can cater for every possible set of circumstances. The flexible use of exceptional leave in asylum cases is the obvious example of the need for that. However, the general expectation in the non-asylum cases with which clause 10 is concerned must be that the immigration rules, which reflect the policy laid down by my right hon. and learned Friend and approved by Parliament, will be applied and that the function of the appellate authorities is simply to ensure that the rules have been applied correctly in individual cases. If the appellate authorities were able to direct the Secretary of State to waive the rules in particular cases, in effect they would be determining immigration policy, which is not their proper function.

Some immigration rules provide for the exercise of discretion—for example, a decision to deport will always be discretionary. Other rules contain requirements that the Secretary of State or the immigration officer has to be satisfied of certain matters that can be tested only in a balance of probabilities, such as a person's intention to leave the United Kingdom at the end of a period of study. In both those cases, there is room for argument as to whether the decision is correct and an appeal may be either allowed or dismissed.

Some rules, however, contain requirements that must be met if the application is to succeed and where the question of whether the requirement is met can be easily determined on the basis of documentary evidence. When an application is refused because such a requirement is not met, the adjudicator has no option but to dismiss the appeal when it eventually comes before him. The existence of a right of appeal in such cases does nothing to redress genuine grievances; it serves only to enable those appellants who have no claim under the immigration rules to remain in this country and to spin out their stay here pursuing hopeless appeals, while delaying the hearing of other appeals that certainly do involve issues of substance. I therefore urge the House to reject amendments Nos. 15 and 16.

Government Amendments Nos. 36 to 39 clarify the types of document that are involved in mandatory refusals for the purpose of clause 10. Those are essential official documents that must be held if an application is to succeed under the relevant immigration rules—entry clearances, passports or other identity documents and work permits. I believe that that clarification will be generally welcomed. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Fraser: Not a word that has been said by the Minister justifies clause 9 being included in the Bill. The clause can be summed up in two words—it stinks. When the Prime Minister was doing his memory lane stuff in Brixton, pointing out where he used to live in Loughborough junction, why did not he point out that we had a great big piece of redundant machinery that gave people rights of appeal which he would remove as soon as he got back into office? When the Home Secretary was going around ethnic constituencies in the midlands and Yorkshire at the time of the general election, why were not people told that there was a piece of creaking machinery that the Government proposed to remove?

Clause 9 is a deceit for the ethnic communities of this country. It breaks a trust. Those people trusted the Government. There used to be a bipartisanship about fairness and decency in appeals on these matters. Clause 9 will split families, prevent reunion in times of joy, prevent visits in times of bereavement and give validity to decisions that often will be based on speculation, not evidence. Clause 9 will give credence to decisions that are often based on speculation, not evidence; and a spurious validity to previous refusals, so that people will have the stigma of an immigration refusal. It will also refuse the right of appeal at the very time that we have citizens charters which are supposed to improve the lot of those who challenge administrative decisions. This exception will remove them.

Most of all, clause 9 will be a stain on the reputation of the Home Secretary who, on the whole, is a man who is aggressive rather than spiteful, tough rather than mean. I believe that he will come to regret this occasion. It will be a stain on the reputation also of the Under-Secretary who, even if we do not agree with him, is generally considered to be fair-minded. It will be a stain on the reputation of this country. Let no one be deceived about the kind of reputation that it will create when people's right of appeal is taken away. There will be a stain also on the reputation of every Conservative Member who votes for clause 9 tonight.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

CARRIERS' LIABILITY FOR TRANSIT PASSENGERS

11.15 pm

Mr. Charles Wardle: I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 8, line 11, after "territory", insert
"but not by reference to race, colour or religion".

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 41.

Mr. Wardle: Amendment No. 40 provides that the criteria which are used to specify a group of persons who will be required to produce transit visas under the new provisions in clause 11 shall not be based on race, colour or religion. Amendment No. 41 makes a similar provision with regard to the different commencement dates which are permitted under clause 13.

In Committee some Opposition Members expressed concern that the criteria of origin or connection with a particular country or territory might be operated in a racialy discriminating way. I am pleased to move amendments which make it clear that that is not the case. The criteria that will be used will relate only to matters akin to but not necessarily confined to nationality, such as the type of passport or travel document which a person holds. Like the existing immigration controls, the new provisions will be operated without racial prejudice or discrimination. I urge the House to support the amendments.

COMMENCEMENT

Mr. Allen: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 8, line 33, at beginning insert—

'( ) Sections 3 to 11 above and section 1 so far as it relates to those sections shall not take effect until the Secretary of State has laid a report before both Houses of Parliament describing those arrangements which he has made for the consideration of and adjudication upon complaints about the conduct of those within his department engaged upon the work of immigration and nationality.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 26, in page 8, line 33, at beginning insert—

'( ) Sections 3 and 6 to 10 shall not come into force until the Secretary of State has laid a report before both Houses of Parliament describing the arrangements for the training of those within his department engaged in the examination and interviewing of those who are or who may be asylum-seekers.'.

No. 27, in page 8, line 33, at beginning insert—

'( ) Sections 3 and 6 to 10 shall not come into force until the Secretary of State has by order made by statutory instrument specified standards of training and competence for those within his department engaged in the examination and interviewing of those who are or who may be asylum-seekers.'.

Mr. Allen: Given the lengthy discussion in Committee on the complaints and training procedures, can the Minister give an assurance that he is still open to receive representations on that matter?

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Charles Wardle: I can give such an assurance. As I explained in Committee, the complaints procedure is currently under review with the object of examining whether there should be an independent element in the review.

Amendment No. 22 will prevent the main provisions from being implemented until after the results of the review have been placed before Parliament. There is no particular reason why the results should be linked to the commencement of the Bill in such a way. I expect the results of the review to be available in the next month or so. In the meantime, representations from the hon. Members for Nottingham, North and for Islington, North will be welcomed.

The immigration and nationality department of the Home Office places great emphasis on training in so far as it relates to asylum staff and immigration officers. Opposition Members may wish to pursue the idea which the hon. Member for Nottingham, North suggested some weeks ago about a visit to the Harmondsworth training facilities and Croyden to learn more about the operations of the immigration and nationality department of the Home Office.

I hope that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will take up that opportunity to learn more about the functions of interpreters. He will appreciate that we must deal with 100 languages. The staff face a difficult task. As I said in Committee, we have been reviewing the Department's requirements for interpreters. That review is not quite complete. Some of the improvements which we wish to put in place before the Bill is implemented include better and more consistent procedures for recruiting interpreters and monitoring their performance, together with new guidelines.

Mr. Corbyn: The Minister was a little fast on his feet, so I hope that he does not mind if I now follow him. I support the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North which will have the effect of delaying the Bill until the review has been completed. Frankly, I see nothing wrong in that. Many of us have complained for a long time that there should be better and more extensive training facilities for those who undertake interviews.

Far more consideration needs to be given to security of those who are employed to do translation work. As the Home Secretary admitted earlier, the revelation of the true identity of a person seeking asylum is a sensitive process. People live in Britain under assumed names because of the threat to their families at home. He should also be aware that for many years secret agents have operated in Britain on behalf of several oppressive regimes, not least South Africa, Iran and Iraq. They pass information back to their Governments which is used as a basis for attacking the families, friends or comrades of those people. It is essential that anyone who is employed as an interpreter will maintain any confidences that are picked up during discussions and in translation work.

Those who undertake interviews should also be given psychiatric training so that they can understand the degree of trauma, disturbance and disorientation which people who seek asylum have suffered. I will certainly take up the Minister's offer to visit the training facilities and discuss what goes on during training. Our constituents and the people seeking political asylum in Britain whom we represent are the ones who suffer if the system does not work properly and those who are supposed to have been trained to undertake interviews do not undertake the work properly.

Therefore, I wish that the Minister had paid slightly more attention to the amendments that we tabled and delayed the introduction of the Bill until such time as the training episode had been thoroughly examined, the report had been received and any suitable changes in it had been implemented.

May I ask through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether the Minister will make a report or statement to the House when the review has been completed so that Members can comment on it at the review stage as well as at the evidence-taking stage which we are apparently in at present?

Mr. Wardle: The review is purely internal. I made it clear a few moments ago and in Committee that ideas suggested by Opposition Members and, indeed, other parties would be carefully considered. However, the review is an internal matter.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 41, in page 8, line 47, after 'territory', insert

'but not by reference to race, colour or religion'.—[Mr. Charles Wardle.]

Schedule 2

APPEALS TO SPECIAL ADJUDICATOR: SUPPLEMENTARY

Mr. Wardle: I beg to move amendment No. 42, in page 13, line 34, at end insert

'and the making of such a reference shall, accordingly, be regarded as disposing of the appeal'.

The amendment is intended to clarify a point which was raised by the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) in Committee. When a special adjudicator refers a case back to the Secretary of State for reconsideration because he does not agree that the asylum claim is without foundation, that will be the end of the proceedings on that appeal. The reconsideration will result in a new decision and if that decision is still unfavourable there will be a fresh right of appeal.

Mr. Fraser: I was hoping for an assurance that if a case was referred back, the Home Secretary would not come a second time to a decision that the case was without foundation. It is a common cause for complaint, especially over visitor appeals, that people go to appeal and win their appeal and the matter is then referred back to an entry clearance officer or the home officer. Despite the success of the appeal, the same decision is reached all over again. It seems a double jeopardy that someone launches an appeal against the decision that the case was without foundation, the thing is referred back to the Home Office and the Home Secretary comes to exactly the same decision.

It is a great pity if, as a matter of policy, the Home Office has two bites of the cherry. These people are in considerable jeopardy. They have only two days to appeal. It seems that enough harm is done if the decision is reached once, not twice.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments.

Order for Third Reading read.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill has been thoroughly considered this evening and it obviously arouses considerable concerns in some parts of the House, which I hope that we have satisfied and answered adequately.

The need for the Bill is demonstrated and when it is on the statute book it will be a substantial improvement on our system for dealing with asylum applications. Despite the controversy over particular amendments, there is a wide range of agreement in most sections of the House.

I think that every hon. Member is agreed that Britain must continue to honour its international obligations under the 1951 convention and to adhere to our long-standing tradition of giving political asylum to people who flee here fearing persecution in their own country. I also trust that there is widespread support for the proposition that we must maintain our improving race relations and improve our community relations. We all know that those relationships are far from perfect, but we have a good record of improvement. In many ways the situation in this country is more satisfactory than that in other parts of the European Community or north America. One contributory factor to that steady improvement is the fact that the host community feels comfortable with present immigration controls.

We all know that in recent years we have faced sudden increased pressures, especially on the asylum front. About five years ago there was a sudden upsurge in the number of asylum applications. With hindsight, I do not think that that was because the world or certain key countries suddenly became more dangerous. For one reason or another there was sudden widespread awareness in the outside world that, because of the international obligations placed upon us to consider each application, an application for asylum was a way to establish residence in this country without satisfying the normal immigration rules.

Just like every other European country, we have experienced a sudden upsurge in applications. We are not alone among European countries in deciding that procedures need to be considered carefully if we are to be able to cope with those added pressures.

I could cover many of the provisions in the Bill at Third Reading, but I shall not do so as we have covered them exhaustively already. Essentially, the policy aim is to adhere to our international obligations, to investigate thoroughly each claim and to ensure that we continue to grant asylum in well-founded cases. To satisfy that obligation, it will help if we have a quicker system to deal with manifestly unfounded claims, to ensure that we turn away from these shores people who might otherwise come in excessive numbers—an important result—and who might impose a burden on our public services by establishing the right to live here when, in reality, they have no legal or any other basis for doing so.

I am sure that the pressures that we have faced during the past few years will not diminish during the coming decade. At times during the passage of the Bill it has been argued that the pressures that we face are not as acute as those faced by other European Community countries. The number of asylum applications to this country is sometimes contrasted with the 0·5 million people who enter the Federal Republic of Germany in one year to claim asylum, which is causing the Germans to reconsider their basic law and to find out what they can do.

Because the world remains a dangerous and turbulent place and because it is easier to travel, we must expect that ever greater numbers of people will want to come to this country to improve their quality of life. I feel no resentment at that. I am convinced that if I were young and single and living in some destitute third-world country, I might regard coming to the United Kingdom to establish a different future for myself from that which I could expect to enjoy in a third-world country as a legitimate aspiration. There is a part of me—as there must be of most Members of Parliament—that would like to satisfy vast numbers of those aspirations, but common sense tells us all, as it tells the majority of the British public, that we cannot accommodate flows on the scale that would follow from such a widespread and indiscriminate acceptance of entry into this country of people from poorer countries.

The 1951 Geneva convention was meant to set bounds to the right of asylum. Political asylum still means what it has always meant—the right to refuge, from a well-founded fear of individual persecution. The systems in the Bill provide a better and more sensible way to deal with that, they protect against fraud and provide a quicker way to determine all the difficult cases that are near the border line, which need to be determined with some expedition.

I therefore commend the Bill to the House. I believe that once it is in place we will see a marked improvement in our ability to deal with all the worrying pressures upon us. We will continue to discharge our obligations under the convention and in general in a humanitarian and sensible way. The Bill will enable us to do that in a practical manner.

Mr. Blair The Bill has been vigorously opposed by the Opposition for good reasons. I should like to pay tribute to my hon. Friends who served on the Committee for some 59 hours, which I am informed is more than twice the time spent on the same Bill when it was put to the House before the election.

Such scrutiny of the Bill has been necessary because of the huge strength of feeling not just in the House but outside against some of its provisions. Many of its elements are thoroughly objectionable. The procedures for shortening the time in which applicants can appeal against refusal of asylum have been condemned, not just here but throughout the land, as unfair and arbitrary. Many of the rules reflecting on the credibility of applicants seem to bear little relation to the reality of their position as asylum seekers. In particular, as we learnt from earlier debates, the removal of the right to appeal from those seeking visitors' visas is a measure without any justification—no justification was put forward for the abolition of those rights.

People who come here for a wedding, funeral or to pay a last visit to an elderly relative will have their right to appeal against refusal of entry taken from them. Last year, almost 2,000 such appeals were allowed. Injustices will mount up in the future and it is no surprise that this provision has caused deep and lasting offence within the Asian and other ethnic minority communities. As was pointed earlier, not once was that provision put before the people in an election manifesto; it was concealed before the election and introduced afterwards.

We do not take exception to the detailed provisions of the Bill alone, but to the ethos and prejudice that underlie it. We take exception to the assumption that asylum seekers should be treated as bogus until shown to be genuine. We take exception to the assumption that those from Pakistan or India who wish to visit their relatives will not feel the same sense of injustice and outrage as we would were we to be denied the right to visit our relatives in another country.

That prejudice, which runs throughout the Bill and which was the unspoken sentiment behind the entire deliberations of the Committee is nasty—worse than that; it is calculated. It is part of a design to play up this issue not for any interests of the public or the country, but simply for the interests of the Conservative party which sees that political capital can be made out of it. We saw that in debate after debate. The Home Secretary may have been fairly moderate on Third Reading, but hysterical claims were made earlier when isolated cases of fraud were used to construct an entire argument to provide that the current system is subject to wide-scale abuse.

An attempt has been made to portray anyone who has opposed the provisions on the ground of natural justice as someone who is advocating an irresponsible or open-door policy for immigration. All that has been done in the knowledge that those who will be most affected by the Bill will be of a different race or colour. I cannot believe that that is irrelevant to the way in which the Bill has been handled. This is a matter which arouses alarm among some of the population and which is designed to arouse the most virulent type of nationalism among others. An attempt has been made to pretend with varying degrees of crudity that those who seek to enter this country do so from the worst of motives rather than the worst of circumstances. Some elements of the debate may have been more elevated than that, but in several respects we have witnessed a fairly distasteful exercise—an attempt, under the guise of making necessary regulations, to stir up passions and prejudices that were better left dormant.

It will not be Members of Parliament who suffer once the Bill is enacted: it will be those who are least able to defend themselves and in the poorest condition to withstand some of its provisions—those most vulnerable to racial sentiment. I do not believe that that can possibly help good race relations in this country. The way in which the Bill is presented and the sentiment that underlies it do not merely make it objectionable in its provisions and unjust and arbitrary in its operation but reflect discredit on the Government who have introduced it.

Mr. Maclennan: The Bill reflects no credit on the Home Secretary or on the Government who have introduced it. It was conceived before the election in circumstances of political exaggeration. It was designed not to deal with an administrative problem that was out of control but to suggest that the party of government had a peculiar concern about the prospects of the people of Britain being faced with uncontrollable immigration if the party or parties of opposition were to gain office.

The then Home Secretary flagrantly stirred up racial animosity. In introducing this Bill, the present Home Secretary has, in large measure, fallen heir to a Bill designed by his predecessor—whom the Prime Minister, for whatever reason, decided should not continue in office. The present Home Secretary has compounded this unacceptable measure's ugly face by including clause 9, which enjoys little support among any of those concerned about race relations in Britain and which some of the Conservative Members who are most closely involved in these matters find distasteful at best and certainly unnecessary.

It is also an indication of the futility of our legislative process, particularly after the dominance of one party in government for well over a decade, that it has proved almost impossible to obtain any significant amendment to the Bill, even though those who have to deal with the problems of those seeking asylum and immigration agree, almost unanimously, that the Bill is misconceived. That has been true notably of those parts of the Bill that deal with the housing of asylum seekers. Local authorities, social work departments, voluntary agencies and all those agencies to whose advice the Government pay lip service have been united in saying that the Bill would work injustice and place intolerable administrative burdens upon the local authorities.

The Bill limits due process. If we had a decent constitution, the curtailment of rights of appeal would be unlikely to pass muster in the courts. But we do not have a proper constitutional system for dealing with these matters. We have to rely upon the sense of virtually all-powerful Ministers who cannot be shamed even by the more sensitive members of their own party into conceding the most modest amendments. That is why we shall vote against the Bill tonight.

Mr. Maddon: As a member of the Standing Committee on both asylum Bills, I have listened for many hours to Ministers seeking to justify the legislation. They have lamentably failed to do so, not only throughout those two Standing Committees, but again tonight. We heard nothing from the Home Secretary or the Parliamentary Under-Secretary or their predecessors to justify the legislation. They have been unable to call in aid any objective evidence or the views of any reputable organisation or individual to justify the legislation. I very much hope that the other place will defeat parts, if not all, of the Bill. If that is not the case and the legislation becomes law, and if, because of the unrealistic appeal rights given to those seeking asylum in this country, even one man or woman is sent back to torture or death, the responsibility for that will fall squarely on the Government.

The Bill's antecedents lie in the planning that was carried out by this Administration in 1982-83 when careful decisions were taken to restrict entry into this country, predominantly by black and Asian people, whether visitors, those seeking settlement, those coming for marriage or those seeking asylum. Almost every year, more and more restrictions have been introduced by legislation or by administrative action. Each year a few more rights have been chipped away. The Bill has substantially accelerated that process.

I very much regret clause 9, which did not form part of the original Bill. As has been said, I believe that that action was deliberately taken to avoid the embarrassment of criticism during a general election. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), who had the courage of his convictions and voted against clause 9. I have not had an opportunity of checking the voting list, but I suspect that a number of other Conservative Members who serve constituencies with substantial numbers of black and Asian constituents know the heartache that clause 9 will cause. It will divide families, and cause considerable concern, anger and resentment in the homes of many black and Asian constituents throughout the country.

There is no justification for the abolition of that right of appeal. That abolition sends out a signal to those people settled in this country, in some cases for two and three generations, that they are not welcome here or trusted, and that their relatives and friends are not even to be given the right to visit them in this country. Feelings will run deep.

Today more than a thousand people from this country, predominantly black and Asian people, expressed their anger at the abolition of the right of appeal against a refusal to grant a holiday in this country. They fear—their fears have been reinforced by some of the expressions used by the Home Secretary and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary today—that there may well be more to come. Will those seeking settlement applications in this country be fingerprinted? Will other rights of appeal on applications to enter this country be abolished? Is it the beginning of the slippery slope towards more restrictions and more difficulty?

Those involved look to the European Community. As has been said, it is possible in theory for 300 million EC nationals—predominantly white people—to enter this country without a visa, establish a business without any recognisable assets and have their parents, grandparents and children up to the age of 21 come to join them without any difficulty. Given that such people are not obliged to apply for permission to enter or for visas of any kind, the sense is created that there are two sets of citizens in this country: first-class citizens, who are predominantly white, and second-class citizens, who are predominantly black or Asian. The thrust of this legislation, which the Home Secretary is steamrolling through the House tonight, intensifies the feeling that there are indeed two such classes of citizen.

If we are to unite and overcome the great difficulties affecting race and community relations in this country, we should not pass such legislation. We need only a one-clause Bill to introduce an effective right of appeal for all—a system that will lead to applications being dealt with quickly and fairly, which is what Ministers say that they want. Such a right would help the general public. If Ministers really want to help them, there is no need for this Bill. All they need to do is inject more money into the system, providing more officials to deal with the applications.

There is no reason why applications for political asylum cannot be dealt with in six months, or 12 months at most. I do not seek to defend or justify delays of up to five years. Someone who came to see me last week had put in an application that has been considered now for five years. There is no justification for that, but we do not need the Bill to remedy it. We need a Government that is anxious to provide justice and efficiency, not a Minister who accuses those of us who are concerned with such matters of wallowing in compassion.

Mr. Corbyn: I deeply regret the fact that the Bill has reached Third Reading. We saw off the last attempt to introduce such a Bill, with the onset of the general election, but now another Bill has returned to us.

There is enormous opposition to the Bill outside the House. Despite the attempts by newspapers to whip up support for limiting rights to political asylum in this country, considerable numbers of people have expressed concern and signed petitions when they have seen asylum seekers from former Yugoslavia, Zaire, Somalia and other countries denied entry. More than 6,000 people have signed a petition to be presented to the House tomorrow, supported by the Refugee Council. Large numbers of people are deeply worried about turning our backs on people who seek safety within our shores.

People are also worried about the barbed wire barrier constructed around western Europe to limit the numbers of people seeking safety here. In response to the racist and fascist attacks in Germany, the response has not been, as it should have been, a wholehearted attack on the fascists. Instead, the system which grants people political asylum has been blamed for the rise of the far right. People should read the history of Europe in the 1920s and 1930s and recognise what appeasement did then—and what the appeasement of fascists and racists will do now.

The Bill has implications for democracy, too. Increasingly, decisions are being taken in secret by the Trevi group of Ministers, not in open debates in Parliaments. The Bill has implications for local authorities, which are expected to become the agents of the Home Office in dealing with refugee matters. It has implications for everyone's civil liberties because it will enable children to be fingerprinted merely because their parents or guardians have brought them here to seek political asylum. It will sweep away the right of appeal against totally erroneous decisions by immigration officers. It is surely a basis of democracy that anyone who makes a decision affecting others should be subject to challenge. People should have a right of redress, but the Bill will take it away.

The introduction of a visa requirement for transit passengers travelling through British airports is an extension of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987. That Act stops people seeking political asylum in this country and those people are primarily from Sri Lanka. The visa requirement for transit passengers will stop people in transit at airports such as Heathrow from approaching an immigration officer and seeking political asylum. The effects are quite appalling. There are obvious commercial effects, but I am more concerned about the effects on the rights of asylum seekers.

I hope that no hon. Member will ever have to seek political asylum. Millions of people who lived under oppressive regimes and sought safety and asylum in various parts of the world are now venerated as a good part of history. When the history of the 1980s and 1990s is written and people read that those who tried to escape from tyrannical regimes were denied entry to Britain, our history will be seen as just as infamous as the histories of countries in western Europe in the 1920s and 1930s that refused asylum to Jewish people who subsequently perished in the gas chambers. The issue is as serious as that, and the Bill is part of a process of turning our backs on oppression and its causes, perhaps because we make too much money from selling arms to regimes which use them to kill their own people.

Cheap remarks have been made about those of us who supported the right of Viraj Mendes to stay in this country. I remind hon. Members who made those remarks that in the year after he was deported back to Sri Lanka, after being in this country for 16 years, 60,000 illegal killings occurred in that country. The British high commissioner was expelled from Sri Lanka a year later because he had the temerity to criticise the human rights record of its Government. Could anyone say that Mendes was sent back to a place of safety? He had to live in hiding for more than a year.

We oppose the Bill. If it is passed, I hope that the House of Lords will amend it in a way that makes it virtually useless. I hope that the campaign for decency, civil rights and the right of appeal will continue. Above all, I hope that the campaign for genuine internationalism and understanding outside the House will continue. I hope that we shall stop turning our backs on people who plead for our help and support and a place of safety. We have had enough newspaper campaigns and racist remarks in support of the Bill. I hope that future campaigns will operate differently and that we can look forward to a world based on humanity and sanity rather than one that closes doors on people who need help.

Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall): I spoke on Second Reading and voted against the Bill. It is a sad day when Conservative Members are forced against their consciences to support the Bill. The legislation will have its worst effect in my constituency because many people from the Indian sub-continent come here to stay with relatives. They do that for various reasons.

In the past this country has provided natural justice and people had recourse to the courts for mistaken decisions. That fundamental right is being taken away and that is against this country's history and traditions and its natural justice. The Bill is evil and immoral. I have opposed it and I shall oppose it again.

The Secretary of State knows that, when I last went to India, I was able to see Sir Nicholas Fenn, our high commissioner. I was given the opportunity to see some of the officers working in the British high commission in New Delhi. I am sure that they are not happy about the Bill. They did not want to spell out why they were not happy, but they knew that until now, if the entry clearance officer made a mistake, those involved could go to a court of law to test his decisions.

I am not happy about the Bill. It will affect the position of many Tory Members of Parliament in the next election. I know that during the last general election campaign many Ministers visited constituencies with a large number of Asians. Many Tory Members, who have thousands of Asians and black people in their constituencies, know that they now have potential political foes. I know that promises were given to the Asian communities and lies were told to the people. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can rephrase that.

Mr. Khabra: I can put it this way. Untruths were told to the people. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is in order as long as he is not saying that anyone has told lies in the House.

Mr. Khabra: The Conservative party is the party of family. It believes in family unity. Family members should be able to meet each other in this country. A false promise had been made. People were not told the truth. Conservative Members should take note of the fact that in the next election—perhaps the council elections in 1994, or the elections for the European Parliament—their party will not be spared. They should consider their position. I know that many of them are already searching their consciences and they should have the courage of their convictions and vote against this wicked, evil Bill. I oppose it and I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to do the same.

MEMBERS' INTERESTS

Ordered,

That Mr. William Ross be added to the Select Committee on Members' Interests.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Procedure (Public Petitions)

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I beg to move,

That this House approves the recommendations contained in paragraphs 15 and 16 of the Fourth Report of Session 1991-92 from the Select Committee on Procedure, relating to Public Petitions (HC 286).

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order, order.

PETITION

Garden Centre, Stockton-on-Tees

12.10 am

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I beg leave to present a petition collected by Peter Barratt's garden centre, Yarm road, Stockton-on-Tees, and signed by 1,324 people. It says simply that they want to be able to continue to shop at their local garden centre on Sunday mornings and afternoons.

To lie upon the Table.

Hillingdon Hospital (Incinerator)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

12.11 am

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): My purpose in speaking in this Adjournment debate is to make the House aware of the deep sense of grievance felt by my constituents in Hillingdon about the pollution of their environment caused by the operation of the Hillingdon hospital incinerator plant. It is also to call on my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside to use his considerable influence and powers under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to protect the people whom I represent from the emission of noxious substances into the atmosphere, the noise caused by the operation of the incinerator and the disturbance caused by the delivery of clinical waste at all hours in large vehicles in a residential area.

I also call upon my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that the people who sent me to the House to represent them can enjoy the peace and quiet of their homes and gardens—which is surely every Englishman's right—and to see that the statutory body established by Parliament to license the proper disposal of waste puts the interests of residents first, not last, and that it cracks down on the illegal activities of those who seek to avoid responsibility for their actions. Above all, I want the existing operation of the incinerator plant in a residential area brought to an end as quickly as possible.

This is a classic example of the kind of case that a Member of Parliament brings to the House in his representative capacity. The background is that an application was submitted by Hillingdon area health authority to Hillingdon council in July 1990 for an extension to the incinerator plant at Hillingdon hospital. It was made at a time when the authority had the benefit of Crown immunity. Subsequently the incinerator plant was extended to include a condenser unit and a gas plant. It was not a planning application in the accepted sense because the area health authority enjoyed the benefit of Crown immunity. It was, therefore, required only to consult the local planning authority before proceeding with a development that would otherwise have required planning permission in the normal way.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, that immunity was removed from health authorities on 1 April 1991, but still existed when the proposals were considered. Local residents were consulted by Hillingdon council's planning department, and six residents responded. In November 1990, the council's environment sub-committee decided that, had this been an application for normal planning permission, approval would have been granted subject to conditions. However, it was not, and still is not, possible for the council to attach conditions in respect of consultations. Consequently, the council states that there are no conditions to fulfil. As far as I can tell, the only body able to attach conditions was, and is, the London Waste Regulatory Authority, which is responsible for licensing the operation of the disposal of waste.

Having said that, I should add that it is important to put the proposed extension into perspective. I understand that, at the time when residents were consulted by the local planning authority, the original incinerator burnt 10 to 15 tonnes of clinical waste each week; it was burnt during the daytime only. The waste originated from three local hospitals in the health authority's jurisdiction. The only annoyance to local residents was the occasional emission of smuts which spoilt the washing on local washing lines, and minor damage to the paintwork of cars parked in the area. Even those difficulties had been minimised following representations that I had made, over a number of years, on behalf of my constituents.

It was against that background that local residents were advised that the proposed extension to the original incinerator was needed to facilitate the installation of a cleaner burning plant to enable compliance with legislation governing emissions to the atmosphere. Local people also believed that the extension was to cater for local needs alone. It was therefore not surprising that only six residents responded to the consultative process, and that the planning authority would have recommended acceptance had this been a normal planning application. In fact, the position has turned out to be very different from what was expected.

A number of local residents consider that the local planning authority misjudged, or was not properly informed about, the scale of the development and the impact that it would have on a residential area. They also tell me that they consider that the use of Crown immunity was inappropiate, and that the local health authority's proposals should have been subjected to statutory "bad neighbour" development procedures. I hope that my hon. Friend will comment on that when he replies.

Let me now describe the reality of the situation that faces my constituents. It is not a comparatively minor extension to the incinerator plant, or just an improvement in measures to control emissions to the atmosphere adopted by a benevolent health authority; in fact, it has turned out to be a fairly substantial clinical waste incineration operation, run by Basic Energy (UK) Ltd, a wholly owned subsidiary of Blue Circle Industries. In other words, it is a commercial waste disposal industry, operating 24 hours a day in the middle of a residential area and burning not 10 to 15 tonnes—as happened previously—but 300 tonnes of waste each week.

It appears that to achieve that massive increase in throughput, the old incinerator plant was virtually demolished, and has been replaced with a new and larger building. At the outset, the operators began burning rubber tyres, and stopped only as a result of local opposition. Moreover, it started to operate before a certificate of registration had been obtained from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. Although an application was made on 21 March, it was not granted until 27 November 1991. Despite requests by local residents to Basic Energy to see the licence and the authorisation by HMIP, they were not granted.

Another aspect of the matter that infuriates my constituents is that clinical waste is being delivered to the plant from all over the country—from places as far away as Durham and Newcastle. There are inadequate storage facilities for the waste. I am talking about dressings, disposable syringes and similar material that one would expect would have to be disposed of by hospitals carrying out surgical operations and the like.

For this and other reasons, large vehicles are being unloaded throughout the night, with all the associated noise that that causes. I am told that there is no ash facility under cover and that ash was stored in open containers adjacent to the hospital swimming pool. This ash contained unburnt clinical dressings and syringes. Consequently, my constituents maintained that Basic Energy was not observing the conditions of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution's registration, although that was subsequently remedied. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution also issued an eight-point improvement notice on this operator, but unfortunately the problems persist.

I come now to the responsibilities of the London Waste Regulatory Authority. What action has it taken to deal with the problems faced by local residents who are unable to use their gardens in the summer because of noise, smells and other similar manifestations? The London Waste Regulatory Authority does not seem to have acted promptly, and it was not until comparatively recently that it took action and insisted that the plant should be run properly.

Why did the LWRA apparently permit an unauthorised incinerator plant to continue in operation without a licence? Why did it take so long to act, following alleged breaches of conditions of its licence? It was, after all, at a meeting of the authority's licensing and registration sub-committee on 21 July 1992 that the licence was eventually granted. At that meeting, the officers were instructed to "take further appropriate enforcement action in consultation with the Chief Solicitor, should operations at the facility not be in full compliance with the licence, including the working plan, within one week of its issue, save that no enforcement action shall be taken if the facility has ceased to operate by the end of that week and remains non-operational until such time as full compliance with the terms of the licence can be achieved."

Subsequently, following the alleged breaches of the conditions, LWRA officers visited the site. A prosecution is now pending at Uxbridge magistrates court. I realise that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot comment on the prosecution. However, I ask him to tell me how the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 can and will be activated to protect my constituents. Following a meeting with my hon. Friend, I understand that it is necessary for the operator of this incinerator plant to reapply for a new licence. As I understand the position, it must be applied for between 1 October 1992 and the spring of this year.

I believe that the views of HMIP will be of the utmost importance in considering whether a new licence should be granted. I believe that it should not be granted. I consider it to be unacceptable to permit the storage and burning of clinical waste from all over Britain in an incinerator plant located in the middle of a residential area. There are other commercial incineration facilities well away from people's homes that could be utilised for this purpose. That is where hospitals from all round the country should send bandages, syringes, low-level radioactive waste material and other material which needs to be disposed of. Surely, if the Environmental Protection Act 1990 means anything, we should insist on the closure of this plant now.

This is an important test case. If the incinerator continues as it is at present, the Environmental Protection Act 1990 will be shown to be wanting. I call on my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside to act and to show that he and HMIP are determined to stop this pollution without delay.

The Minister for the Environment and Countryside (Mr. David Maclean): I am well aware of the public complaint surrounding the Hillingdon hospital incinerator. I have corresponded with my hon. Friend several times, and met him to discuss this distressing matter. I am sorry to hear that his constituents are still unhappy with the situation. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for vigorously pursuing the matter in the interests of his constituents.

It might be helpful to the House if I were to set out some of the background to this matter because it is slightly complicated. In July 1990, Hillingdon health authority referred a proposal to the London borough of Hillingdon, as the local planning authority, to replace its existing incinerator, which was a very rudimentary affair, and could not possibly have met present day standards for pollution control. That was done under the arrangements then in force for Crown development as set out in circular 18/84. By this procedure, the developing department, although benefiting from Crown immunity, notifies the planning authority of its proposal either in outline or in full detail. If the planning authority objects and the dispute cannot be resolved, the developing department may refer the case to the Secretary of State. Although the new incinerator was considerably larger than the old one, the local authority raised no objections, and the proposal was not referred to the Department.

The new incinerator was subsequently built during 1991 and is owned and operated by Basic Energy (UK) Ltd., a member of the Blue Circle group of companies. The incinerator built by Basic Energy has up-to-date pollution abatement equipment and monitoring and control systems, and was designed to achieve present day standards. In principle, that is surely a most beneficial way of disposing of waste of this kind, both rendering the waste biologically and chemically harmless and reducing the emission of combustion products from the hospital's own heavy oil-fired boilers. In addition, the heat generated from the incinerator of the clinical waste is used to raise steam to heat the hospital.

Under current legislation releases to the air from the incinerator are regulated by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. The London Waste Regulatory Authority regulates the waste disposal operation. Both bodies are obliged to register or licence a proposed activity unless they believe that harm will be done to the environment or that there is a danger to public health.

HMIP registered the incinerator in November 1991 under the legislation current at the time, the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. As required by statutory instrument 318 of 1989, the public was consulted, but no responses were received from local residents.

The regulation of the delivery, handling and storage of clinical waste, and the disposal of the ash from the incinerator, fell to the LWRA. Initially, there was some uncertainty in the LWRA about whether the site required a waste disposal licence under the Control of Pollution Act because of the imminent application of integrated pollution control under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

At the end of 1991, the LWRA advised Basic Energy that a licence would be required. A licence was granted in July 1992 after extensive public consultation, although under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 the only statutory consultees are the National Rivers Authority and the local waste collection authority. However, since the plant has come into operation over the last year I am aware that there have been problems and that many complaints have been received from the public and routed through to my hon. Friend.

The LWRA considers that the site is being operated in breach of its licence conditions, but the company is disputing the interpretation of some of the conditions and the matter is to go to court on 25 January. I understand that the company has notified the Department of its intention to appeal to the Secretary of State against the licence conditions. In view of these developments, it would be inappropraite for me to comment any further on this matter because my hon. Friend will appreciate that we are in a quasi-judicial position.

Since the operation started, HMIP for its part has not been fully satisfied with the management of the releases to the atmosphere. Inspectors visited the site 34 times in 1992 —far more than is usual for plants of this type and size —and met representatives of the local community on a number of occasions to hear their complaints at first hand. They have considered prosecution on specific occasions, but there has never been sufficient evidence to support this. However, they have served two improvement notices which have secured specific improvements over and above those obtained by the constant pressure exerted by inspectors.

HMIP has arranged for independent tests on emissions to air on a number of occasions as well as requiring more tests from the company. The most recent tests done on behalf of HMIP show that the incinerator emissions are within the current standards set by the conditions of the certificate of registration.

I also know that offensive odours have occasioned complaints and HMIP has arranged for Warren Spring laboratory to carry out an odour assessment. The results are due shortly and I will let my hon. Friend have a copy of them in due course.

HMIP has also received complaints about the frequency with which the incinerator dump stack operates. The dump stack is necessary for safety reasons and HMIP is satisfied that its operation does not harm the environment. None the less, it has called for a programme, which is shortly to be completed, to reduce the number of times that the dump stack is used and to improve the standards of maintenance of the dump stack and its control system.

As well as releases to the atmosphere, I understand that local residents have complained about noise pollution and my hon. Friend mentioned it tonight. This is primarily a matter for the local authority. The Environmental Protection Act 1990 now provides environmental health officers with extensive powers to control noise which they consider to be a statutory nuisance.

For completeness, the House may want to know that the operation of the incinerator is also authorised under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 to continue the disposal of small quantities of radioactive waste from patient care. This is a common practice at hospitals and HMIP has reassessed the emissions and remains fully satisfied that the public are properly protected.

Under the legislation operating at the time the new incinerator was commissioned, the regulation of the site was split between HMIP and LWRA. On 31 October 1992, the incinerator fell to regulation under the Environmental Protection Act 1990. That is powerful new legislation which applies integrated pollution control to air, water and land. Basic Energy has submitted an application for authorisation as required by the Act and this will be placed on the public registers held by HMIP, the local authority and the National Rivers Authority.

I can assure my hon. Friend that HMIP will scrutinise the application closely and, before determining it, will take into account all comments from members of the public and the statutory consultees. The company will have to demonstrate that it can meet the new plant standards laid down by the chief inspector's guidance notes for clinical waste incinerators. In anticipation of that, and under pressure from the LWRA, I understand that the company has already applied for planning permission to extend the incinerator building to improve its waste handling practices, and I presume that that is an attempt to deal with the problem of bins being loaded, as shown by the photos that my hon. Friend kindly sent me.

I do not wish to say anything tonight about the conditions to be set in any authorisation as that could prejudice the position of the Secretary of State as regards appeals against decisions by Her Majesty's chief inspector of pollution. Indeed I am afraid that I must tell my hon. Friend that in this matter there are a number of things which I cannot say because of legal reasons and which prevent me from appearing as sympathetic as I would like to be to the concerns that my hon. Friend has raised and to his constituents. I cannot discuss any appeal against the licence condition, nor any matter which is to come before the courts. I am sure that my hon. Friend will also understand that I cannot discuss any matter relating to the planning permission currently being sought nor, as I have just said, any condition to be set under integrated pollution-control legislation.

Although I cannot go into those issues now, I am very well aware of local public concern about the plant. I can assure my hon. Friend that laws against pollution will be firmly upheld. HMIP, the LWRA and the local authority have, I know, all been doing what they can, within the powers that they have, and have secured improvements in the operation of the plant, which will be consolidated in any authorisation issued under the Environmental Protection Act 1990. I am confident that they will continue to keep the operation under close supervision so as properly to protect the environment for us all.

But it is only fair to my hon. Friend that I should make it clear to the House that I will not permit pollution control legislation to be used to close an industrial site which local residents feel is sited in the wrong place. That would be a misuse of pollution control law to deal with a matter which is properly for planning law. Therefore, I cannot—to use my hon. Friend's words—bring its operation to an end, as he asks, merely because it is sited in a residential area, even though I have every sympathy for him and for his constituents. I repeat my assurance that, now that the incinerator is under the control of the integrated pollution control provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, its tough provisions will be fairly applied—but applied they will be. I hope that that will improve the local environment and that my hon. Friend's constituents will see that the law is adequate to protect them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes to One o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

DEFENCE

Arms Sales

1. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent contacts his Department has had with the Indonesian Defence Ministry about arms sales.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): My Department has a number of contacts with the Indonesian Defence Ministry covering a variety of issues. Those contacts are, however, a confidential matter for the two Governments.

Mrs. Mahon: Will the Minister confirm that the sale of British Aerospace Hawk combat aircraft to Indonesia is to go ahead? Is he aware that the Indonesian Government have illegally occupied East Timor for many years and have killed more than a third of its population? Does not he feel any shame at all that, despite the lessons of the Gulf, the British Government are continuing to sell arms to a murderous dictator?

Mr. Hamilton: The point of selling Hawk aircraft to Indonesia is to give jobs to people in this country. There is no doubt in my mind that a Hawk aircraft can do nothing to suppress the people of East Timor. The aircraft is not suitable for that purpose and we have guarantees from the Indonesians that the aircraft would not be used for internal suppression.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, by third-world standards, the Indonesian regime's human rights record is considerably better than many and is improving all the time? Does he share my sadness that a country which is trying to improve its human rights record, which will be the major player in that part of the world and which has shown that it wants to be friends with Britain, should be constantly denigrated in ludicrous terms such as we have just heard?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, and the fact that we do business with Indonesia puts us in a position where we can influence the actions of that Government. We constantly make every effort to improve their human rights record and to improve the situation in East Timor.

Scottish Regiments and Battalions

2. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received in the review of Scottish regiments and battalions; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): A number of representations have been received about the future of Scottish regiments and battalions, all of which have been noted.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that it is becoming abundantly apparent from those representations that the regiments and the infantry are becoming overstretched on current commitments? Given that, will the Secretary of State further acknowledge that a reassessment of the Government's position on regimental mergers in Scotland would be welcome? The Secretary of State will have seen the comments of the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that he has already been engaged in such a private reassessment. Is that the case and, if so, will he take this opportunity to share that information with the rest of the House?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's supplementary question refers to Army manpower as a whole. I am satisfied that at present we can meet all our obligations without undue overstretch. If I ever came to a different conclusion, it would be appropriate to review the assumptions of "Options for Change".

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that he has always made it clear that Army manpower and the pressures on the Army are subject to constant review in the light of events? That is what I have been saying. Will he also confirm that the Scottish regiments are part of the fabric that makes the United Kingdom united, as is Rosyth dockyard, and that the political implications must also be taken into consideration?

Mr. Rifkind: I can certainly confirm that the Scottish regiments have made a fine and honourable contribution to the requirements of the United Kingdom armed forces over many years and I am sure that that will continue. As my hon. Friend knows, the future of the dockyards in the United Kingdom is presently under consideration.

Dr. Reid: What a complacent answer that was from the Secretary of State when neither he nor the Minister of State for the Armed Forces can give me a guarantee that our infantry men and women serving in Bosnia will not receive redundancy notices even while they are there and under fire. Is not it clear that we cannot possibly sustain two extra battalions in Northern Ireland, maintain an extended military force in Bosnia, assign units to an enhanced Western European Union, as the Secretary of State has promised, and contribute to the Gulf on the basis of defence plans that were drawn up before any of those commitments were known? Why does not the Secretary of State now do the honourable thing, carry out a full defence review and ensure that we have the troops necessary to meet the commitments that he and the Foreign Secretary keep making?

Mr. Rifkind: I would find the hon. Gentleman's indignation less synthetic if he did not represent a party whose conference called for further reductions in defence expenditure amounting to many billions of pounds. He should make up his mid about whether his party's policy accords with the views of its members.

Arms Sales

3. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on defence sales to Kuwait.

Mr. Rifkind: I signed a defence equipment memorandum of understanding with Kuwait on 2 December. This will enable Kuwait to purchase defence equipment directly on a Government-to-Government basis from the United Kingdom Ministry of Defence, which will place and manage contracts with British equipment manufacturers. Negotiations are already taking place for the sale of GKN's Warrior and Piranha vehicles.

Mr. Evans: That news will be welcomed by the many thousands of people who are involved in the defence industry in this country, especially in the north-west. In 1990, defence sales amounted to £3 billion.

Will my right hon. and learned Friend note the policy of Opposition Members who are opposed to the sale of arms to non-democracies, thereby jeopardising this country's defence industry and the contract that he has mentioned? That could lead to a loss of jobs in this country.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the remarks of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), who, speaking on behalf of the Opposition, opposed any arms sales to non-democracies. If his policy were implemented, the many British industries that will benefit from sales to countries such as Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, and to middle eastern countries, would be gravely jeopardised and there would be many job losses as a consequence.

Mr. Dalyell: Has the Secretary of State, or any senior Ministry of Defence official, read Kenneth Timmerman's book "The Death Lobby—How the West Armed Iraq"? Given the behaviour of the Kuwaitis towards the Palestinians and many others who built up Kuwait, given the human rights situation and given the legal difficulties over the border with Iraq, would not it be better—in the face of the appalling abyss presented by the alternative—at least to enter into some kind of dialogue with Baghdad?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is incredibly naive if he believes that dialogue with Baghdad is likely to prove fruitful. At this very moment, we are witnessing Saddam Hussein's intransigence in refusing to recognise even the authority of the United Nations Security Council.

Mr. Conway: Will my right hon. and learned Friend take the opportunity to congratulate the excellent management and work force of GKN in Shropshire, which makes the Warrior vehicle—and, more important, Perkins Engines in Shrewsbury, which produces the engine that fires that tremendous vehicle—on the expertise and workmanship that have resulted in such a saleable product?

Mr. Rifkind: I am happy to do so. The fact that the United Kingdom has increased its share of the world market from 17 to 20 per cent. in the past year is a tribute to the professionalism, experience and dedication of the many hundreds of thousands of people who work in our defence industries, including those mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Mr. David Clark: Have the Kuwaitis made any requests for defence equipment recently, in view of the Iraqi incursions into their territory? Do the Government believe that the United Nations did or did not approve that equipment and what does the Secretary of State think should be done if the incursions continue?

Mr. Rifkind: We are currently negotiating with the Kuwaitis about their possible interest in Warrior and Piranha armoured vehicles. They have expressed great interest in taking forward the contracts. As for the recent incursions into Kuwaiti territory, the United Nations Security Council has made it clear that that is unacceptable behaviour and has demanded that the Iraqis return the Silkworm missiles that were removed and cease their transgressions with regard to the frontier between Iraq and Kuwait.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, apart from selling arms to Kuwait, we should give the Kuwaitis strong advice about how to protect the defence equipment in their care? Will he and the Government ensure that representations are made—not only to the United Nations, but to the Kuwaiti authorities—about the recent scandalous stealing of equipment by the Iraqis which suggests that the Kuwaiti authorities have been extremely negligent?

Mr. Rifkind: The equipment in question was in the hands of United Nations personnel, who, under United Nations rules, are unable to be armed. For that reason, the Iraqis who crossed the border were able to remove the equipment. That was unacceptable and the Security Council has made its views known.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply——

Madam Speaker: Order. As it was not the hon. Gentleman's substantive question, I cannot take that as a point of order.

"Options for Change"

4. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what cutbacks in defence procurement are envisaged in Wales due to the policies inherent in "Options for Change".

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The effect on Wales of any reductions in defence procurement will depend on individual companies' success in winning business and on their commercial decisions about the size and location of their manufacturing facilities.

Mr. Llwyd: Does the Minister agree that the west of Wales has suffered very badly recently, with the imminent closure of RAF Brawdy and Trecwn and today's news that 300 jobs will go at Pendine? Will he assure us that the Ministry will work closely with the Welsh Office to secure some new job opportunities for this highly skilled work force, who are literally without hope?

Mr. Hamilton: We are already working closely with the Welsh office on Trecwn and Brawdy in west Wales. We keep in touch about the other ramifications of the proposals, but we are not directly responsible for defence manufacturers in Wales. We very much regret the adjustments that were made to the work force which led to the recent job losses.

Mr. John Marshall: What would have happened to defence procurement in Wales and elsewhere if my right hon. Friend had listened to the advice of members of the Labour and Liberal parties?

Mr. Hamilton: Exactly. It is always amazing to see the resolutions that are passed at the conferences of the Opposition parties to cut defence expenditure radically, yet during defence questions Opposition Members constantly jump up and down saying that job losses are regrettable and that we should do all that we can to stimulate orders for defence equipment. As my hon. Friend said, the two do not tie together. The effect of a Labour Government, or indeed a Labour-Liberal Government, would be devastating on defence jobs across the country.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: In the past few days it has become clear that the Pendine proof and experimental establishment in my constituency is under severe threat of closure under the defence review, with the loss of 300 jobs. The base has several unique facilities. It has an excellent cost-efficiency record with the lowest cost per employee of any land unit and it is the only base that makes a profit. Will the Minister assure me that decisions about the future of these establishments will be based on fair cost comparisons? What has he to say to the 300 people in Pendine who are worried about their jobs?

Mr. Hamilton: Whenever a decision is taken to close a defence establishment, every consideration is taken into account, including the implications for local employment. The fact remains that we are dealing with a receding and reducing defence budget and must find savings where we can.

Mountain Rescue

5. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about his Department's participation in mountain rescue work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My Department has received a number of representations about its participation in mountain rescue work. The open government document, "The Future Provision of Royal Air Force Search and Rescue Helicopters", gives full details of the services that are made available by my Department for mountain rescue work. A copy is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Minister aware that heavy demand over the Christmas and new year period exposed the inadequacy of the existing helicopter emergency service? For example, a fortnight ago the Killin mountain rescue team took four hours to carry an injured man off a treacherous mountainside because all the helicopters were otherwise engaged. As the decision to withdraw the helicopter emergency service from Leuchars from April was taken without any meaningful consultation with bodies such as the Scottish Sports Council and the Mountain Rescue Committee for Scotland, will the Minister act now to ensure meaningful consultations with a view to reversing the closure decision and to replacing the Wessex flight at Leuchars with Sea Kings? Otherwise, there is a real danger that lives will be lost.

Mr. Hamilton: I cannot comment on the particular case of a mountain rescue team taking four hours to bring someone down, but, in such circumstances, the weather is invariably so bad that mountain rescue teams are the only people who can get to the beleagured person. We should not fool ourselves—nor should the hon. Gentleman—that helicopters can operate in all weathers, because they cannot. The point of mountain rescue teams is that they can operate in virtually any weather whereas helicopters cannot always reach the necessary areas.

While making changes to the search and rescue operation, we are fulfilling the civil requirement of being able to get anywhere from the base within an hour and that will be adequately carried out by the Sea Kings from Lossiemouth.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Will the Minister take the opportunity to commend the efforts of the mountain rescue team at RAF Leuchars which, in the past 24 hours, has been engaged in such tasks as rescuing stranded motorists and ensuring that meals on wheels are delivered to those who need them? Does he realise that such efforts create a very warm relationship between the Royal Air Force and the community and that that relationship is likely to be prejudiced by the withdrawal of search and rescue facilities from RAF Leuchars because it is well known that the quality of cover will be reduced in Fife and that lives may be put at risk? There is still time for the Government to think again and to accept that the best way in which to proceed is to replace the Wessex with the Sea King at RAF Leuchars.

Mr. Hamilton: To answer the first part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's question, I certainly commend the mountain rescue team at Leuchars and I am glad that it will continue to carry out its job there. I have already commented on helicopters—mountain rescue teams need them to take up their advance parties, but they move independently with the bulk of their people and are not dependent on helicopters for their work. I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's point about the recent very bad weather—about 60 cars were identified by the helicopters from Leuchars—but the Sea Kings from Lossiemouth will cover most of that area. As the hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledged, they are much better helicopters and can fly in much worse weather.

Mr. Martlew: Does the Minister accept that his decision last October to close four RAF bases involved in search and rescue will mean an extra response time in coastal areas and in the mountains? It is not good enough for the Minister to say that we shall continue to meet the civil criteria, because his decision last October will mean that lives will be lost. Will he decide today to reverse the closures and satisfy the need for rescue teams in coastal and mountain areas because we are frightened that, if he does not, lives will be lost?

Mr. Hamilton: Our search and rescue capability is set up for military needs and we have found that we can reduce the military requirement and still remain well within the civil requirement. It must be true that if one doubled the number of search and rescue bases and cut response time to half an hour, the number of people who suffered as a result would probably fall, but that would involve enormous costs. The civil requirement means getting a helicopter there within an hour and we are still able to fulfil that civil requirement.

Arms Diversification

6. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representation his Department has received about Government assistance towards arms diversification.

Mr. Rifkind: We receive a variety of representations from time to time on the question of arms diversification. The product ranges in which companies compete is, however, a matter best left to their own commercial judgment.

Mr. Miller: Against the background of recent arms cuts involving redundancies in my area, such as those at British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., British Aerospace, GEC and Cammell Laird, and in view of the Government's statement at the NATO meeting in Rome in November 1991 that they would support eastern European countries in their diversification, does not the Minister think that it is about time that he gave such support to British companies? Does he agree with the managing director of British Aerospace's military aircraft division that the Government have no policy on spin-off technologies?

Mr. Rifkind: British industry has not requested Government assistance for diversification. That is perfectly straightforward because it believes, rightly, that it is in the best position to judge what is in the interests of companies and how best to diversify to meet its changing needs. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, notwithstanding defence cuts, £9 billion worth of orders are placed primarily with British industry for defence procurement, so it is a continuing massive source of employment.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My right hon. and learned Friend has the difficult task of trying to trim the defence budget to close to our target, which is well above what the Opposition parties would try to achieve. Has he had conversations with my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade about the moneys available for communities that will be affected by defence cuts? When we cut miners' jobs, the Government immediately had £1 billion available for the mining communities. It seems strange that we do not have similar plans for the communities affected by defence cuts.

Mr. Rifkind: As my hon. Friend will be aware, any area that experiences large unemployment can benefit from the Government's regional policy and from the special assistance available to parts of the country that fall within the relevant criteria.

Nuclear Warheads (Soviet Union)

7. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the number of nuclear warheads remaining within the area of the old Soviet Union.

Mr. Rifkind: We estimate that there are some 27,000 or more nuclear warheads remaining within the area of the old Soviet Union.

Mr. Banks: There would be a big bang if they all went off together. All sane people clearly welcome the START 2 strategic arms reduction treaty. What financial and technical assistance has been provided to Russia, to Ukraine and to the other countries in eastern Europe to dismantle their nuclear weapons? Goiven START 2 and the end of the cold war, is not it time for the Government to give up the ridiculous Trident scheme? It is a criminal waste of money as there is clearly no enemy against which it will be pitched. It seems to be a case of political penis envy by the Government.

Mr. Rifkind: On the earlier part of the question, we are providing support to Russia and to other countries in a similar position for dismantling their surplus nuclear weapons. As for the rather absurd comments in the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, I remind him that not only does the former Soviet Union still have 27,000 nuclear warheads, but even after 10 years and the full implementation of the START 2 agreement, Russia will still have more than 3,000 strategic nuclear warheads, which is more than enough to create enormous devastation around the world.

Mrs. Browning: Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that we shall monitor the decommissioning and movement of those warheads in the Soviet Union? Will he also assure the House that Britain will maintain an independent nuclear deterrent as long as it is felt expedient to do so and while there are threats around the world from who knows where—not only from the old Warsaw pact countries—which make such a deterrent vital for the safety of our people?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. Measures will be taken to monitor the decommissioning or destruction of surplus nuclear weapons in Russia and in the United States. On the latter part of my hon. Friend's question, the United Kingdom's approach has always been to maintain the minimum deterrent that we require. In the case of Russia and the United States, there were aspirations to parity which resulted in huge increases in strategic nuclear weapons in both countries. Those weapons are now being cut by two thirds. We very much welcome that change, but both the United States and Russia will still have many more strategic nuclear weapons than the United Kingdom contemplates.

Somalia

8. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the progress of the United Kingdom involvement in the military operation in Somalia.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom has deployed two Royal Air Force Hercules aircraft together with about 90 RAF personnel to assist in Operation Restore Hope in Somalia. The aircraft are currently based with United States forces in Mombasa in Kenya and since 12 December have been engaged in the transport of humanitarian relief stores to affected areas inside Somalia.

Mr. Hanson: Given Britain's historic role in Somalia, does the Secretary of State agree that we should be doing far more than we are at present to assist the United Nations relief operation there? Is it not the case, however, that, due to the mismanagement of defence forces alluded to earlier, we are not capable of supporting United Nations resolutions but have to rely on the world's policeman, the United States, to do it for us? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the defence review is needed urgently?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman could not be more incorrect. With more than 3,500 British forces allocated to various United Nations operations around the world, Britain is at present contributing more personnel to the work of the United Nations than any country other than France. That shows the worthlessness of the hon. Gentleman's criticism.

Surface Ships (Portsmouth)

9. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many commissioned surface ships of the Royal Navy are based at Portsmouth.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are 23 Royal Navy surface ships, including minor war vessels, base-ported at Portsmouth.

Mr. Martin: My right hon. Friend is aware of my concern to see the maximum number of ships based at Portsmouth, with the implications that that has for the provision of jobs for the fleet maintenance and repair organisation. May I thank him for receiving a delegation to discuss the organisation's future structure and seek his assurance that, before reaching final conclusions, he will take into account all representations made during the consultation period?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes. First, I commend my hon. Friend's tireless efforts to ensure that Portsmouth remains a substantial naval base—which it certainly will. It is a matter of great regret that we had to re-examine the whole question of our dockyard capability, and that that has led to the proposal to close the FMRO in Portsmouth. We shall look hard at all the representations made before reaching any conclusions and I am glad that we were able to extend the consultation period.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Minister recall that on 24 November, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms. Squire), he promised an announcement on dockyards and bases by the end of last year? As the continuing delay results in wild speculation from all quarters, and in great uncertainty and extreme concern among the work forces at both Rosyth and Devonport, will the Minister now accept that the dual site solution is the better one, not just for jobs in Scotland and the west country but for strategic reasons? Will he now bite the bullet and tell us that an announcement will be made quickly?

Mr. Hamilton: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman and to the House that it was not possible to make an announcement by the end of the year. Further representations were made on the viability of the dockyards and it was important to examine that information carefully before reaching any conclusions. I am rather reluctant to promise the hon. Gentleman another date, but I hope that we shall be able to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Ward: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the surface ships belonging to the Royal Navy in Portsmouth will be joined at some date by two new amphibious assault ships which were promised during the previous Parliament? Can my right hon. Friend give us some idea when they are likely to be placed on order?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, indeed. A project definition is being drawn up in connection with the replacement of both the amphibious assault ships, with the objective that we should go out to tender later this year.

Unaccompanied Tours

10. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average interval between unaccompanied tours (a) two years ago, (b) one year ago and (c) currently.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The average interval between unaccompanied tours for the infantry in 1990-91 was 18 months. That figure rose to 32 months in 1991-92 as, among other measures, Royal Marine commandos were included, and has fallen to 17 months in 1992-93 due to the unavailability of those units undergoing amalgamation, changing roles or relocating. It is still expected, however, that the target of 24 months between unaccompanied tours will be achieved once restructuring is complete.

Mr. Trimble: I appreciate that it is hoped that it will be possible to get back to 24 months at some point in the future, but when does the Minister think that that target will be achieved? Is it not likely that in the short term—over the next few years—the figure will still be low and may even drop further? Does the Minister appreciate the impact that that will have on the families of service men? If the pressure on the men and their families is sustained, we may have a vicious circle in which more men leave the service.

Mr. Hamilton: Yes. The period of amalgamation will be over the next two years. That has led to the present dislocation and to the emergency tour interval shrinking to the degree that it has recently. So long as there are no new long-term commitments in the next two years, we estimate that we shall be able to return to 24 months. I totally agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about the effect of the amalgamation on families, and we are mindful of that.

Mr. Fabricant: A number of reports in The Scotsman and other newspapers have said that there may be a reprieve possibly for some Scottish regiments. Can my right hon. Friend reassure me and my constituents that any review of Scottish regiments will go hand in glove with the review of the Staffordshire and Cheshire regiments?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not think that we are talking about a review of the proposals for the amalgamation of regiments under "Options for Change". We still feel that we have the right number of regiments. We do not think that long-term commitments have changed sufficiently to want to change that.

Skills Base

12. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will outline measures he proposes to take to minimise the erosion of the skills base in the defence industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: It is for companies operating in the defence business to decide how to preserve and foster the skills that they judge are required to fulfil current and future defence contracts at home and overseas.

Mr. Barnes: That means that the Minister is again sitting back and watching the destruction of skills in British industry—in this case, defence—which are of a high level and should be developed by the Government rather than destroyed. Last week, it was announced that 1,300 jobs were to go in Royal Ordnance factories. Why do the Government not start intervening in such industries and provide back-up and support so that there may be diversification and conversion into other industries? We have had enough of Governments being free-enterprise freaks.

Mr. Rifkind: I pointed out a few moments ago that British defence industries have been successful in increasing their market share from 17 per cent. of the world market to 20 per cent. That is a remarkable achievement and shows that the defence industries are capable of adapting to the new international situation.

Mr. Trotter: May I remind my right hon. and learned Friend of the need to maintain our shipbuilding base and of the importance to that base of ordering the landing platform helicopter carrier? The Select Committee on Defence was recently told by an official in his Department that that requirement remained essential. Can my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that the Government's commitment to order the LPH carrier will be maintained?

Mr. Rifkind: I am aware of my hon. Friend's great interest in the ordering of the LPH carrier. The tenders for that particular ship have been received, and they are currently being analysed. However, that will inevitably take some time.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to deny categorically the rumour that he intends to cancel the LPH carrier project, and confirm that he will make a firm procurement decision in the autumn?

Mr. Rifkind: I have just told the House that we are currently considering the tenders for the order.

Bosnia

13. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much food has been delivered by British troops in Bosnia since their deployment.

Mr. Rifkind: So far, 147 convoys have been escorted by British troops, delivering 11,775 tonnes of humanitarian aid.

Mr. Sweeney: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the British troops are performing a valuable humanitarian role in Bosnia and does he consider that the present rules of engagement provide adequate protection for our troops in Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree that the British troops are carrying out an enormously important role. The importance of their role is measured by the success of the vast number of convoys that have reached their destinations. We are equally concerned that British soldiers in Bosnia should have the means to protect themselves, and the rules of engagement have been designed to ensure that they are able to achieve that objective.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Secretary of State aware that, in paying a well-deserved tribute to our troops in Bosnia, one recognises that it would be intolerable if they were fired on, as has been the occasion, and were not in a position to retaliate? The British troops have a right to defend themselves in carrying out humanitarian aid and delivering relief supplies, which is undoubtedly supported by most people in Britain.

Mr. Rifkind: That is correct. Under the rules of engagement, they have the right to defend themselves. Indeed, in a recent incident near Tuzla, the 9th/12th Lancers returned fire on those who attacked them. They were perfectly entitled to do that and are entitled to use any of the weaponry at their disposal to protect their own lives or the lives of those for whom they are responsible.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that it is still the policy of Her Majesty's Government not to involve a substantial contribution of British troops in a combat role in Yugoslavia?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I can confirm that it is not our belief that it would be appropriate for ground forces to be used in a combat role. We share that view with all the other United Nations countries that are participating in Bosnia at the present time.

Dr. David Clark: If the British troops in Bosnia need more equipment to defend themselves, will the Secretary of State assure the House that he will ensure that they have further light artillery under similar rules of engagement so that they can perform their humanitarian role? Will he also make it clear that the reported build-up of British forces in the vicinity does not mean an inexorable drift into a bloody conflict without any military or political objectives, which could lead to an even greater loss of life than at present?

Mr. Rifkind: I can indeed confirm that we are not considering any extension of the role of the ground forces currently in Bosnia, who are there to carry out a humanitarian role. Of course we shall continue to monitor whether the equipment available to them to defend themselves is sufficient to meet their requirements. If we were to conclude that it was necessary to enhance the equipment available for their protection, we would not hesitate to supply it.

14. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the role of British armed forces personnel in the provision of humanitarian aid in Bosnia.

15. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current situation of the British forces serving with the United Nations in Bosnia.

Mr. Rifkind: During my own recent visit to the United Nations protection force I was able to see at first hand some of the work that British forces there are doing. By escorting convoys, and creating by their presence a secure atmosphere in which aid agencies can operate, our forces have ensured that areas that have not received aid for many months have now been reached with vital supplies.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that those who criticise the fact that it is always British and American armed forces who carry out the kind of roles being carried out in Bosnia and Somalia should reflect that that is to the shame of the countries that are doing nothing rather than a valid criticism of the policy of the United Kingdom Government?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, my hon. Friend is correct to emphasise that the United Kingdom can hold its head high as it is making such a crucial contribution in ensuring that food, medical aid and shelter reach the many tens of thousands of people who would be starving during the very severe winter months but for the magnificent contribution of our British forces in Bosnia.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will my right hon. and learned Friend remind himself of the fact that our forces are operating in very difficult winter conditions? Will he assure us that they will be properly equipped to look after themselves and ensure that their capabilities are maintained?

Mr. Rifkind: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance and tell him that we are considering whether any further enhancement might be required to meet that objective with even more certainty in the weeks and months to come.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the understanding that the forces will be properly equipped to protect themselves against winter conditions, but does the Secretary of State not accept that while a Portakabin type might protect against winter conditions, the type of hardened shelter that has been developed in Northern Ireland would protect them better from the shelling that they are enduring now?

Mr. Rifkind: I am very conscious of the fact that the situation has deteriorated significantly in the past week or so. For the first time, our forces have been subjected to what appears to have been a deliberate artillery attack from what appear to have been Serbian positions. We are urgently considering the proper response to ensure the fullest protection for our forces in Bosnia at the present time.

Mr. Jim Marshall: Is the Secretary of State aware that there is general acceptance by all countries with troops in Bosnia that the British troops are among the most efficient there? That being so, is it not inequitable that our troops receive less pay there than they would in Germany or Northern Ireland while the soldiers of other countries receive enhanced pay?

Mr. Rifkind: I believe that the hon. Gentleman's comment is based on a misunderstanding. The allowance that our forces receive in, for example, Germany is to enable them to purchase local goods—which are, of course, quite expensive. In Bosnia, all their requirements are entirely met by the Army. Where their families remain in Germany, they continue to receive allowances to which they were previously entitled.

Mr. Viggers: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that when our troops were first deployed in Bosnia for humanitarian purposes we reserved the right to withdraw them should they come under fire? Does he accept that the situation is deteriorating and that there is a severe risk that the United Nations forces might end up being the fourth side in a civil war? Will my right hon. and learned Friend keep anxiously open the option of withdrawing our forces and perhaps regrouping elsewhere in the area if that is deemed a safer way of maintaining peace?

Mr. Rifkind: I can understand my hon. Friend's concern. We judge these matters against two criteria: first, whether they can fulfil the humanitarian role for which they were sent to Bosnia; secondly, whether the level of risk that they face in the war zone is acceptable. We shall continue to apply those criteria.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Olner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Olner: I thank the Prime Minister for that reply. Many hundreds of skilled workers in my constituency are, unfortunately, out of work at the present time. Quite frankly, they are suffering from the Government's failure to support employers. Can we look forward in 1993 to no more false dawns but to positive action on jobs so that my constituents and their families can regain some dignity?

The Prime Minister: We all wish to see recovery—there is no difference between any hon. Members on that subject. We shall get lasting recovery only if we have the right basics. These include low inflation, modest interest rates and the right exchange rate. They are now all in place.

Mr. Day: Has my right hon. Friend seen reports that the National Union of Teachers is to organise a boycott of tests for 14-year-olds? If those reports are correct, will he condemn such action as disgraceful and highly damaging.

The Prime Minister: I am certainly prepared to condemn any such call and any such action. I suspect that teachers will be far too sensible to take any such action. Those tests are vital. They are good for children, parents want to see them, teachers need to know how well the children are performing, and parents have a right to know how well their children are performing. Those tests will provide that information.

Mr. John Smith: Since the wrecking of the Braer is a major environmental disaster and one which could happen again before the inquiries that were announced yesterday have been completed, will the Prime Minister take interim action now to protect our coastlines? Will he convene an urgent meeting with the oil companies to obtain an assurance from them that only the safest routes will be used for the transport of oil while the inquiries are going on? Will he also agree to proposals that have been made to make adequate radar facilities available in sensitive areas so that the continuing traffic in oil can be monitored while the inquiries proceed?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly invite my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to examine those matters. They may have many ramifications and I think that I should have them examined before I give the right hon. and learned Gentleman a concrete answer.

Mr. John Smith: I at least welcome the Prime Minister's decision to refer this to his right hon. and learned Friend, but I ask him to engage himself in this important matter. Will he bear in mind that it is frequently the case in matters of aviation that interim action, such as the grounding of aircraft, may be taken while inquiries are being undertaken? Will he bear in mind the acute anxiety that exists in areas all round the coast at what has happened in the Shetlands? May I invite him to look into it personally and to make an early report to the House?

The Prime Minister: That may well be. As I indicated to the right hon. and learned Gentleman a moment ago, it is prudent to examine a matter carefully before making a commitment. [Interruption.] Were I to make a commitment without doing so, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be right to be critical. Of course my right hon. and learned Friend will examine it carefully; he will report to me and we shall report to the House.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that private sector skills have greatly benefited industries such as Rover cars, gas, electricity and British Telecom, following policies which the Opposition have opposed at every turn? Will he confirm to the House today that soon these same private sector skills will be made available to British Rail?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly offer that assurance, and no doubt my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will give further details later this afternoon.

Q2. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Is the Prime Minister aware that Swan Hunter shipbuilding on the Tyne is now on the verge of complete closure, with the loss of 2,000 jobs and disaster for the north-east? Can he therefore confirm that the new helicopter carrier is still in the programme to be built on the Tyne?

The Prime Minister: We have received tenders and we are considering them at the present time.

Mr. Dykes: If my right hon. Friend has time to think about it today, will he agree that legitimate attempts to protect the privacy of prominent and other citizens alike should not be used as an excuse to launch a fundamental attack on the freedom of the press, which is so vital to a thriving democracy?

The Prime Minister: The Government have now received the report of Sir David Calcutt and we shall publish it shortly. The whole House will then have an opportunity to make up its mind on the contents of the report.

Mr. Ashdown: In view of the grave news of the breakdown of the Geneva talks as a result of Bosnian Serb intransigence, will the Prime Minister now confirm that the British Government are prepared to act with others to protect against the future elimination of the Muslim homeland, to maintain the isolation of the Bosnian Serbs and to increase the pressure, political and military, to force the Bosnian Serbs to return to the peace table?

The Prime Minister: I share the right hon. Gentleman's regret at the breakdown of the discussions in Geneva. I believe that Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen have done an outstanding job. They have put forward a fair plan. It is a matter of great regret that the Bosnian Serbs are unpersuaded and unprepared to accept it. Sooner or later there must be a negotiated settlement; the only question is whether it comes now or following further repression, further suffering and further difficulties. The international community will wish to apply further pressure if the Bosnian Serbs continue to reject this settlement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Does my right hon. Friend agree with me on the important role that small and medium-sized businesses will have to play in economic recovery? Will he undertake to sweep away the unnecessary layers of red tape and bureaucracy which so tie down some of our small businesses?

The Prime Minister: I have indicated that it is certainly the Government's intention to do so. We have already made good progress since the election, but I now want us to go both further and faster. I have therefore asked every Department in Whitehall to prepare plans for action on deregulation. I shall be meeting every Secretary of State in early February, with their permanent secretaries, and I hope that we can then draw up a detailed plan for deregulation of burdens on business.

Homelessness

Q3. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Prime Minister, when he next expects to meet representatives of London's homeless.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so, but my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing meets representatives regularly.

Mr. Corbyn: Is it not about time the Prime Minister met representatives of London's homeless to learn that 40,000 families—about 100,000 people—spent Christmas in temporary accommodation, a 10 per cent. increase on a year ago, that there are 50,000 single homeless in London and more than 2,000 sleeping on the streets, a 10 per cent. increase on a year ago and a fivefold increase on five years ago? Is it not about time money was provided to local authorities to buy and build so that families can grow up in decent accommodation rather than suffering the indignity of bed and breakfast accommodation, and public resources were put where they are needed to provide decent homes for the people of this city rather than building empty office blocks for speculative gain?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman neglected to mention the number of empty houses either in his own local authority's stock or in that of many local authorities. Liverpool, Hackney, Burnley, Manchester, Salford and North Tyneside all have a very bad record on empty properties.

When my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing or I next meet representatives of the homeless we shall be able to tell them that recent figures show a continuing decline in the number of families in bed and breakfast accommodation, nationally by 23 per cent. and by 30 per cent. in London and the south-east. I shall be able to remind them of the £750 million housing package announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the autumn statement. That will further reduce the numbers in bed and breakfast. I might also remind them of the £100 million scheme for sleeping rough which has been amazingly successful.

Engagements

Q4. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Riddick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the things that the British people expect from the Conservative Government is tough action on law and order [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Riddick: Does the Prime Minister share my concern about the increasing problem of persistent young offenders carrying out crimes such as car crime, burglaries and joy riding? Will he confirm that the Government will take tough action to combat those problems—unlike the Labour party, which is soft on crime?

The Prime Minister: I will take scoffing from the Labour party on law and order when they begin to support the prevention of terrorism Acts—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: The House must come to order to hear what the Prime Minister has to say—[Interruption.] All parts of the House, for that matter.

The Prime Minister: On the assumption that Members of the House did not hear what I said a moment ago, I shall repeat it for their benefit. I will take words from the Opposition on law and order when they stop opposing the prevention of terrorism Acts.

I certainly agree with my hon. Friend about law and order. I certainly share his concern about the persistent offending of so many young people. I have therefore asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to look urgently at the existing arrangements for dealing with juvenile offenders and to consider what new measures it is sensible to introduce. This is one of the areas of greatest concern in the growth of crime statistics and one with which we are determined to deal.

Q5. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Prime Minister agree that the biggest problem facing this country at present is the scourge of mass unemployment? Is he aware that it is costing £9,000 for the taxpayer to finance somebody out of work? That is a total cost of £30 billion out of a public sector borrowing requirement of £37 billion. If the Prime Minister tackled that problem, he would be tackling the economy's problems as well. He has the fate of 100,000 people in his hands—30,000 of them miners—in the course of the next few weeks. He could resolve the problem easily. If he will give a subsidy of only half that which is given to nuclear power he will be able to save all 31 pits and 100,000 jobs, export coal to every continent in the world and resolve some of the balance of payments problems as well. Will the Prime Minister stop dithering and do it?

The Prime Minister: I certainly agree with the hon. Gentleman about the scourge of unemployment. The difference between him and me would be the right method with which to deal with it and to ensure that there are long-term jobs subsequently available. I note what he says about the problem of the pits, but I have no intention of anticipating the coal review, which will be brought before the House as speedily as possible. While the hon. Gentleman continues to support policies such as a payroll tax on jobs, the social chapter, and a national minimum wage, he is not in the best position to lecture us about job losses.

Q6. Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to consider the wider implications of the rundown or closure of Devonport dockyards? Does he appreciate that the continuing uncertainty is causing unhappiness not just in the city of Plymouth but throughout the west country? I appreciate that he cannot announce a decision today, but will he at least assure the people of Devon and Cornwall that when the time comes for that decision to be made he will have their concerns very much in the forefront of his mind?

The Prime Minister: I appreciate the great concern in the minds of the people of Devon—and, indeed, of those of near Rosyth—concerning the decisions that need to be taken about the dockyards. I know that that uncertainty is worrying people. The Secretary of State for Defence will announce our proposals as soon as he can. I assure my hon. Friend that there will be no undue delay.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

ELECTORAL AREAS (NORTHERN IRELAND)

That the draft District Electoral Areas (Northern Ireland) Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

CONTRACTED-OUT PRISONS

That the draft Criminal Justice Act 1991 (Contracted-out Prisons) (No. 2) Order 1992 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

SEAT BELTS

That the draft Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Seat Belts) Regulations 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Question agreed to.

Resettlement Unit (Stormy Down)

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your advice about a notice that appeared on a notice board in a resettlement unit at Stormy Down in my constituency. It was put up by the Resettlement Agency and I believe that it may constitute a contempt of the House. At present——

Madam Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, and I do so only because he alleges contempt. If there is any question of contempt, he must not continue with the point he is making. It is a serious matter. He must put it in writing to me today without delay. I must ask him to do that, now that he has raised the issue.

Mr. Griffiths: I shall be happy to do that, Madam Speaker, because I regard it as a serious matter.

Madam Speaker: That is the way to proceed. I have given the hon. Member the only advice possible.

Professional Standards

3.31 pm

Mr. Roger Evans (Monmouth): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the observance of the highest professional standards; to provide for enforcement and compensation by means of a system of tribunals; to place a duty upon professions to investigate and pursue complaints against them; and for connected purposes.

I must at the outset declare my interest, as a barrister. I must also assure the media that this is not an attempt to deal with the Calcutt report at an early stage. I am talking about the traditional professions such as those of medicine, the law, architects, quantity surveyors and engineers.

My Bill seeks to deal with the fact that the traditional professions have been reluctant to deal as a matter of professional discipline with the issue of bad professional work or work below an acceptable professional standard. Professional discipline has traditionally been limited to serious misconduct, such as putting one's hand in the till or engaging in a breach of advertising regulations.

Members of the public wishing to complain about bad professional work are left to sue in the courts. That is resulting in a mounting accumulation of problems. Because the professions will not discipline their members, professional indemnity insurance premiums are rising. While that cost is being passed on in part to the public, both good and bad professionals are having to bear that burden.

Because many of the legal claims involved are settled by insurers privately, nobody knows whether the professional whom one engages has a good or poor track record. The legal aid fund is hard pressed and many just claims cannot be brought because of lack of means. The law in any event does not impose a particularly high standard when judging bad professional work—simply the minimum standard of reasonable skill which some section of the professions to which I referred says is good enough.

The time has come for the great self-regulating professions to put their affairs in order and to set up a proper system to deal professionally with substandard work and for fully compensating the public for losses occasioned by bad work.

The proposals for which I seek the approval of the House consist of several points. First, each profession should set up a tribunal with full powers to try and to determine cases of bad professional work and to award full compensation at law to members of the public where professionals are adjudged not to have carried out work to an acceptable standard. Secondly, as these tribunals would comprise the leading experts in the particular profession, the old, lax standard of "reasonable care" would be replaced in law by a new professional obligation to observe the highest professional standards according to the state of the art at the time and the professions would be required to publish regularly, for their members and the public, updated guidance with regard to the standards.

Thirdly—and this is a crucial proposal—a tribunal, when finding a case of bad work, would not only award compensation but would have a duty to discipline the offending professional. Fourthly, the composition and procedure of these tribunals should be specified and set out in detail by way of statutory instrument. However, I suggest that a number of important minimum criteria should be set down in the Bill. Each tribunal should have a member who is not a member of the particular profession and should have a legally qualified chairman. The tribunals should sit in public and their record and findings should be made public. To protect professionals against frivolous and vexatious complaints, there should be a procedure of summary dismissal of frivolous complaints. No fees should be charged for bringing a complaint before any one of these tribunals.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does this apply to Members of Parliament?

Mr. Evans: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), from a sedentary position, seems to indicate that Members of Parliament are members of a profession. That is a quaint and eccentric view of the law, but this modest measure is not intended to extend to Members of the House.

The hon. Member for Bolsover, bearing in mind the problems of his constituents, might like to contemplate my fifth proposal rather more carefully. My suggestion is that each profession should not only set up this system but also pay for its operation and for a proper system of legal representation for complainants—in other words, a scheme of preparation, investigation and presentation—and that the operation and requirements of such schemes should be set out in a code of practice, which would be laid down by the Lord Chancellor and with which the profession would have to comply.

Sixthly—and lastly—the courts of the land should have power to stay actions and to refer cases and issues in actions to the relevant professional tribunal where a breach of this new professional obligation is alleged.

The professions themselves have moved very slowly in the direction that I am suggesting. The General Medical Council, for example, has set up new performance procedures, but there is no suggestion of public hearings or of compensation. The Solicitors Complaints Bureau has been able to award compensation up to the grand sum of £1,000 in cases coming before it after 1 April 1991. These steps indicate recognition of the problem, but they are not enough. I am seeking the leave of the House to bring in a Bill to restore public confidence in the great self-regulating professions by giving them modern powers and duties to set up a system of dealing with bad professional work and of compensating members of the public fully in cases where bad work is proven. That is the purpose of the measure.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Roger Evans, Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Mr. Gyles Brandreth, Mrs. Jacqui Lait, Lady Olga Maitland, Dr. Robert Spink, Mr. Michael Stephen and Mr. Gary Streeter.

Professional Standards

Mr. Roger Evans accordingly presented a Bill to require the observance of the highest professional standards; to provide for enforcement and compensation by means of a system of tribunals; to place a duty upon professions to investigate and pursue complaints against them; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 February and to be printed. [Bill 109.]

Orders of the Day

Opposition Day

[8TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Rail Privatisation

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.39 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I beg to move,

That this House opposes the privatisation of the railways.

The debate comes shortly before what we may assume, according to the leaks, will be a new Bill. Perhaps the Secretary of State will speak about that. We look forward to seeing that Bill because the Government seem to suffer considerable uncertainty about what rail privatisation means. The central plank of their policy is that privatisation, and its competition, allows the pursuit of maximum profit, is eventually to the consumers' benefit, and is far better than a publicly owned utility or a public service. Bearing in mind today's reports about British Airways, such an interpretation sounds rather odd.

We have the example of British Telecom and the crisis in our energy utilities and in the bus industry, upon which it is claimed the new Bill is based. The deregulated bus industry has older buses, charges higher fares and fewer people travel. The service is also inadequate compared with the one that was provided before deregulation. If that is the forerunner to rail privatisation, it is no wonder that many people are getting extremely edgy about the Government's proposal, which Conservative Members are calling a poll tax on wheels. The recommendations and statements make that a likely possibility.

Confusion reigns and we look forward to the Secretary of State's interpretation of privatisation. I have had the dubious honour of speaking from the Dispatch Box to a number of Secretaries of State and each of them has professed that he will be introducing a Bill to privatise the railways. That has been the Government's badge of honour in Queen's Speeches and in conference speeches, but they have never been able to define privatisation and it is up to the Secretary of State to explain the White Paper and any changes and say what he intends to implement.

At the beginning of this new year the Government claimed that they would privatise the railways. The new year message by the Prime Minister changed that to semi-privatisation, and the next day the Secretary of State explained that that really meant commercialisation. Most of the press saw that as a conflict, but I say that it is a policy U-turn. The Secretary of State rushed to his constituency to announce that he was making a speech to circulate his latest interpretation of rail privatisation. It seemed to boil down to some form of privatisation and his belief that franchising the system would lead to better private involvement.

The assumption in all that is that private operation of the railways is far better than leaving it to public operation. That is almost an ideological difference between us. We believe that there can be a good publicly operated rail system. I do not suggest that that has been achieved because there are difficulties, some of which I shall address. However, matters will be made much more difficult if the railways are privatised.

What is the evidence for justifying privatisation? There is such a system in Argentina, and after a few years of operation there the passenger service is in complete collapse. Sweden is often cited as having a privatised rail system, but only 1 per cent. of its services are privatised and the track and operations remain in the public service. Track subsidies are to be maintained because of very expensive investment. The White Paper says that the track operation must be expected to give an 8 per cent. return. That is one of the factors that will give rise to considerable difficulties, even for the franchise operations. How can the Government expect the massive investment that is needed to give an 8 per cent. return?

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): The hon. Gentleman says that only 1 per cent. of Sweden's railways have been privatised. Would he give the House the benefit of his knowledge on the improvements that have been made to services, the increase in investment and the increase in passengers carried on those services that have been privatised in Sweden?

Mr. Prescott: On the 1 per cent? That is a railway system that is only a teeny-weeny bit pregnant. Such improvement of services, whether private or public, whether in the 1 per cent. or the 99 per cent., requires considerably more financial resources than we are prepared to allocate to our service. I see the hon. Gentleman nodding in agreement.

Mr. Milligan rose——

Mr. Prescott: I have a long speech to make and I want to get on with it.

Considerable claims have been made about the privatised Japanese service.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I apologise for intervening so early in my hon. Friend's speech, but I am provoked to do so by the intervention of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan). Is my hon. Friend aware that when I met the chairman of SJ, the Swedish railway system, in December, he said that he had recently had discussions with the Minister for Public Transport during which he told him—he gave permission to quote his words—that he thought that the Government's proposals were insane?

Mr. Prescott: More and more people are coming to that conclusion. My hon. Friend shows his considerable experience in these matters.

In Japan we are talking not about privately owned companies but publicly owned private companies, such as a municipally-owned bus service. The service is not privately run but is owned by the state or the authorities that are running it. It is not what we understand to be a private company, privately owned. Therefore, that is not a good example.

In France, the system is basically state owned. The only private sector service between Paris and Orly collapsed a few months ago. Privatisation did not work too well there either.

Much is made of the fact that the EC is moving towards the privatisation of the railway system. It is not. It is moving towards transparency and a clear distinction between services which receive public subsidies and those to be operated as profitable services. I support that, as I have said in the House before. The transference of accounts and the capital debt structure of British Rail need to be changed so that British Rail may have access to private capital. We are not opposed to that.

The Secretary of State has often chided me for putting that case, but I think that he has now come to adopt our ideas on leasing, despite having told us, along with other Secretaries of State, that they were unacceptable. However, I shall not taunt him with that. I am glad that Network SouthEast now has 40 more trains financed by leasing.

Perhaps the Secretary of State is learning that the Opposition want a good railway system and are prepared to look at the matter in practical terms rather than getting caught up with ideology. That can be achieved equally well in a publicly owned system as in a privately owned system.

There have already been some experiments in the United Kingdom. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. First, the Government started with InterCity. It was made clear that this Administration would no longer pay a subsidy to InterCity: it would have to pay its way. The Government set a 4 per cent. rate of return, but nothing like that has been realised. It has only broken even this year.

However, InterCity has been forced to try to maximise revenue rather than services. Areas have been cut from the InterCity network simply to maximise revenue. Blackpool or Shrewsbury may be next. A number of areas may be removed from the network service. That is wrong. The railways should provide a national service. As soon as they are privatised in that way, with the emphasis on the maximum rate of revenue, there will be difficulties.

It is interesting that InterCity's timetable does not include regional services on its routes because it believes that it does not provide such services, which, under the definition of accounts or as a business operation, it does not. But why should a passenger not know that an inter-city service is being run by a regional railway? That is one example of the difficulties engendered by such a silly arrangement.

Here is another example. When an InterCity train breaks down and a freight train is available nearby, the freight company will say, "It is not our responsibility to provide a train; find your own InterCity train." That is nonsensical: profit is being put before meeting the needs of the community.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): The hon. Gentleman said at the beginning of his speech that he and his hon. Friends were ideologically opposed to privatisation, and that he believed that privatisation would damage the quality or the value of the service. Does he accept that British Airways was unprofitable at the time of its privatisation, and that it was unprofitable because it did not provide a good service in comparison with other airlines? Does he accept that, because it is now a privatised service, it is now profitable—and that it is profitable because it provides a good service in competition with other airlines?

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman had better ask Richard Branson whether he feels that British Rail is competing with his rail companies. The hon. Gentleman made one fair point, however. I concede that British Airways was able to eliminate its losses, largely because it restructured its manpower. There is no doubt about that; I asked Lord King and others, even before privatisation. Management was not particularly involved in the bringing together of British Airways and British European Airways: it made the structural changes, but it did not make further changes along the line. Lord King was able to do that, reaching agreement with the trade unions in order to provide a more effective service.

The fact that that involved lousy management does not necessarily mean that publicly owned industries have lousy management. There are many examples of private companies with lousy management. What is needed is proper and effective public management. I do not argue that the managements of publicly owned companies are superior to those of private companies; I simply want the best possible management and the best possible practices to produce the best possible service. I do not have an ideology about the matter. I want our country to have the good public railway system that France and Germany enjoy—modern, reliable and with adequate investment. All the evidence shows that that can best be achieved by a publicly owned system. It is up to the Government to make the case for privatisation.

We have already witnessed some of the results of privatisation. First, we were given Tiger Rail, along with Charterail and Freightrail. The Prime Minister launched that scheme during the election campaign. It lasted less than four months—and who had to come in and pick up the service? Good old British Rail. We were very happy that a publicly owned service could take over when the private sector had failed.

Charterail provided a good service. The trouble was that it got scared about the track costs. The Government started talking about an 8 per cent. return on track costs, and it was clearly going to be difficult to operate on that basis. That is not to say that a private service cannot work on a publicly owned system; I do not believe that an operation must be either totally private or totally public.

The next experiment, Stagecoach, was much more successful: it lasted six months. It was launched by the Minister for Public Transport, who is present today. He described it as a wonderful service—although he did not actually use it; he went into the sleeper and lay down on his bunk. It was not a new train, although it was covered in glossy new paint. There is one thing that we can expect from a privatised industry: it may not invest in new plant, but by golly, it will invest in a lot of new paint. That does not mean that it will improve the quality of its service. It looks good, but it does not necessarily feel any better.

Although Stagecoach lasted only six months, the leasing arrangement was for 12 months. What compensation did British Rail receive from Stagecoach? It did not receive any: it let it go, and negotiated a new deal. Stagecoach became a sort of holiday operator, offering some seats on British Rail. There was no through ticketing; a ticket could not be used on Stagecoach and then on British Rail.

There was a good deal of publicity for the new Virgin service. There was to be a new train running up to Scotland —or, rather, not a new train but a 125 diesel, running on the most modernised electric lines, on which publicly owned trains travel at 140 mph. His trains, which admittedly would have had televisions, would have run at about 120 mph—about 20 or 30 mph slower than existing fast trains. Despite all the publicity, as soon as he found out that he would not get a subsidy for the track he pulled out. We now wait to see whether the Secretary of State will propose another version.

Given the Government's belief in privatisation, one would have thought that capitalists could talk to capitalists. The authority at Heathrow was prepared to pay 80 per cent. of the Heathrow rail link; British Rail was expected to pay only 20 per cent. The Government were not prepared to allocate BR the resources to meet that 20 per cent. commitment, which would have been a good deal for the taxpayer. Instead of him having to pay 100 per cent., 80 per cent. would have been provided by the private sector and 20 per cent. by the public sector. Why did not we do that? The proposal has collapsed again because of the problem of the track cost and the commercial ideology of the Secretary of State.

The extension of the Jubilee line was an example of the Tory Government talking to bankers—their friends in the City. The extension of the line was not London's greatest priority, but it was chosen to save the face of docklands; that is what it boiled down to. It was proposed that the private sector might pay about 5 or 10 per cent. of the total cost. Despite some clever fiddling of the statistics, we still do not know what the total cost will be. However, the extension of the line was promised in the autumn statement as part of the recovery. It is another green shoot on the Jubilee line that has not materialised. That is amazing.

Yet again, negotiations about the line highlighted the incompetence of the Department of Transport and the Government. Who would have announced in negotiations that they intended to carry out the project and move civil servants from A to B as part of the recovery programme? If I were a banker offering the money, I would say, "Tell me what the deal is. You want it and you have committed yourself to it politically. I will not give you the money that I said I was going to give before." That seems to be elementary negotiating practice.

Mr. Prescott: Then why have we not got an agreement?

Mr. MacGregor: I was wondering what the hon. Gentleman was talking about when he said that we had made offers in relation to transferring civil servants from the Department of Transport. I do not know what he was talking about in that regard, because I never did.

Mr. Prescott: That is a clever little dance around the point that does not answer the issue. Why have we not got an agreement on the Jubilee line?

Mr. MacGregor: We made it absolutely clear in the autumn statement that we had made provision for the Jubilee line. Discussions are being held between London Transport and the administrator for Olympia and York. We have made the objectives clear, and it has been accepted that the discussions must be held on the basis of the arrangements that were made with Olympia and York. I very much hope that a deal between London Transport and the administrators will be completed before long.

Mr. Prescott: The same answer has been given for the past 12 months. All I am saying is that the Secretary of State has made it difficult for the Government to negotiate with the bankers, who are now likely to say, "We shall not give as much as we offered before." As an ex-trade union official, may I say that it seemed a silly negotiating position for the Government to take. None the less, we wait with bated breath to see whether we get the Jubilee line. One thing is certain: Londoners are suffering from the absence of the line.

So much for what has happened under the Government's privatisation programme. We are now told that the White Paper is the latest expression of the theory of privatisation. We wait to see whether the Bill is consistent with that. The White Paper certainly proposes the most complex machinery that we have ever seen to ensure that the market works. The cost will be phenomenal, the bureaucracy will be considerable—and simply to do what? To ensure that the market works, when there will be no competition to achieve the best service for passengers. No other country has achieved a good rail system with such stupid thinking.

I was amazed at the number of quangos to be used. I remember that in the early 1980s the Government made great play of getting rid of quangos and all bodies of civil servants which they considered to be the dead hand of bureaucracy. We now know what the bureaucracy will be because the information is contained in the White Paper. The Secretary of State informs us that there will be a regulator to control access to the tracks. We know from the advert that companies do not need experience of transport but that will be in line with the Department of Transport. There will be a franchising authority to deal with the allocation of franchises, a rail track quango with responsibility for timetabling and maintenance, and a joint industrial board to co-ordinate ticketing and information systems. There will also be a railway clearing house for the settlement of accounts between companies—we last had one of those in the 1930s.

There will be a health and safety executive, a railway advisory safety technical standards body and a central transport consultative committee to deal with timetabling and facilities but not, of course, fares. There will be an office of fair trading to ensure that it works. The passenger transport authorities will be expected to discuss section 20 grants, local authorities will be required to consult about timetables, the good old Department of Transport and all its civil servants will be responsible for a policy framework —it has not yet achieved that—and the Treasury will control the external financing limits.

That means that there will be 13 quangos to ensure that the market works properly, set up by a Government who do not like bureaucracy or quangos and who believe in the invisable hand of the market running the railway system. There is no invisible hand but 13 quangos. It is tragic that more people will be established as civil servants to run the quangos and will be paid for by the sacking of people dealing with maintenance, the manning of stations and the operation of the railway system. Civil servants and bureaucrats will take the place of professional railwaymen who are desperately trying to provide a service.

It is clear to anyone listening to the evidence given to the Select Committee that no one supports such a scheme. To be fair, however, the Secretary of State gave evidence yesterday and he supported it, but he has to. It is his real test: if he is to be the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he has to appear with flying colours in transport matters. I have not yet seen a Secretary of State do so, but we live in hope.

The White Paper refers to open access for competition. Where in the world is there open access for competition so that railways can compete with each other? I was interested to read an article by Simon Jenkins in The Times on 6 January. A person was appointed by the Government to be a director of British Rail and to modernise and privatise it. Mr. Jenkins went abroad and, on his return, was amazed about what was happening. He wrote:

"To want to license rival operators on each line is illiterate. Trains do not work that way."

That seems a simple enough proposition. He also wrote:

"Meanwhile that earnest Dr. Frankenstein, John MacGregor, has been working night and day to create Railtrack as the most monstrous nationalised industry ever, thus avoiding the proper rail privatisation . . ."

He advised the new private train operators

"to spend all their time lobbying for higher subsidies".

The Secretary of State has said that open access is in fact an open cheque book. He will be paying subsidies to the private and public sectors to run services, which will cost the taxpayer an awful lot more. We have yet to see what happens with the franchise system.

As for the Railtrack authority, do we believe that requiring an 8 per cent. rate of return will encourage people to run rail services on the infrastructure? That is what the Secretary of State wants to do, but an 8 per cent. return will add a heck of a mark-up for those who will operate the system. Sir James Sherwood of Sea Containers has already made it clear that he would like some of the lines but would close others because he wants only the profitable ones. He would close the coast line affecting hon. Members who travel on the Southampton and Bournemouth line who will become supporters of the publicly owned system as soon as the private cherry-pickers finish the system and meet its national requirements.

On safety, I protest to the Secretary of State. I understand that the Secretary of State is to announce that the Health and Safety Commission report on the privatisation of rail was available to us from 3.30 pm. That does not make it easy for the Opposition, who are opening the debate, to read and to digest a report on an important aspect of the privatisation of rail. There was talk about professional standards. The Department of Transport could learn a bit more about providing reports. Even if they were provided only half an hour before the debate, we could make some assessment for the debate. It is a deplorable practice. Yesterday, we did not even get a copy of the statement made in the House by the Secretary of State for Transport. That is the nature of the Department of Transport. In view of my comments, I suppose that I cannot expect a great deal of charity from the Department. If I ever get in, the Department will not expect a great deal of charity from me.

I remind the Secretary of State of what was said in the Hidden report about the safety of the railway system and about the development of a business culture in the railway system which would undermine it. I quote Maurice Holmes in the Hidden report in January 1988. He said:

"there are signs that the past high safety standards at local level achieved by giving a high priority to a 'safe railway' above other issues are starting to be eroded by the change in railway culture. If continued, this will strike at the root of our structure. I would not like a major disaster with loss of life to be the reason that forced British Rail to invest in modern safety aids."

He said that 10 months before the terrible crash at Clapham. Hidden took the point and made the following comment in his report:

"investment into safety-related projects, such as ATP, was not being progressed."

There is worry about the fact that British Rail does not have the estimate of the costs. The Secretary of State has told the Select Committee that he does not yet know the costs of the safety requirements to be implemented after the Hidden inquiry of three years ago. That is totally unacceptable. The Secretary of State only has to ask for that information for it to be provided. I have asked constantly here for that information. The fact that the information has not been given undermines the priority of safety and the recommendations made by Hidden, especially the recommendations about the automatic train protection systems.

There are matters of grave concern about safety. We have had the Newton crash and the Bellgrove crash. All the inquiries show that the pursuit of saving money, either in maintenance or in track realignment, contributed to the crashes and to the loss of life at Newton, at Bellgrove and in other incidents. It is clear that the business culture began to overtake the priority for safety in the railway system.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): I salute the hon. Gentleman for his commitment to old-fashioned socialism. This is marvellous.

The safety issue is critical. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that, with the privatisation of British Airways, safety standards were endangered? Privatisation does not go hand in hand with a lessening of safety standards. Our experience does not suggest that. The hon. Gentleman is scaremongering.

Mr. Prescott: If old-fashioned socialism means a better and safer railway system, I am happy to claim to be an old-fashioned socialist. If the hon. Gentleman studies the privatised railways of the 1930s, he will see the incidence of deaths and accidents, and the reduction in safety, because they are clear for all to see. It is one of the reasons why we nationalised the railway system, quite apart from modernising it. The evidence is there. If the hon. Gentleman cannot agree with what I have said, may I give some quotes from the grandees of the Tory party?

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prescott: No, because I am having problems with time.

I quote Lord Ridley, speaking on the "Panorama" programme. He said:

"Clearly, I think we picked all the plums out of the privatisation pudding"

That is certainly true. Lord Ridley said that he never believed

"it was really possible to do very much, if anything, with the railways because they were basically loss making."

Lord Whitelaw, whose family had experience of chairing a railway system in the private times, said:

"The old companies made no money."

How true. Lord Whitelaw then said:

[Mr. Prescott]

"If privatisation was to be carried out, it would have to be a success. And if you say to me, 'am I absolutely sure it will be a success'—No, I am not."

Even Lord Young, in an article in the Director today—I should not have thought he would have said this—said:

"like everything else in human nature"—

he is talking about privatisation—

"the pendulum swings too far and now I begin to wonder if we aren't trying to privatise some things which basically can't or shouldn't be privatised. I wonder a bit about whether we should be thinking of privatising coal or the railways."

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Here we go again. Reference has been made to reports that are supposedly in the Vote Office. When I went yet again to ask for the report in question, I was told by the very courteous person in the Vote Office that he could not give me a copy until the Secretary of State for Transport had responded and resumed his place. I understand that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) has a copy. Can you clarify the position for me? Where shall we be if some hon. Members receive reports while others are refused them?

Mr. MacGregor: Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker. I shall, indeed, refer in my speech to the report. It is a report which will require a great deal of study and which we shall be able to examine thoroughly on Second Reading of the privatisation Bill. As a matter of courtesy, I sent a copy in the normal way this afternoon to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and to the Chairman of the Select Committee. I shall make the report available to the whole House as soon as I have finished my speech.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Prescott: Let me tell the Secretary of State that I telephoned his office today——

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Prescott: I am sorry.

Mr. Redmond: The Secretary of State says that the document will be made available after he has sat down. Given that the Opposition have used one of their Supply days for today's debate, will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that we shall be given another day to debate that document?

Madam Speaker: That question might be put to the Leader of the House at business questions. It is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker. We are used to the fact that, when statements are made in the House, the accompanying documents are sometimes made available when the Minister has sat down. But it strikes me that we are to hear not a statement but a speech from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. May I put it to my right hon. Friend, through you, Madam Speaker, that it might be convenient, as well as a courtesy to the House, if the report were unlocked and made available——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is trying to debate through the Chair.

I recognise the Secretary of State's courtesy in handing out two copies of the report, but I feel that, given that we are to have a major debate, it would have been courteous to the House had it been made generally available rather than being sent to only two hon. Members.

Mr. Prescott: Let me make it clear that I did not receive the document.

Sir Harold Walker (Doncaster, Central): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker, and with the greatest respect, I very much appreciate your ruling, but would it not have been better had the Secretary of State responded to it? As I understand it, we are having a debate during the course of which there may well be reference to a document that is available but copies of which have been denied to most hon. Members. That is an intolerable state of affairs.

Madam Speaker: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's support.

Mr. MacGregor: Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker. I am trying to oblige the House. We accelerated the production of the report so that it would be available as quickly as possible. I wish to make it clear that the debate is not just about that report, although I intended to refer to it in my speech. If it would assist the House, I should be perfectly happy to allow the report to be made available immediately and will give instructions to that effect. I was simply trying to follow normal form. As you, Madam Speaker, know—from all my time as Leader of the House—I am always happy to try to oblige the House.

Madam Speaker: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. The report should now be made available to all hon. Members.

Mr. Prescott: For the record, let me make it clear to the Secretary of State that I telephoned his Department assuming that there might be a statement on the matter. When I inquired, at 1.10 pm, whether there would be a statement on the health and safety report, I was told that there would not. I then asked whether the right hon. Gentleman's officials could provide me with a copy and was told that copies would be made available, not at the normal time of 3 pm, but when the Secretary of State had finished speaking. I explained that that made it difficult for me to assess the report in time for the debate. I have to tell the Secretary of State that my copy never arrived. I do not have it, even though I continued to make inquiries until the last minute. I do not think that the House will appreciate the way in which the Secretary of State has handled this matter, even though I am glad that he now proposes to make copies available.

I also note that the right hon. Gentleman waited until after he had given his evidence to the Select Committee that is considering the privatisation of railways. He could have been courteous enough to release the report so that the Select Committee could question him on that matter. I think that we all know what the Secretary of State is at: he does not want anybody to have access to a report that will enable him or her to make an assessment on the critical question of safety. That is the conclusion that the House is bound to draw.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: That is a slightly grudging response to the Secretary of State, who has met the wishes of the House. Most of the hon. Gentleman's speech has been a good sign that the "Clintonisation" of the Labour party should not spoil it.

Mr. Prescott: I thought that we were debating the serious matter of what Britain will do with its railway industries. Conservative Members may think that it is a laughing matter, but it is not a laughing matter to the thousands of railway workers and passengers in the United Kingdom. The question of how politicians will play their part in improving our railway system is a serious matter. That is what people expect of us. I am seriously trying to say—not in an ideological way—how the railway system can be improved.

The 14 years of the Tory railway system has been a bad record, and it is there for people to see. The Tory Government started by thinking that they could control the whole railway system by a financial framework. Of course, that has meant that fewer resources were available to British railways. Railway systems abroad, which are of a higher quality, are paid subsidies which are two to three times the amount that our system receives.

We have gone through an obsessive amount of management changes to prepare for profit centres. The Hidden inquiry made it absolutely clear that managers were exhausted by reorganisation and should not be subjected to more. British Rail have made it clear that £1 billion is the minimum investment which is needed for the next ten years. To be honest, neither political Governments have provided enough investment in the railway system, and I have made that point constantly. We must develop a long-term plan for the railways with adequate financial investment.

The railways are not as safe as they were before, and the quality of service has deteriorated. I do not have time to quote from the report. However, I refer hon. Members to the statement that has been made by the passenger bodies today which makes it clear that there will be a serious cut back in railway services simply because inadequate financial investment is available.

I shall now look at the freight industry. In the past few years, the Government have made about £60 million available for section 8 grants to encourage freight to go from road to rail. As a result of the closure of freight by the Government, we now have a policy of forcing companies to move freight from rail to road. The latest statements from two cement manufacturers, West Country Drinks, Highland Light Oil Traffic and Privatised Steel say that the amount of traffic that is being forced on the road is the equivalent of half a million lorries. To take freight off the railways and put it on the road is not a good way to run the railway system. The requirement simply for a financial rate of return on rail freight characterises the whole nature of our railway system.

Our manufacturing industry is in collapse because we have not invested sufficiently in it. The manufacturing industry made it clear that 30,000 jobs are at stake. That is precisely the figure that we are talking about in the mining industry. We should get equally angry about the consequences for our manufacturing industry of job losses.

If hon. Members say that there is not an efficient railway system, I refer them to the Financial Times analysis of all the European railway systems. That report confirmed a study done ten years ago which showed that British rail has a level of efficiency—the amount of manpower as against the productivity of the service—which is as high as the two or three most efficient railways systems in Europe. That shows that British Rail has a good level of efficiency, whatever the argument.

The trouble is that we do not have enough resources to maintain the quality of the system. The British rail system has one of the highest levels of efficiency in Europe. So the argument cannot be about labour or efficiency. I hope that no one will make that argument, because, clearly, the evidence is against it. The Labour party's argument is that we need an alternative railway system.

We believe that the railway system should be publicly owned for very good reasons. First, every good, successful railway system in Europe is publicly owned. I do not see any reason why we should not be able to emulate that system. Secondly, it is necessary to maintain social services, as is recognised in Europe. The profitable services can maintain the less profitable services. It is called cross-subsidisation, and is an essential principle in transport. During the early stages of privatisation, I remember that many Conservative Members said that cross-subsidisation was nonsense. However, cross-subsidisation is an essential part of any bus, rail, or air transport system if a network service is to be maintained. A publicly owned system is better for the environment as it is in the interests of the environment to subsidise the transfer of freight from road to rail. That is what the section 8 grants were about.

The scale of investment is considerable. The investment figure for the west coast line is more than £1 billion. No private entrepreneur will be able to provide that kind of money. The channel tunnel rail link amounts to £3 billion or £4 billion. There could be a combination of public and private money. However, the private sector will not participate without some guarantee from the public sector. That is the reality of financing that kind of investment.

Safety is improved by through ticketing. The Hidden report said that there should be a strong, central chain of command for a good, safe system. If many operators are responsible for different safety aspects, that is not the way to introduce a good, safe system. Through ticketing was one of the first things to go to the wall when the bus companies were privatised.

We should also bear in mind that private companies will not want to maintain railcard provision for pensioners. Private companies will simply want to maximise revenue. They will not be interested in the bureaucratic complications of maintaining railcard systems that occur naturally in a publicly owned system.

If the Secretary of State is arguing for private involvement, he should bear in mind that there has been a history of private involvement in a publicly owned railway system in respect of consultation and joint public and private deals. Management have brought in people from the private sector.

It seems that certain routes might be the standard bearers for privatisation. If the Secretary of State wants to experiment on the Chiltern or Southend lines, I hope that he will give the public sector management a chance to compete and to show how good they are. He should at least give the public sector management a level playing field and the same finance rights and access to the market so that they can show that they can perform as well as private sector management. If, as seems to be the case, the Secretary of State wants to experiment, he should at least be fair and not condemn the public sector. We would resent that unfair ideological view.

[Mr. Prescott]

I believe that I have established the case that public and private financing could be possible, particularly in leasing agreements in respect of parts of Network SouthEast and the bond arrangements for financing the channel tunnel link. As the Secretary of State knows, I spelt that out in my document "Moving Britain into Europe". The Department of Transport bought three copies of it at £25 a time, and I am most grateful for that. Perhaps the Secretary of State learnt from that document how to use private capital. I hope that he has sent a copy to the Treasury.

The Opposition believe that there is a need for private capital because all the money cannot come from the taxpayer. Private capital will help to produce a modern railway system. It will help with investment, and it will help our manufacturing industry. Large publicly owned companies are an important element in the manufacturing sector. The manufacturing sector may not mean much to Conservative Members, but it is crucial for growth and creating wealth. It is also crucial if we want to reduce the balance of payments deficit and to stop importing manufactured goods and instead make them here.

Ownership is not the critical issue, although we would clearly prefer public ownership. The issue is to provide adequate financial support for the railway system. There should be a long-term investment plan for the railway system and a clear identification of social service payments and the objectives for the industry. We must create confidence in the railway industry for the future.

The issue is the modernisation of our railway system, not privatisation. Privatisation will inevitably mean the doubling of fares and less investment in rolling stock and track. It will also mean a less safe railway system and more subsidy and support. It will mean greater bureaucracy, fewer rural services and a system which will not be accountable for the quality of services.

That is why we propose that a publicly owned railway system, modernised in the way that we suggest, would serve the interests of passengers better, would serve our national interests, and be better for the environment. I urge my hon. Friends to support the motion.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John MacGregor): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'recognises that progress has recently been made in improving British Rail's services; believes that further necessary improvements for rail users can best be achieved by creating the opportunity for introducing into the railways private sector ownership, management skills and capital; and therefore supports the Government's proposals as set out in the White Paper, "New Opportunities for the Railways".'.

We have just heard the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) make one of his typical speeches. He has plenty to say, but he totally lacks consistency. For a start, he accuses us of doing a U-turn on policy and then bases most of his speech on criticising the policies in the original White Paper. I will return to that later.

Of course, I must commend the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East in one respect: he is honest to a fault. However, it is a very big fault, especially for an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman these days. Uniquely among his colleagues, at least the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is honest enough to admit that he is still a socialist. His colleagues are all moving on. They call it "Clintonisation" and my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) has also just called it that. In reality, that means abandoning all the policies that they have always stood for in order to buy votes wherever they fall.

The hon. Gentleman talked about negotiating on the Jubilee line. He negotiates his position in the Labour party and he negotiates policy in the Labour party in public, on television, all the time. But at least he has made it clear that he does not approve of this process of Clintonisation.

I wondered why we were having this debate on rail privatisation at all today given that we are about to have another full debate on the Bill. Could it be that his presence here gives him a cast-iron alibi for his absence from a meeting with the Clinton camp on which his shadow Cabinet colleagues are so keen?

It is, of course, the same old story: everyone is out of step except the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East; a horde of Clinton clones marching in one direction and Andy Capp stubbornly marching in the other. I thought that the hon. Gentleman protested too much about his ideology today.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I thought that the debate was supposed to be about privatisation, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair at this point.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman is extremely sensitive. I have only been speaking for about 50 seconds or one minute. I will tell him very soon what the relevance of this is.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East protested a great deal about his ideology. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham suggested in his intervention, the reason is that the hon. Gentleman will not let go of his prejudices, just as he clings to clause four. He cannot begin to understand that our practical and pragmatic approach to improving our railways is the right way to get better services for the passenger, the freight customer and the taxpayer. That is because he believes that everything must be done according to the letter of the original socialist textbook—[Interruption.] Just let me finish. There is clearly great sensitivity on this point on the other side of the House. The hon. Gentleman refuses to see the evidence that has been before us now for more than a decade; he sticks by the letter of the socialist textbook. That evidence is that the market, whatever form it may take, produces better services for our citizens. In a great many of our industries we have demonstrated in the last decade that it produces better services, greater innovation and more competition, and at lower cost.

Mr. Snape: Will the Secretary of State accept from me that, coming from a member of the Cabinet that gave us the ERM and the poll tax, we need no reassurances about the pragmatism of his party?

Mr. MacGregor: We have a council tax which I think will prove to be an excellent form of local government finance. It has all the benefits and has taken account of most of the lessons of the old rating system as well as the community charge. I believe that our policies are very soundly based in our principles and in our approach to the private sector and privatisation. As I shall be demonstrating, we will be introducing them gradually over a period and, I believe, in a pragmatic and practical way.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) rose——

Mr. MacGregor: No, I will not give way; I have already given way twice.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East believes that public utilities always are and have to be the best, because for his purposes they are the best. He has made that clear again today. He talked at one point of maximising services rather than revenue. What he meant was keeping the service running whether or not there were customers for it and absolutely independent of the cost to the taxpayer of so doing. There is a reason for that. He wants as many people as possible——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The Secretary of State is reading this.

Mr. MacGregor: If that is the case, I must be a mind reader. I know that I claim to have mind reading as one of my hobbies and I must have been a mind reader to know that the hon. Gentleman would be talking about maximising services rather than maximising revenue, and that is exactly what I have just been referring to.

The reason is that the hon. Gentleman wants as many people as possible working in publicly owned industries, irrespective of whether such a work force is needed. He wants public employees to have security in their jobs whether or not they do them well. He wants state-owned businesses to be run in the interests of their employees, but —this is a crucial point and it underlines much of what the hon. Gentleman said—he has no regard whatever for the cost to the taxpayer who foots the bill.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned two European countries. One was Germany. He should know that there is the same anxiety to produce better services and the same concern about the monolithic nationalised industry and its cost in Germany as we have been demonstrating. That is why the German Government propose to privatise German railways——

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It will take about 12 years.

Mr. MacGregor: I went over that point in the Select Committee last night: our time scale to complete the whole privatisation process will be about the same. I made it quite clear all the way through that we are building it up over a period, and it makes absolute sense.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East made great play of France. He may not realise that 20 per cent. of the total cost of running the French railways comes from meeting the interest payments on their debt. Frequently—or on several occasions, at least—the French Government have written off the debt because the burden was becoming so great, so the cost to the taxpayer is very high. Because of the many improvements in British Rail, to which I shall come later in my speech, the interest payment for British Rail is very much lower. I would not wish to come to the House to defend a situation in which 20 per cent. of the cost of a nationalised industry is sheer interest payment. That is something that we would certainly wish to avoid.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I am sure that my right hon. Friend would not wish to mislead the House in any way. Just for the record—and it is no use my hon. Friend's Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick), grumbling at me; my intervention may be regarded as unhelpful, and I am sorry if it is, but I merely want to put the record straight —will my right hon. Friend confirm, before he compares what is happening in Germany with what is happening here, that Helmut Kohl set up a Government railway commission which had a brief to study the relationship between the railway and the state, that it took 18 months to consider its proposals, that there was thereafter a lengthy debate in the Bundestag as to whether they should proceed and which proposals should be chosen and that the 10 years thereafter, to which my right hon. Friend has rightly referred, do not in any way include proposals that bear any relationship to the specific proposals in his White Paper?

Mr. MacGregor: There are quite a number of similarities. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) has had the opportunity to do so, but I have had several discussions on rail privatisation with my opposite number, the German Minister for Transport. We have been discussing it since last July and he announced his proposals in the same week as I announced our White Paper.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch knows—and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East criticised us for this—we have discussed and debated the form of privatisation of British Rail for some considerable time. We have then produced a White Paper and we have had thorough discussions on the White Paper. We are carrying out a substantial consultation process on a large number of policy aspects and we will have a thorough scrutiny of all aspects of the Bill as it goes through both Houses. I believe, therefore, that there will be thorough scrutiny of the matter in the House. I repeat that there are many similarities.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. MacGregor: No, I must get on.

I can condense much of the approach of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East along the following lines: that it would be a great business if it were not for the customers. All the way through his speech he hardly referred to the customers. He talked about public service, about obligations and about money coming from the taxpayers; I hardly heard the word "customer" on his lips. It is fortunate for the customers that the hon. Gentleman is not running the railway. In sharp contrast, our policies are all about getting a better deal for the customer, for the passenger and for the taxpayer, as we have done with all earlier privatisations.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East referred to the fact that nowhere else in the world had the kind of policy that we propose for British Rail been implemented in practice and in full. This criticism has been made of our privatisation proposals over the past decade.

[Mr. MacGregor]

It is interesting that all round the world many Governments now follow the policies that we have successfully pursued. I believe it will be the same with the railways.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Surely the Minister is not saying that fares are not going to rise. In electricity, gas and British Telecom we have seen enormous increases in bills to customers and we are going to see the same in British Rail as well.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman knows that fares have risen under British Rail as a nationalised industry. There are a number of reasons for that, one of which is that if one is undertaking a substantial capital investment programme, as British Rail is, the cost has to be shared by the user and the taxpayer. It has been occurring in recent years in British Rail as well for the reasons that I have just given.

Mr. Connarty rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I want to get on. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East did not give way a great deal and I have already given way a lot in my first 10 minutes. When we get to Second Reading I shall again give a comprehensive description of our proposals and show how they fit into the Bill. Today, I would like to make two important announcements about two aspects of our policy.

First, I wish to restate our objectives. We have seen considerable improvements in British Rail in many parts of our country in recent years and again I pay tribute to the work of the chairman, the board, management and employees. The recent changes called "Organising for Quality" have taken British Rail further in the direction of commercialisation and have improved the efficiency of the organisation a good deal. There are currently record levels of investment in British Rail, higher than in the last three decades, and in the autumn statement we added another £239 million to the external financing limit of British Rail on top of the leasing proposals. The key difference and the key point about the leasing proposals is that it is possible to do them in anticipation of privatisation because the risk of the leases will be transferred to the private sector. Therefore, it does not break normal public sector

I have to say to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East that, had the country had the misfortune to have a Labour Government and had the hon. Gentleman tried to carry through his leasing proposals, which were based on keeping them entirely in the public sector, they would have counted against the public sector guarantee whereas ours do not. That is a fundamental difference and he has failed to understand it so far. That is why we have not been following his approach.

Mr. Foulkes: The Secretary of State is talking about investment. He will be aware that there is great concern about investment in track and rolling stock for the west coast line from Glasgow to London. Such investment is absolutely necessary. I use the line regularly and I know how increasingly inadequate it is becoming. When would the right hon. Gentleman expect British Rail to be able to make the necessary investment in that line?

Mr. MacGregor: It has started. I make two comments immediately. First, we have record levels of investment at present and it is for British Rail to decide priorities. There must be a limit to the amount of money from the taxpayer which can be put into British Rail. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East seeks to imply that he would not have a limit and would pour in unlimited sums or much larger sums than we are investing. Secondly, the prospects of faster investment will be enhanced if we can secure privatisation, or when we secure Royal Assent, because it will be possible then to seek private finance as well.

Although there are currently record levels of investment, no one could argue that the present services are perfect, that the culture—which remains that of a monopoly nationalised industry—cannot and should not be improved and that we could not get better value for the substantial taxpayers' money going into the system.

I do not find, as I go round the country or as I listen to colleagues in the House, that people are satisfied with British Rail. They clearly are not. The public also know that monolithic, old-fashioned nationalised industries are not the best way of providing services efficiently and responsibly.

Our proposals are designed to deal with these criticisms, to get that improvement in service which the customers are still demanding and to get the better value for money by breaking down the monolothic structure of the industry. Our proposals start from the belief that the private sector, spurred on by competition, is far more likely to be responsive to customers and to change the culture. The private sector can provide better and more efficient services. We have applied the philosophy successfully across the economy to many privatised industries. It is as relevant to transport as to any other part of the economy: on the roads, in the air, in our airports and in our seaports.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I think I had better move on. I have already given way a great deal.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has a well-known tendency to say the first thing that comes into his head without pausing to reflect whether it might be remotely right or not. He has been doing it again today and he has done it twice in the recent past. I see that he is saying that our rail proposals are dead and buried and that the Prime Minister's reference to semi-privatisation means the first U-turn of the year. The hon. Gentleman is totally wrong on both counts and I will deal with both?

Mr. Prescott: A semi U-turn?

Mr. MacGregor: It is a strange corpse that will be emerging in a week or two in substantial living form. I refer to the privatisation Bill. We have had inevitable delays while the paving measure has been going through Parliament. As soon as we get Royal Assent to that Bill, which I hope will be very soon, we shall publish the main Bill, which will be long and full. As it passes through both Houses, it will provide many opportunities to make clear our proposals in more detail than I have time for now.

At the same time, we shall be publishing a series of documents about particular aspects of the policy, as we have done in recent months. We have already had a consultation document on the franchising of passenger services. We have had an extremely useful response and I hope to announce a list of pilot franchises in the near future. I call them pilot franchises because they are not, of course, real franchises; we cannot have real franchises operated by the public sector until we have Royal Assent and the authority to set them up. That will involve the franchising authority, the tendering process and so on. That is for 1994. But it is useful, on the basis of the responses to the consultation document on the franchising of passenger services, to structure British Rail and to set up pilot franchises so that they are ready and from which we can gain experience.

In connection with the franchising of passenger services —this bears on the remarks of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East about the existing staff of British Rail—I hope that the staff will bid for the franchises. We are positively encouraging management buy-outs and will assist them in the process. There is a clear indication that we shall have quite a number. [Interruption.] We shall be encouraging managers who are currently with British Rail, in the public sector, to play a full part in the franchising by bidding for the franchises. I cannot make the position clearer than that.

We have issued proposals on the British Transport police and we are considering the many responses that we have had. We have issued a paper on the rail users consultative committees, which have been broadly welcomed. We shall soon be producing important documents on charges for access to track and on the management and ownership of rolling stock in the newly shaped industry. We have been proparing, and will continue to prepare, our plans in close co-operation with the chairman of British Rail and his staff.

So it seems to be an extraordinary corpse that is "dead and buried". The movement is very much alive. We cannot implement our proposals until the legislation is passed. We shall begin in 1994 and there will be a planned programme of franchises and sales from then on.

Mr. Dalyell: What about the new health and safety regulations that are said to be necessary in relation to the transport of hazardous substances? What regulations will have to be introduced for the transportation of nuclear materials? The report says:

"In view of the potential loss of British Rail's existing tight control, it is considered necessary to introduce new health and safety regulations along the lines of those already in force for the transport of such materials by road."

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that will involve a number of instruments coming before the House?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall deal with that document at the appropriate point in my speech because there is much more to be said about the document in general than the point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

As for the accusation of a U-turn, or even a semi U-turn, the policy remains as set out in our proposals following the publication of the White Paper. I have made it clear from the beginning that it is not possible to privatise British Rail in the classic sense of a once-and-for-all flotation through the stock exchange. For a start, much of British Rail makes losses and substantial subsidies are, and will continue to be, required. Where possible, we are selling to the private sector, and we are injecting private sector skills, management and capital, where in the foreseeable future that is not a realistic possibility. There is nothing different about that compared with what we said in the White Paper. Indeed, I said in my foreword to that document in July:

"Privatisation is one of the great success stories of this Government. It has taken different forms in different industries, but common to all privatisations has been the harnessing of the management skills, flair and entrepreneurial spirit of the private sector to provide better services to the public. The time has come to extend these benefits to the railways. This calls for a new approach. British Rail makes large losses. It cannot, therefore, be sold as a complete concern in the same way as other industries which we have privatised."

So it is absolutely clear that we are following through our original proposals. They do not represent privatisation completely, in the sense that many privatisations have been understood up to now. The passenger services are not being sold, but are being franchised and that is why it is right to refer to it as a semi-privatisation.

It means essentially that we shall be injecting the private sector into the railways. Hence, exactly as outlined in the White Paper, we shall sell what can be sold—principally the freight businesses and stations—while the passenger services will be progressively franchised. In other words, there will be contracts, won in competition with the private sector, to run services in return for subsidising where it is required, or for a fee where it is not. BR's monopoly will end.

The track and signalling will remain in public ownership, although in the long term privatisation of that is not ruled out. Railtrack will obtain its services in the private sector to the maximum possible extent through contracting out. There will be contracts between the providers of services and the operator of the track. That is the scheme that we set out in the White Paper, the scheme on which we have been working and the scheme that we shall be putting before the House. We believe it to be the most practicable way of getting private sector disciplines and competition into the railway industry.

I have explained our proposals and I hope that Opposition Members will agree that there is not a shred of a policy that is dead and buried. Nor is there a shred of a U-turn in what we are doing. As I said, I shall be setting out again our proposals in full on Second Reading, but today I shall deal with some of the criticisms of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East and some of the concerns that have been expressed in recent weeks.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): In referring to franchising, my right hon. Friend has not dealt with an aspect that is of particular importance to my constituents. One section of the railway which, by common consent, will never attract any franchise interest is local commuter services, which are vital to my area. Ministerial statements have been made about the protection of subsidies going to those services. Will my right hon. Friend explain what mechanism will be provided to assure me and others like me that that subsidy and those services will continue?

Mr. MacGregor: I can make two points to reassure my hon. Friend. The first is that it will be eligible for franchising—not for sale—and I believe that many commuter lines will benefit from franchised services. The second is that, as we have made clear throughout, for socially necessary lines, which include a large number of commuter lines, subsidy will continue. An element of the competition is that franchisees will be able to bid for the subsidy and in that way we shall ensure that we get the best competitive element into the subsidy. But the subsidy will continue and the franchisees will have to guarantee to provide certain services in the contract with the franchising authority. My hon. Friend can reassure his constituents entirely on that score.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I am anxious to make progress and I must insist on the hon. Gentleman being the last to intervene.

Mr. Wilson: It will interest the people of Cheadle and elsewhere to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is giving an assurance that the track of 11,000 miles will be maintained. Such an assurance from him will relieve many worries among hon. Members in all parts of the House.

Mr. MacGregor: I had intended to deal with that issue later, but I will deal with it now. We have made clear throughout—there is no change—that we expect most, or a very high proportion, of the national network to continue—[Interruption.] Let me be absolutely clear about it. One cannot give a guarantee for all time. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman would not wish to give such a guarantee. Were he to give a guarantee for all time, he would not be taking account of economic and commercial realities.

There may be cases where the economic demand has changed, where there is little demand for a service and where proposals can be put forward for the closure of that service. That has happened in the past 10 years, when demand has fallen away, and it could happen in the next 10. If it does, we shall follow very closely the existing system and the statutory procedures for dealing with closures. They must be followed closely. There must be some adjustments to deal with the new system.

However, when the Bill comes out it will be seen that it is very much on all fours with what has existed in the past. The existing procedures will continue. There is absolutely nothing wrong or hidden. We expect the vast majority of services to continue for a long period—[Interruption.] I am being very precise about this. There may be occasions on which, as in the past 10 years, there is agreement that there is no longer a demand for a service. In those circumstances, there may be proposals for closure. If so, the statutory procedure will apply in the usual way. The socially necessary lines to which I have referred include commuter and rural services. In those cases the subsidies will continue, as we have made absolutely clear.

I turn now to the question of safety.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I really must move on. In any case, I could not have been more explicit. I have made it absolutely clear that, in all cases of social necessity, subsidies will continue.

On the question of safety, it will probably be for the convenience of the House if I refer to the report that I am publishing this afternoon. It was my intention to publish it later in the week, but the process has been accelerated. Publication of the report and of the Government's response has been a very fast process. Far from trying to conceal the report, I am only too delighted to have this opportunity to say something about it.

Throughout, I have stressed the paramount importance that has been given to safety matters in our privatisation proposals. That was emphasised in the White Paper that we published in July 1992. I utterly reject the accusations about safety that have been made. What my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) said in his intervention was absolutely right: British Airways simply cannot be accused of ignoring safety requirements in the event of privatisation. Indeed, the situation is quite the reverse. It would be commercially disastrous for companies such as British Airways or for franchise passenger services to acquire a bad reputation in respect of safety. Of course, such undertakings will attach paramount importance to the question of safety, as will the Government. That must be made absolutely clear.

I am grateful for the opportunity to refer to the definitive report of the Health and Safety Commission on the appropriate future safety arrangements for the railways. [Interruption.] Given his interest in safety, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, instead of shouting across the Chamber, might listen to what I have to say about this extremely important matter. Over the next few months there will be ample opportunity to discuss the report.

The House will be aware that the Health and Safety Commission is the independent authority responsible for safety on the railways. Its report, which was foreshadowed last July in the White Paper, in which we asked for a detailed and thorough study of our proposals, contains 38 detailed recommendations, including proposals for new regulations under the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974, which would provide the statutory framework for the new arrangements. I am pleased to tell the House that the Government accept the commission's recommendations in full. I am satisfied that the commission's proposals will provide a robust and practical framework for ensuring that the benefits that privatisation will bring to the railways will in no way diminish the safety of passengers using or of employees working on the railways.

It is very important that it is the Health and Safety Commission, which is independent and which I am sure the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull would never criticise in that respect, that has produced this report and I have said that its proposals will provide a satisfactory framework. In particular, the Government accept that considerable care will have to be taken—this point is made in the report—to set up systems to ensure that new operators are properly equipped and organised so that they may give confidence that risk will be effectively controlled right from the start and that important matters will not fall between the safety arrangements of the various parties.

We also agree that it is vital that the process be properly planned and managed, having full regard to the capabilities and morale of staff who have to make it happen, and that it is essential that British Rail's specialist expertise be retained to ensure proper validation of the new organisations. The proposals are designed to achieve those ends and that is why they have our full commitment and support.

Mr. Prescott: This is disgusting.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East says, "This is disgusting." What he really means is that he is extremely disappointed that I have been able to come to the House this afternoon and say that we have a report providing an assurance in respect of safety and that all the recommendations will be implemented in full. I hope the hon. Gentleman agrees that this is a major issue and that it is right that I should devote attention to it. If I had not done so, the hon. Gentleman would have spent the afternoon levelling safety accusations against me. In fact, he is disappointed that I have been able to say that we accept in full the recommendations contained in the report.

Mr. Prescott: What the Secretary of State has said is absolutely outrageous. We have protested about the fact that the document was not available. We have not been able to make our judgment, but I am sure that the Health and Safety Commission will say a number of things and enter a number of qualifications. The report says:

"The consequences of failing to achieve adequate systems of control will be seen in increased risk on the railway system and in the likelihood of an increase in the numbers and severity of accidents."

Presumably it goes on to justify the stated opinion concerning safety. It is not fair for the Secretary of State to criticise the Opposition when we have not had access to the report. A document as important as this one should have been the subject of a statement to the House. We should have been able to subject this report to proper critical analysis. The Secretary of State should at least be courteous enough to recognise that we have not had an opportunity to read the report. It is totally unacceptable that he should characterise our protests as being outrageous. If only for the sake of decency, perhaps he would like to withdraw that remark.

Mr. MacGregor: It is hardly appropriate for the hon. Gentleman to use the word "disgusting" when I am telling the House about the report and its recommendations on this crucial matter. I have emphasised that, as the Bill goes through the House, there will be endless opportunities to discuss the details. The report is very detailed and there will be full parliamentary debate.

The report sets out the guiding principles, which the Government accept in full. The commission's central recommendation is that there should be a "cascade model" of safety validation for railway operators. In layman's language, this means a system that properly establishes the different levels of responsibility. It is proposed that each railway undertaking should produce a railway safety case, which would set out the undertaking's safety policy, risk assessment, safety management system and maintenance and operational arrangements insofar as they relate to health and safety issues.

These railway safety cases would be validated by the infrastructure controller—that is, Railtrack. At the top of the cascade, the Health and Safety Executive would validate Railtrack's railway safety case, including Railtrack's system for validating operators' safety cases. British Rail's safety organisation will be maintained as a unit and will be transferred to Railtrack.

I am aware that some people have criticsed the number of bodies that will be involved in our privatisation proposals. The Health and Safety Commission, as the independent safety authority, is, of course, one of those bodies. I wish to emphasise that the commission is already, under current circumstances, the safety authority. Thus, we are not adding a new body; we are ensuring that we have the full machinery that we need to fulfil all safety commitments. I do not believe that anyone in the House would wish otherwise.

The report has been fully discussed with British Rail and I myself have had a meeting with the chairmen of the Health and Safety Commission and British Rail for the purpose of going over the key issues. I can tell the House that Sir Bob Reid is fully satisfied and that this afternoon he is welcoming the report and endorsing the proposals. I am today asking the chairmen of the Health and Safety Commission and of British Rail to press ahead with implementation of the commission's proposals.

Clearly, I do not have time this afternoon to go into any of the detailed recommendations, but the House needs to know that the report concludes:

"It is considered that the recommendations in this report, if implemented, will provide the necessary assurances for the public and the work force."

As I have said, we have accepted the regulations and agreed them with British Rail and will implement them. The regulations will replace British Rail's internal rules for the carriage of dangerous substances. It is accepted that the carriage of such substances should be subject to statutory regulation, especially with new operators entering the field, and that will be done.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is a special case for the carriage of nuclear substances?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already said that we shall be implementing the recommendations in full by way of regulations.

I express my warm appreciation to the Health and Safety Commission for its skill and hard work in carrying out such a detailed and thorough study. The way in which it has carried out its task has been exemplary and ensures that our safety regime has been thoroughly validated at professional and expert level and has been agreed by all concerned. That was a major priority in our privatisation proposals and it has now been successfully accomplished. We shall now proceed with the implementation.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East accused me of trying to conceal the report. On the contrary, I wanted it to get as much attention as possible.

When I last spoke to the House, I said that I had had meetings with the major rail unions about our proposals. The issue on which they most pressed me, and an issue on which they all felt strongly, was pensions. I have made clear to them that I fully understand the importance that they attach to the pension arrangements. It has been raised by a number of hon. Members in the House and many right hon. and hon. Members have written to me and to my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport about pension matters.

The union pressed two views on me: that the BR pension funds should be secure, and that for the future some form of joint industry arrangement should be developed from the present pension funds. I shall be publishing a paper on pensions within the next two weeks, but I am able to say now that the Government agree that there should be a joint industry pension scheme to succeed the present BR scheme; that there should be arrangements to ensure that pensions to which railway staff are now entitled are safeguarded; and that their future pension benefits should be no less favourable than in the present BR scheme.

[Mr. MacGregor]

We do not think that participation in the joint scheme should be compulsory for future employers in the industry for all time. We consider that those employers should be compelled to protect the accrued pension rights of those in the industry. The paper will explain the sort of joint industry scheme that we have in mind.

I wish to deal separately with the rights of railway pensioners. The industry is not to be privatised as one. That is why a joint industry scheme is necessary. It would be impractical to allocate to new parts of the industry all the people who have retired or deferred their pensions. Therefore, we propose one of two options. The first is that the appropriate part of the existing fund should be set aside and administered separately for the pensioners. The fund would not be guaranteed, so the pensioners would depend on the skill of the fund managers for their benefits. Alternatively, part of the fund could be taken over by the Government who would undertake to pay index-linked pensions. That option would provide a firm guarantee, but the benefits would not improve in real terms as they might under the first option. We want to hear the views of the BR trustees, whom we shall consult closely on these matters, and the pensioners themselves about those options.

I cannot in this speech go into such an important topic in depth. The paper will deal with such matters as how the new scheme should be governed. We shall, of course, study the comments of the industry when it has considered the paper. It is likely that amendments will be required to the Bill, particularly in order to procure future arrangements for pensioners. Amendment will obviously depend on the responses, but it seemed to us better to consult first rather than be too prescriptive. I hope that what I have said will reassure the members of the pension schemes. I am also able to tell the House that I have discussed the proposals with the chairman of BR and that he is broadly content.

The House will know that the pension law review committee chaired by Professor Goode is due to report by June. I hope that we shall be able to take account of its thinking in establishing the joint industry scheme.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East accused us of producing complex proposals and spoke about quangos, ignoring the fact that some already exist. The vast majority of the organisations about which he spoke are in being and would certainly exist under any scheme that he would propose. I have never suggested that the reforms would be simple, because British Rail is already a large and complex organisation. This process of radical change is bound to be complex, but it is certainly not over-complex and there are good reasons for all the proposals that the hon. Gentleman criticised.

In other areas of transport we do not generally expect the provider of services to run the infrastructure as well. Therefore, the split between Railtrack and rail services is well precedented. The simple arrangement of private sector operators running services on track provided by Railtrack and the public sector providing the infrastructure is at the heart of our proposals. Obviously, that means the setting up of Railtrack. Other supporting organisations will make the system work.

We currently pay subsidies of £1 billion a year to British Rail. In future, subsidy will be paid to franchisees. That should assure my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day). There must be someone to specify the service, to nominate funds and to ensure value for money. That is what the franchising authority will do, but in public. All that activity takes place now, but behind closed doors within British Rail. One of the strangest criticisms of the setting up of the franchising authority is that the public must not know how much subsidy goes to some lines lest people be shocked. Our proposals are a positive advantage in terms of open government and open discussion about where taxpayers' money is spent.

The regulator will protect consumers' interests, prevent anti-competitive behaviour and ensure that operators have equitable access to the railway. All privatised industries with any element of monopoly have a regulator to provide such protection and the railway should be no exception. Some people have even criticised the establishment of rail users consultative committees as adding another layer of bureaucracy, quite ignoring the point that such committees already exist. To ensure that there are as few different bodies as possible, I have proposed that those committees should report to the regulator, who will, after all, be the guardian of the consumers' interests.

I have already dealt with the safety authority. It cannot remotely be criticised for being a separate body, because it is that already. Our proposals do not amount to the great bureaucracy which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East accused us of creating. I should like to nail one or two other canards, although I have already dealt with some in answer to questions. It has been said that there will be widespread closures of passenger services. I have said repeatedly and say it again that we shall subsidise socially necessary services. As I have said, subsidy will continue to be paid through the franchising director to franchisees who will bid for it for lines that cannot operate without it.

One of our main aims is to get better value for money over time. The franchise contractors will deal with fares. Where there is an element of monopoly power, as there is on the London commuter routes, the franchise contracts will fix the fares. The regulator will control the fares of open access operators with monopoly powers. Elsewhere the franchising director will need to consider the proposals of potential operators when judging their bids to run franchised services. A fixed formula might be incorporated in the franchise contract to limit fare increases. We shall be able to debate all those issues later, but I have made the position clear about closure of lines, franchises and subsidies.

As I have said, we shall maintain the formal statutory closure procedure, offering no less a safeguard on proposals for closure than the existing one. Plainly, there will need to be some changes to the existing procedure to reflect the changed structure of the railway, and the details of the scheme will be set out in the Bill.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East spoke about the timetable. A few days ago the old railway traditions of interest from the clergy were observed when Canon Hugh Montefiore suggested that there could be no national timetable. There will be such a timetable and Railtrack will be responsible for providing it. Some critics say that it will not be possible to buy a through ticket, but that criticism is answered in the White Paper because such tickets will be available and the Bill will provide for them. Those are just a few of the misunderstandings that I have sought to correct. I hope that they will not be repeated in the House or outside.

Shortly, on Second Reading of the main privatisation Bill, we shall be able to debate all these matters again. I believe that we have got the structure right and I am absolutely convinced that in order to bring about further improvements in British Rail passenger and freight services it is right to introduce more competition and choice and inject private sector management skills and capital.

As the Bill goes through Parliament we shall be able to discuss all the issues and make adjustments where we consider that they are justified. But the clear message is that privatisation is necessary to inject private sector discipline into the railway industry. It will happen, but not in a great unseemly and ill-thought-out rush. We are making our preparations steadily and deliberately. There is no U-turn. I look forward to introducing the Bill to the House and to getting on with it and that is why I support the amendment in the name of my right hon. Friends.

5.9 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): One should have sympathy for the Secretary of State. He reminds me of a person in a glass maze in a funfair, eternally seeking a way through but always bumping his nose on another piece of glass. He took over an incredible dog's breakfast of a product and he is finding it impossible to organise a sensible or even acceptable policy to move towards privatisation.

Britain's railway system, which grew up in an age when rail was a new form of transport and able to attract great investment, went through a period when private industry was no longer able to produce a profit. Any railway system anywhere in the world will demonstrate only too clearly that we need a state railway system, subsidised by taxpayers, integrated and planned on the basis of people being able to move easily from one form of transport to another and providing a service. I was struck by the fact that the Secretary of State believed that, somehow or other, it was wrong to maximise service. Surely the main function of a railway system is the transportation of people and goods in a manner which is convenient and useful to them. When it ceases to perform that function, it is an anachronism.

I am sorry to say that the proposed privatisation of British Rail is an unalloyed disaster because it has not been thought out. No one has produced, either today or on any other occasion, an adequate reason—certainly no adequate economic reason—why the proposed changes will improve the service. It is clear that any transport system must have money from the taxpayer if it is to operate efficiently. The Secretary of State congratulated himself on the time he had taken to bring the changes about, but at no point did he explain why he was not prepared to publish a Green Paper, consult widely with private and state industry and produce a proper workable plan.

We are rushing ahead with a Bill which answers none of the basic questions. Already the uncertainty created by the risk of privatisation is leading to a flight away from the carriage of freight within the industry and causing the private firms which provide the rolling stock openly to declare that they are facing a long period of industrial blight and cannot look forward to order books with even adequate amounts of work. The Railway Industry Association went public with the information that 75 per cent. of its private firms are working at only 75 per cent. of their capacity now, expect almost empty order books in 1994 and will be unable to provide within a reasonable time either work or rolling stock for any new system, privatised or non-privatised.

We now have the worst of all worlds. The Government are committed to privatisation but have not thought it out. They cannot provide an economic argument or even produce a practical plan for supporting the existing system. British Rail, whose reorganisation has already led to enormous uproar and which is facing real problems of morale, is being told that it must nevertheless face yet another period of uncertainty. All the men and women who work in the industry, who in the past five years have experienced enormous changes and have responded with enormous alacrity and great good will to the demands made upon them by the British Rail management, are now told that, regardless of how much better their productivity is or how much effort they have put into improving it, they are to be subjected to yet another period of violent change. Some will be told that they will lose their jobs or that their pensions are at risk, and the majority will look forward to a period of uncertainty and change which is not justified on political or economic grounds but only on grounds of pure dogma.

It is no accident that increasing numbers of ex-Conservative Members of the House are voicing real worries about the future of the railway system. They know that, there is a direct link between the support of the electorate and the provision of a proper transport system. They understand that, without a transport system which enables people to go to work safely and to give a good service, the Conservative party will pay in terms of votes and political support. Those arguments have so far been completely ignored, not just by the Secretary of State but by the Government, who should know better.

I am not surprised that the report "Ensuring Safety on Britain's Railways" has been dealt with in the slightly cackhanded manner that we have seen today. One has only to look rapidly at some of the things that it says to realise why there are real worries about privatisation. The report says:

> "BR will specify to any potential new operator the safety-related conditions of access".

It goes on to lay down various pieces of machinery. On page 22, paragraph 3.7, it says:

> "At present BR is obliged to control and is responsible for all aspects of railway safety; it controls the infrastructure and operates all services. In any scenario which divides this control by introducing new independent operators the body which controls the infrastructure will continue to hold a dominant position."

Whatever is introduced, the report lays down the need for machinery which will respond to the real safety needs of the passenger.

The Secretary of State has a responsibility to explain why a fragmented system will produce a better service for the passenger, but he has never once done so. He has told us that subsidies will continue because he knows that any private operator who comes in will look immediately for a good return on capital invested. A private operator will want property, facilities and all the things that can be taken out of the existing system without necessarily putting back the expensive services which are at present the function of British Rail. Whatever the Secretary of State says, private operators will not rush into buying new trains and providing new services. Private operators will not want the difficult bits of Network SouthEast or the commuter lines around Manchester. They will know all too well that those are difficult and expensive services with many problems.

The Secretary of State should be prepared to say that, whether one is talking about safety, subsidy, investment or an integrated planned transport system, privatisation is not the answer. British Rail does not do all that we want it to do, but instead of accepting that some of its problems arise from lack of investment, the Government come here and say that it would be much better if it were sold off in bits to any private franchisee wishing to take on the service. That is totally irresponsible, as I believe many Conservative Members know. Many hon. Members at all levels understand the importance to their constituents of a transport system which delivers people, safely and at a reasonable price, to the place where they want to go. People want clean, safe railways which do not just deliver them to certain mainline stations, but provide subsidiary local services at the desired times and places. All those facilities could be available if the Secretary of State were prepared to tell the Treasury, "The only thing basically wrong with the existing system is lack of investment and support."

I ask the Secretary of State in all sincerity not to think of our transport system as an ideological ball to be tossed in the air to show how much more Conservative the Government are than any of their predecessors. Destroying the present integrated system will not produce a better result for the passenger or for the economy—it will simply pile confusion on confusion and hazard on hazard. Unless the Secretary of State asks the Cabinet to think again, it will not be only Opposition Members who find themselves in grave difficulty when the Bill is presented. All Members who generally want to protect their constituents' interests will have to ask themselves a simple question—whether the Bill will improve the transport system or make it worse; and if it will make the system worse, we can surely all unite in defeating it in no uncertain manner.

Sir David Mitchell (Hampshire, North-West): There is something of an enigma in the Opposition's attitude to British Rail. They have spent the past 10 years lambasting its management; now they oppose the most effective way of lifting it into the 20th century.

Yet British Rail is not so very bad. Britain runs more trains at over 100 mph than any other EC country; BR has the fastest fleet of commercial diesels in the world; and in InterCity it has the world's only profitable main line railway. Privatisation will provide many opportunities for BR to build on those achievements and to improve passenger services. Of course that will mean change, and change means fears and uncertainties, but I think that we can draw some confidence from what has happened in other public services when the private sector has been introduced.

I hope that Railtrack will draw on the experience of local government, which has made a great success of contracting out. Local government is taking on the role of enabler rather than that of doer, and huge benefits have resulted. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that he proposes such action, for private contractors will be able to invest in the most modern machinery, outside Treasury control.

In local government, contracting out has led to changed working methods, more modern equipment, higher productivity, larger pay packets and lower costs. I should like an assurance that Railtrack will not perpetuate British Rail's current institutionalised position as doer rather than enabler. We need a culture change, and I believe that that is the way to achieve it.

On the subject of franchising, large subsidies have been made available—£300 million for London Commuter Services and £700 million for Regional Railways. We can learn from the example of the bus industry, which was given subsidies on condition that it tendered competitively to the county or metropolitan councils first. That saved £40 million per year. I believe that similar benefits can be gained from franchising with competitive bids, for the minimum public subsidy.

Investment is a vital aspect. I find myself in a minor alliance with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in that I fear that there is a danger that BR will not invest in rolling stock because it does not know whether it will hold the franchise, and the franchise companies will not invest yet because they do not know whether they will have it either. There is a danger of a gap in the flow of orders to the railway manufacturers. I believe that the best solution would be for the manufacturing industry, or the City financing institutions, to set up leasing companies to build new rolling stock which they expect a future operator to acquire—whether that operator is BR or a franchise company.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take the initiative, and to see that such an operation is set up, so that the manufacturing industry does not experience a continuation of the current drying up of orders. It is likely that orders will run out in 1994. Such an arrangement would also make new rolling stock available to a future operator when it is needed.

I wish to make two points about freight. First, BR appears currently to be preparing the freight sector for privatisation by making its existing operation leaner, fitter and more viable—and hence more attractive to private sector bidders or a management buy-out. It is achieving that by pricing off non-viable freight traffic. However, as the Government's whole case for privatisation is that the skills of the private sector, its productivity, its capital and its lower costs all mean that it can win more traffic off the roads and get it on to the railways, surely there is a case for introducing open access now. I fear that the traffic now being priced off is the very traffic which ought to be and would be retained on rail in a private sector operation.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister believes that transferring more freight on to rail will provide substantial benefits, including environmental benefits. If those benefits are to result from private sector involvement, we should surely allow open access now so that the private sector can bid for the services which BR is currently pricing off and not making available to the private sector. I hope that my hon. Friend will announce this week that he will require BR to provide open access to freight operators immediately, rather than waiting until a future time when a significant part of rail freight will have been transferred back to the roads. That would be a very bad start to a major opportunity for the private sector to extend its activities on the railway.

Secondly, the extent to which freight is carried by rail depends chiefly on the charges made for the use of track. What will be the basis of those charges? It used to be the marginal or extra costs, with the main sector user carrying the structural costs. Will that still apply? As privatisation and franchising are introduced, every user will attempt to offload the costs to other users. I am expressing the anxiety that there will be a tendency to try to shift costs on to freight which previously were borne by the main sector operator. Will my hon. Friend the Minister publish the criteria on which freight will be charged for the use of the railways and ensure that there is an appeal procedure against overcharging? Otherwise, I fear that far too much freight will be priced off the railways because the costs being attributed to freight are disproportionate to that which they should be.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reply to those points when he replies to the debate.

5.30 pm

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): The Secretary of State said that he could not understand why we were holding this debate today. His press department must have given him the recent cuttings and he must be aware that, whether it is privatisation, semi-privatisation or commercialisation, the Government's policy is wrong.

As the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, this proposal has been on the agenda for some time. It has exercised the Secretary of State's predecessors, who have contemplated it, tussled with it, thought better of it and discarded it. There has naturally been some speculation that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would do the same. He has confirmed today that he intends to press ahead very much along the lines of the White Paper published last summer. In doing so, he is setting about something quite new and he is right to say that it is nearly privatisation. It does not compare with anything that we have seen before in this country or with another train regime in the world.

We have not heard to my satisfaction any clear statement of the benefits for passengers. I think that the Secretary of State said that BR managers would be allowed to bid in the franchising operation. If I am right, that is new and not what I have understood him to say before. Will he go one step further and confirm that BR, as an entity, will be able to bid in the franchise process? That single factor would give some credibility to the project.

The Secretary of State placed different emphasis today on the time scale. I welcome the suggestion that the process might take as long as the German process, which took 12 years. In a previous debate the Secretary of State said that it was his aspiration to get the majority of the network into the hands of private operators within the lifetime of this Parliament. On another occasion he said that private sector interest in these opportunities was such that he was holding back the floodgates until the spring of 1994. I welcome the change of emphasis which I believe that I detected today in suggesting that the timetable might be more relaxed.

In whatever form it finally happens, and at whatever time, the problem is that privatisation is happening after years of underfunding by consecutive Governments, as even the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) acknowledged. The confusion and delay of the past five years have prevented forward planning. There has been a hiatus in investment by British Rail, any possible private players in the rail system and local authorities.

The question that I ask is whether the proposals that have been made, which were restated today, are practical and possible to implement. It is difficult to find anyone outside the House who knows anything about the rail system and is prepared to express confidence in the arrangements. I sincerely doubt whether the proposals can create a national rail network capable of meeting and providing a socially necessary service.

The Secretary of State is charging pig-headedly onward in the face of opposition not only from Opposition Members but from leading Conservative luminaries who have held his post in the past, from the chairman of British Rail and from the majority of members of the Transport Select Committee. If the Government proceed at full steam, they will stoke up a heap of trouble in suburban and rural areas, where voters are predominantly Conservative. The comment of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich that there will be a high electoral price to pay for this will prove correct.

Mr. Milligan: The hon. Gentleman's stinging attack on the Government's policies is bizarre as his party supported at the last election the principle of franchising the railways.

Mr. Harvey: My party has had a lengthy debate on these issues, which is probably more than can be said for the Conservative party. We would have been perfectly willing to entertain any sensible suggestions—we have no ideological objection to private involvement in the railways and we would have liked the Government to make believable or credible proposals—but the White Paper is a recipe for chaos and anarchy on the railways, which we cannot possibly support.

It is perhaps a pity that more notice was not taken of those who urged a sensible approach which would have enabled private operators to be involved. No doubt entrepreneurs will snap up the profitable routes. They may be able to improve some services because they will get access to the capital markets and will be freer of the Treasury rules. My concern is for the majority of rail passengers who use lines which need some subsidy but which will continue to lose money even after privatisation. Such lines, even with some subsidy, will prove pretty unattrative to the private sector. Despite the Secretary of State's refernce to holding back the floodgates, there is no real evidence that there is a market.

It will require substantial funding to keep those services operating to the standards that the public demands. The catch-22 is that if franchisees take on routes and begin to improve their performance and financial returns, the Government will gradually reduce and withdraw the subsidy. Is that not a disincentive to anyone who might be interested in making a go of those lines? If the Government proceed with the proposal to franchise whole geographical areas, might not the new operators of those zones or areas start wanting to cut the loss-making services?

The Government have said vaguely that they will safeguard socially necessary services and have restated that again today, but we have not had a clear definition of a socially necessary service. The fear must be that more and more services would be cut and replaced by inferior bus services. The Secretary of State squirmed over guarantees and safeguards. He said at one point that the majority of lines would be safeguarded, and at another point that almost all of them would be. If Government support to the non-economic franchisees is strictly cash limited, there may be pressure on the franchising authority to decide that various services are no longer socially necessary.

One can foresee the pressures which would build up against some of those lines. The new transparency will mean that the full costs will be exposed, making some of them more vulnerable. The cross-subsidy will disappear, at least in the form in which we know it. The cost of upgrading lines to the new, tougher safety standards will be higher. The infrastructure costs in general are higher in rural areas because more is spent on avoiding hills and on tunnelling and bridges. There has been a decline in standards in many rural areas for many years as British Rail has been forced to tighten its financial belt and has been starved of vital resources.

One of the main concerns about the Government's proposals is the requirement for Railtrack—the new quango—to make a return on the system, which will make the future viability of some of the branch lines especially suspect. It is a matter of considerable interest to me as I come from the south-west which has a number of small rural services.

In 1981, my predecessor steered on to the statute book private Member's legislation which enabled British Rail to reopen on an experimental basis some of the rural lines which had been lost in earlier rounds of cuts. The White Paper states that the franchising authority will be allowed to decide whether those routes should be franchised. If they cannot be shown to be profitable, it is unlikely that there will be any prospect of their being franchised. At the moment those lines are not subject to statutory closure procedures, but they have proved their point. At the point of the privatisation of British Rail, which is seemingly to happen in the next few months, the Government should now safeguard those lines and subject them to the same closure procedures as all other socially necessary lines.

The regulator and franchising authority will be the bodies to provide and qualify what the safeguards will mean. There is also concern that they will be much more centralised than the current responsibilities exercised by British Rail. At least since the organising for quality arrangements, British Rail's set-up has placed management decision making and accountability at a more local level for passengers. So far as I am aware, there is no provision under the new arrangements for local authorities to take on more responsibilities.

Mr. Snape: Just the opposite.

Mr. Harvey: Yes, just the opposite—there is no provision for them to take on any more responsibility for service planning.

The track authority and the regulator are not even required to consult local authorities. In view of local authorities' scant budgets and the difficulties under which they operate, it is unclear how they would be able to play a part in that work. Even the role of the passenger transport authorities in the provincial conurbations may be threatened by the proposals.

We welcome the confirmation that there will continue to be statutory national and regional committees for rail users' interests, but we want them to be independent of the regulator. Let us consider the example of another privatised industry. The Gas Consumers Council is independent of the regulator and its work is much more effective than that of organisations trying to act under the wing of the regulator. Crucially, we want passenger bodies to be able to comment on franchising specifications; otherwise, it is almost pointless for them to exist.

I welcome the Secretary of State's stronger comments today about keeping network benefits such as through ticketing and timetabling. May we hope that they will be incorporated into the legislation as a requirement on any operator rather than being something that the regulator is merely invited to consider? May we hope that they will be referred to in the awarding of franchises?

The Prime Minister has harked back to the golden age of steam—I imagine that he has his copy of Bradshaw's timetable next to his collection of Wisden—but I wonder whether he really hankers after the time when people were able to operate their brightly coloured trains, fiercely competing against each other. Has he considered the possibility of trying to get from Huntingdon to Holyhead in such circumstances because he would find it very difficult? Unless operators are required to work to a common timetable instead of being left to their own devices, we shall have a recipe for utter chaos. The White Paper recognised the principle of a network—we heard more about that today—but it should be incorporated into the legislation as a requirement on operators.

We have not heard what will happen to the discounts enjoyed by various passengers. What will happen to student cards, pensioners' cards and any concessions for the disabled? Will the operators of the new franchised services be compelled to recognise those discounts, or will it be left to the operators' discretion and commercial judgment?

The proposals cause much concern, and I have outlined those which are of especial concern to people in rural areas. The proposals have serious environmental implications, and I fear that there will be less passenger and freight traffic on the railway. As a result, the environmental assistance that the railway could potentially bring to our national life could be lost.

We need a coherent national rail strategy. We must decide what role the railway can play in our economic and social life and in our environmental policies. We have not had such a debate, but it should have taken place before we embarked on the process that we are discussing. Rail must be given a level playing field with the rest of the transport network. My party has continually argued for that. We welcome the fact that cost benefit analysis will now be used in assessing rail investment, but could it not be extended to the awarding of franchises and to the principle of charges to be levied on operators when they use the track?

Just before Christmas I and members of two other parties were privileged to visit the new light rail set-up in Singapore. We saw an example of a Government having embarked on a major programme of investment, having built a service to the community and then offering private operators the opportunity to run it on a franchise basis. What a large contrast there is between that and what is now being proposed here.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that every light rail system being built in this country is virtually 100 per cent. supported by public money, either directly or through guaranteeing the amount of money that local authorities borrow and on which they pay interest, through the revenue support grant? The hon. Gentleman said that the Government have not taken the correct approach with light rail, but that is untrue: all such schemes are being handed to private organisations which will run them.

Mr. Harvey: I did not say that. My point was that it would be helpful to the future of the rail network if that approach were extended to the rest of the network. It would be more credible to expect private operators to want to run rail services if they did not have to pay for the many years of underinvestment in the rail network and to pay for what is likely to prove a most unattractive—even prohibitive—charge for using the track. It contrasts completely with the example that I gave where the infrastructure was built and provided free of charge and on which the operator was to make a return.

There might have been circumstances in which my party could have supported a Bill on railway private operations—we have no ideological objection to private operators using the rail network—but there is no such Bill. As the Secretary of State rightly said, this is not a classic privatisation. In fact, it is a classic miscalculation—one which the Government make at their peril and which will haunt them for many years to come.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): The House has heard a thoughtful speech from the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey). Indeed, he was gracious in mentioning his predecessor's interest in rail matters. I spoke twice in Barnstaple during the general election, which may account for the fact that the hon. Gentleman is here. Both speeches were about matters of public transport rather than party politics, which was rather the theme of the hon. Gentleman's speech. I mention, in a friendly way, that I happen to have here the Register of Members' Interests and I notice that the hon. Gentleman has not yet registered his visit to Singapore. He had better put it in the register before some unpleasant journalist picks up the point and makes trouble for him.

I have had discussions with the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on the subject. It is fair to say, as the hon. Member for North Devon has said, that his party is not dogmatic about the future of the railways. I hope that I am not dogmatic either. I am bound to say to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) that to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) accuse my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State of being dogmatic and then to look at the single-line Opposition motion makes one realise that it is rather like the pot calling the kettle black.

I say equally to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the Government amendment and everything that he says makes one underlying assumption—that, whatever the state of the railways at the moment, things can only get better. I have grave doubts about that proposition. The Government amendment

"recognises that progress has recently been made in improving British Rail's services".

I start my remarks with a point I have boringly made many times before in the House. In my view, party politics and public transport policy are very uneasy bedfellows. The railways are a vital part of the nation's transport infrastructure. If my right hon. and hon. Friends regard my enthusiasm for the railways as a crime, I plead guilty. However, when the party political shouting across the Chamber dies down and scrutiny of the Government's proposals begins, many more questions will be asked and will need to be answered than we have even touched on this afternoon.

Few would say that British Rail is perfect. I have never heard anybody say that it is perfect, so the proposition that there should never be any change to its structure or even partial ownership is an unwise position to take. However, I believe that we must have an analysis of the problem first.

That was why I intervened in my right hon. Friend's speech and mentioned Helmut Kohl's Government railway commission. I did so to make the point that if the Government are seriously trying to improve part of the nation's transport infrastructure, they have a duty first to analyse the problem. Is it caused by levels of investment? Is it caused by fluctuations in the public service obligation grant? Could taxation policy be used to advantage the railways and to forward a policy of transferring traffic from road to rail? Is there a level playing field? Are the Department's current road and rail investment criteria satisfactory in a country that is overcrowded and in which congestion and pollution are serious factors? None of those issues has even been discussed. They are not mentioned in the White Paper in any detail, nor, I suspect, will they even be touched on in the Bill.

The Labour party says no to any sort of privatisation. My right hon. Friend, if I may say so, reminds me of a schoolmaster at Uppingham, the late V.T. Saunders. When one entered his classroom for the first time, he said, "In this classroom, there are three ways of doing things: the right way, the wrong way and my way, and here you do things my way."

I commend yet again to my right hon. Friend the example of other members of the Cabinet recently. The Secretary of State for National Heritage produced a Green Paper on the future of the BBC. It was a very green paper. It was open-minded, it showed a willingness to listen, it was undogmatic and it allows plenty of time for consultation. Just before Christmas, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade produced another very Green Paper on the abuse of market power. Those are important documents. They need to be considered outwith the clamour of party politics. I regret very much that my right hon. Friend's proposals for the railways are being handled totally differently in the House from the way in which some of his Cabinet colleagues are going about discharging their ministerial duties.

The White Paper is a wholly inadequate basis for legislation. We have had the franchise document, which is a monument to Whitehall jargon. I suspect that the quangos that are mentioned therein would give Philip Holland nightmares, as those of us who have had the pleasure of serving in the House with him know.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport will tell me whether I am right when he replies, but I think that I am correct in saying that we were promised eight consultation documents—[Interruption.]

[Mr. Robert Adley]

May I have a glass of water? I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells). Will he please put a napkin over his left wrist?!

We were promised eight consultation documents. We have had two so far. Am I to understand that six more consultation documents are to come forward? Will the documents be produced in the next two weeks before the Bill appears? If so, do my right hon. and hon. Friends really feel that they are doing justice to the House by introducing major legislation when six of the eight documents that we were promised have not yet been produced?

I have no intention of peppering my speech with endless quotations. However, I received this morning from the Freight Transport Association a single sheet of paper which, I imagine, hon. Members interested in the subject will also have received. The opening sentence reads:

"Infrastructure charging is the factor likely to influence most the success of any privatisation or open access regime for rail freight."

Nobody has any detailed information on what the charges will be to run trains. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell) made that crucial point.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), as those of us on the Select Committee on Transport know, mentioned the state of British manufacturing industry. That is private sector industry. David Gillan, the director of the Railway Industry Association, has said that his members are "staring annihilation in the face."

That is not a happy situation for a Conservative Government to bring about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West has rightly referred to the haemorrhage of freight from rail to road. What is going on? Letters have obviously passed between the Secretary of State and the chairman of British Rail. The end product is nothing less than a haemorrhage of traffic from rail to road in contradistinction to the Government's stated policy. The Government want to transfer traffic from road to rail, but what is happening at the moment is that the traffic is moving in reverse. The Government cannot be happy with that. What are they doing about it?

I now turn to the question of passenger franchises. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will not ultimately prove guilty, in Harold Macmillan's famous phrase, of selling off the family silver. Granting franchises only on lines that have been subjected to substantial public sector investment will not do. My hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport kindly took me with him as part of his baggage to York recently. He made a very good speech and during the course of it—he will tell me if I am misquoting him—he said that on the Chiltern line, about which he used to receive endless complaints from passengers, he is now receiving accolades. That is excellent.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman) indicated assent.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend nods his head and I am grateful to him.

That example surely shows two things quite simply. First, if one puts investment into the railways, one improves the service. Secondly, the ownership is totally irrelevant to the satisfactory or unsatisfactory level of services. If that is the case, what are we doing with the Bill? How can we be sure that we shall actually provide a better railway for our constituents?

I again agree with the hon. Member for North Devon. He and I have made this point before. Excluding British Rail from quoting or bidding to run trains is just plain daft. Those at British Rail are the only people in this country who have experience of running trains. It is rather like suggesting that we shall reorganise the health service and the hospitals with doctors being excluded from providing patient care.

It is interesting to consider Sweden. Although there are very few analogies between what the Government propose and what the Swedes are doing, what has happened there is that SJ, to which the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) referred earlier, is being allowed, of course, to quote for the running of services. It has kept 99 per cent. of those services itself, but it has achieved a 30 per cent. reduction in costs, so the passenger has benefited and the Swedish taxpayer has benefited. SJ is running virtually the entire railway system, but its rail track is being heavily subsidised and only one third of track costs, as opposed to 100 per cent. of costs under the Government's current proposals, are required to be paid by the train operators.

I urge my right hon. Friend to take a serious look at what is happening in other countries and to consider the effect of his proposals before he continually lambasts me and any Conservative Member who dares to criticise what he proposes. In my view—and I think that it is a view shared by many people, especially those with current knowledge of railway operations—the separation of the responsibilities for the control of track and signalling on the one hand and for operating trains on the other is a potential disaster. Leaving aside all the organisational problems that will arise, that is a fundamental flaw in the Government's proposals. They really must reconsider.

We have been given a political timetable based purely on electoral considerations—on the desire to get some paint on trains by the end of 1994 so that we can say, "We're doing jolly well, aren't we?" If that is done, it will be irrelevant to the operation of the vast majority of railway services; and if it is done at the cost of undermining the integrity of the network, the Conservative party will pay a heavy price.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the Select Committee yesterday that, over the next three years, £150 million would be available to British Rail for leasing. He told us this afternoon that leasing could only be introduced in the autumn statement because it would be for the benefit of private sector companies and would not affect the public sector borrowing requirement. But if leasing money is available to British Rail now, the PSBR is presumably affected. The fact of the matter is that the unwillingness to allow leasing to take place has been a piece of Treasury dogma and has acted against the interests of our railways.

Let me ask my right hon. Friend to nod when I ask him this question: does he recall that he and I had a telephone conversation a few weeks ago, at the end of which he said, "Okay. Will you put forward some alternative proposals?"? He is not nodding. We had the conversation, however, and that is what I agreed to do. I put forward my alternative proposals but, frankly, my right hon. Friend did not have the courtesy to respond personally to my letter. So for the benefit of my hon. Friends, let me——

The Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household (Mr. David Lightbown): It was a private discussion.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend says——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The Whip is not in the Chamber.

Mr. Adley: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. But it was not a confidential discussion to which I cannot refer. It was perfectly fair for the Secretary of State to say, "Okay. Put forward your proposals", and I have done so and shall do so now—very briefly, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The first point that I made in my letter to my right hon. Friend was the same as that made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West: we should end the freight monopoly now. Then we can end the passenger monopoly and allow private sector operators the right to operate trains on our existing railway system. Then we can go on to create integrated railway operating companies based either on British Rail's current sectorisation or on geography—the lines on which some of the older companies were organised. That is a detail that can be worked out, but we must have integrated companies. The fourth stage—the ultimate stage—would be to bring in private sector capital and management, if that was appropriate and if it could be done.

That is the way in which I should like the Government to go about bringing in the private sector initiative, energy, ambition and imagination that all Conservative Members recognise are missing from the railway system at present —although, in defence of the present railway management, I must say that there has been much improvement in that regard. The hon. Member for North Devon has said that that was the Prime Minister's known preference. It was widely reported as such and nothing causes me to deny that the hon. Gentleman's belief and those reports were incorrect.

A moment ago, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you chided me for responding to a sedentary intervention from a Whip who was not technically in the Chamber. Any competent Chief Whip who can command a majority of 65 over the main Opposition party can drive legislation on to the statute book; that is not in doubt. But what will happen then? I think that I can claim to have invented the phrase, "the poll tax on wheels". I voted against the poll tax because it always smelt wrong to me. Someone—Lady Thatcher—said, "We've got to do something about those left-wing councils and reorganise local government finance." Many people told her that her plans were unworkable or unfair, but, in the end, it was a case of, "Eyes and ears closed, head down and charge!" We are getting precious near to that position with the Government's proposals for the railways.

At the moment, there is just a hint of unease among some of my hon. Friends—a small cloud, no larger than a man's hand. Shrewsbury, Cleethorpes and Blackpool have lost their direct services to London already——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Not yet.

Mr. Adley: It is only a matter of time, although I know that the hon. Gentleman has been fighting hard. There is one train left, I think.

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Adley: It will be Penzance, Middlesbrough and Swansea next—and large swathes of Cornwall, Scotland and Wales. Do people really imagine that through trains to Penzance will continue indefinitely, even if there are connecting services from Plymouth? Those through services, which are an essential feature of the rail system, will inevitably be placed at risk if the franchising proposals take effect.

At 4.49 pm, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made an important statement on the question of line closures. He said that railway services would continue subject only to "economic and commercial realities". Those were the words that he used. He did not mention social need. He never mentioned environmental or congestion factors. He added later to his remarks——

Mr. MacGregor: I referred to socially necessary services several times during my speech. My hon. Friend must not distort what I said. I made it clear that, as economic conditions change, and if there is no demand for a service, closure proposals may come forward and will be considered in the normal way. I want to make it absolutely clear that nothing in what we propose is different from what has happened in railway practice for a very long time. That is what I said.

I also referred to socially necessary subsidies which are proposed on a substantial scale and I have talked about environmental issues on other occasions—indeed, on the question of level playing fields, we had quite a discussion about that in the Select Committee last night. I am perfectly prepared to have endless discussions with my hon. Friend, but I hope he will not distort my comments on the position regarding closures.

Mr. Adley: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, but I noted that, at 4.49 pm, the phrase that he used was "economic and commercial realities". He added to it later. I think that the record will show that that is what I said in the first place.

When electricity was being privatised, we in the south-west were told that our fears about increased regional charges were totally unreal—that the Government would see to it that they did not materialise. But when an industry is nationalised—for better or for worse——

Mrs. Dunwoody: Privatised.

Mr. Adley: No, nationalised. When an industry is nationalised, the Government have some control and can give instructions to ensure that the things that they want done are done. Let us compare that state of affairs with that pertaining in the privatised electricity industry. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is like an inverted harlot—he has responsibility for the coal industry but no power. That is what happens, and the brave and kind words of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport may become wholly irrelevant if, in 10 years' time, the vast majority of the railway passenger services in Britain are no longer operated by the nationalised industry—[Interruption.]

Several Hon. Members: The Whip is going.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Clump, clump, clump.

Mr. Adley: Yes. I think that I have made my point.

Previous speakers have referred to the activities of the Select Committee. I should like to congratulate the Government on one thing: they have created some remarkable alliances. The Select Committee received a joint delegation from the railway unions and the CBI, because when we looked at the written evidence that they had supplied, we found that it was very similar.

Those who understand most the complexity of railway operations have the gravest doubts about the practicality —not the politics—of the Government's proposals. Surely we on this side of the House must all be concerned when Lords Ridley and Whitelaw are singing the same song down the Corridor. We must all remember that, when we talk about British Rail's passengers, we are actually talking about our constituents, and that, unlike the electricity and water industries, British Rail is neither a monopoly nor a profitable operation but part of the nation's transport infrastructure. It may be too late; I do not know. I can only plead once again with my right hon. Friend not to stop the discussions on alternative methods of introducing private sector capital and incentives. I am in favour of the introduction of such an incentive, provided we end up with a practical, workable proposition that produces a better railway.

Much play was made earlier this afternoon about the document on safety. I shall read the first sentence of the conclusion, and ask my hon. Friend a specific question. The report says:

> "New regulatory controls and new arrangements within the railway industry will be needed if safety standards are to be maintained through the period of implementation of the Government's policy on liberalisation and privatisation, and afterwards into the future."

Who will pay for that? Will it be paid for entirely by Railtrack or by the operators? If it is to be paid for by the operators, what thought has been given to the effect that it will have on the economics of their objectives? We do not yet even have a Railtrack charging regime.

This afternoon the Government announced the acceptance of the Health and Safety Commission's report. What will be the effect of that on those commercial organisations which might want to run trains? As I said earlier, I have no doubt that a few painted coaches can be introduced on to our railways by 1994. If, however, they are bought at the cost of a totally undermined network, that will be too high a price to pay.

I know that my right hon. Friend finds some of my criticisms irksome. When he finds them particularly irksome, he descends to ridicule. He is a member of the Magic Circle. I am sure that Tommy Cooper would have liked the Government's proposals. My concern is not with the Magic Circle or with laughs and jokes, or even with magicians. I simply want to ensure that at the end of the privatisation process the Conservative party, the Government and the nation do not end up in tears rather than with laughter. On that basis, I plead with my right hon. Friend to consider alternative means of achieving his proper and sensible objectives, which I support.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): First, I should like to declare an interest as a member of the Rail, Maritime and Transport Union. I worked in the railway industry until I left my desk at Preston to fight the 1974 general election campaign. I understand that my desk is still waiting for me if things go awry in the future. If the railway industry is privatised, I fear that my employment prospects will not be too good. As the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) said, if privatisation of the railway goes ahead, it will prove to be a political disaster and have severe electoral repercussions for the Conservative party at the next general election.

The hon. Member for Christchurch is enthusiastic and extremely knowledgeable about the railway industry. He should not worry too much about the ridicule that comes from some of his hon. Friends. Many of them seem to be more concerned about their prospects for advancement than about the future of the railway industry. The hon. Gentleman should not worry about the Whips Office. I say that having spent a few years in that particular office. Regardless of the size of the Whips, the hon. Gentleman should be aware that their bark is invariably much worse than their bite.

The Whips' job is to steamroller Government legislation through the House, no matter how stupid or contradictory it is to the legislation which they steamrollered through the House in the previous 12 months. Let the Whips get on with it. The hon. Gentleman should stick to his view—I know that he will stick to it —about the future of the railway industry. However, I disagree with the hon. Gentleman on a couple of matters, and I shall come to those in a moment.

I should like to refer to the vexed question of investment. Over the years, I have sat through or participated in—and sometimes both—every railway debate. I am heartily fed up with the whole argument about investment and the yahoo philosophy which we have heard from successive Conservative Ministers. They pick a particular year and say, "But we are"—they keep saying I—"investing more money in the railway industry than we have ever done before." Of course, that means that all those who use the railways, the taxpayers generally, make a regular investment in a particular year.

More often than not, especially in the past 14 years since this Government were elected, investment in the railway industry has failed to keep pace with the needs of the railway industry. I shall give a graphic illustration of that. Early in my railway career I worked in some signal boxes in the Stockport area in Greater Manchester. I worked on parts of the west coast main line to which one of my hon. Friends referred earlier. The signal boxes were constructed by the London and North Western Railway in 1888.

I still travel to and from Stockport from time to time. I have a habit of watching, with some degree of privacy, Stockport County, which is not something that one boasts about too often. The signal boxes are still there. The only difference between now and their construction is that, instead of operating semaphore signals which were lit by oil lights, the levers operate coloured light signals which have been cut off halfway down to stop the signalmen forgetting that and ending up through the back of the signal box window. That is the only difference that has resulted from all those years of modernisation and investment.

I will not use the phrase "level playing field", which the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) widely used, because it is one of the most overworked clichés in political life. The situation on the west coast main line is the equivalent of travelling north on the M6 motorway. One arrives in south Manchester to find that the motorway ends and the road network reverts to the turn of the century with a policeman on point duty every 50 yards. That is the effect of the chronic lack of investment in one extremely busy British Rail main line. The same effect is repeated in other parts of the country, especially on routes that are not so busy.

Let us have no nonsense about the railways being stuffed full of investment. Traditionally, investments have fallen behind, especially in the past 14 years. To illustrate that, I remind the House and the Conservative party that the past major countrywide investment in the railway industry resulted from the 1955 modernisation plan. It took about 15 years to implement that plan and was concluded in the early 1970s. The problem now is that much of that investment was made in life-expired equipment.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Snape: I shall give way when I have finished making my point.

Signalling projects which were installed in the 1960s come up for renewal about now. Locomotives which were purchased from different private sector operators—some of them were built by the former British Rail Engineering Ltd.—also come up for renewal now because they have run many millions of miles. However, that equipment is not being renewed; it is being patched up. The results of that patching up can be seen in the delays and dislocations to services that exist from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. Stephen: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that a few weeks ago I visited the signal box that controls traffic from Victoria and Waterloo stations in London? I saw an extremely modern signalling system which enables the signalmen to control a huge volume of traffic in and out of London stations every day. That signalling system is probably one of the best in the world.

Mr. Snape: The problem is that the hon. Gentleman has just walked in, so he has not been listening to the debate.

Mr. Stephen: I listened to both Front Bench speeches.

Mr. Snape: The London Bridge signal box to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and to which I have paid various visits over the years, is fairly modern. It is not a particularly modern design. It is part of what is known as the NX system, the entrance/exit system, by which the signalman operates the signals by switches on the panel. The system has been superseded in the past decade by a much more modern and sophisticated one. I readily concede that the London Bridge signal box, which was installed in the late 1970s, about 1978—I will not be dogmatic about the exact year—uses technology which has been superseded. That is not to say that there is anything wrong with it or that it is unreliable. However, the hon. Gentleman has picked on a comparatively modern powered signalling installation.

I am not simply concerned about the legacy of the London and North Western Railway to which I have referred. A little further south on the west coast main line there is a very modern installation at Crewe. However, within five miles of that installation is a signal box called Basford Hall junction which, again, was installed by the London and North Western Railway in the late 1880s. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) will be familiar with that signal box. The piecemeal, patchwork quilt modernisation is the direct result of a lack of investment in the railway industry, particularly over the past decade or so.

Will the Government's proposals find any friends among those who are interested in railway matters, use the railway industry and believe in public and private sector operations? The answer is that they will find no favour among those people. As the hon. Member for Christchurch reminded us, organisations as diverse as the Confederation of British Industry and the Railway Development Society, of which, like other hon. Members, I have the honour to be a vice-president, have already expressed their concerns and opposition to the Government's proposals.

Seventy user groups have banded together under the umbrella organisation Platform to express to the Government, even at this late stage, their fears and concerns about the future of the railway industry. The Select Committee on Transport, which has done the industry and the House a great service so far, has had to advertise in the well-known railway publication "Modern Railways" for those in favour of the Government's proposals to come and give evidence to the Committee. I understand that the Committee has not exactly been overwhelmed by the rush. Extra catering has not been laid on as a result of the appeal. As I understand it, no one has yet come forward to support the proposals that the Government say that they will set before the House in the next few weeks.

According to the press, certain individuals have given evidence to the Select Committee to the effect that they might like to participate in the newly privatised industry. I understand that Mr. Richard Branson is going to offer incentives to drivers to go faster to reach their destinations on time. That should terrify my old mates in the signal boxes to which I have just referred. However, it is an interesting concept.

Before Mr. Branson's aeroplanes leave New York, I wonder whether the pilots are given a memo from the chairman saying, "When you arrive over the United Kingdom, you are to ignore the aircraft of competitors that are stacked over Epsom and head straight for runway 28 north at Heathrow." To say the least, that would cause one or two raised eyebrows among the air traffic control staff. That is the level of debate conducted by the supporters of the nonsensical proposals before the Select Committee.

Mr. Branson goes further. He has said that he wants to lease trains from British Rail, although, of course, at his price and not an economic price. When one negotiates with a nationalised industry and it asks an economic price, it is holding one to ransom. If it does not ask such a price, it is giving the country's assets away. Such industries can never win so far as the Conservative party is concerned.

Initially, Mr. Branson proposed to take some 17 or 18-year-old high speed trains which have covered a considerable number of millions of miles in service. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said, Mr. Branson intended to give them a quick refurbishment and install new seats. He does that with his aeroplanes. They are also quite old, although he does not normally boast about that aspect of his operation. He will give those trains a respray and refit their interiors so that they look nice. He will then unleash his high speed trains on the east coast main line.

[Mr. Snape]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East reminded the House earlier, the nation has spent millions of pounds electrifying and updating the east coast main line so that it can be used by electric trains. I hope that my railway experience does not give me the right to sound remotely patronising, but the accelerative potential of diesel trains is not quite the same as that of electric trains. As a former signalman, I must tell the Minister that slipping a couple of albeit brightly painted diesel trains into the middle of a rather intensive electric service is not conducive to good punctuality or productivity.

Such a prospect is already being viewed with horror by those responsible for planning timetables and the diagramming of the east coast main line. However, Conservative Members will promptly denounce those people as unfit to participate in the debate because, as we have already heard, the main qualification for a job to administer the proposals is not to know anything about the railway industry in the first place.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My hon. Friend has forgotten the basic difference between Mr. Branson's proposals and those of British Rail. Mr. Branson has promised us young ladies with short skirts and television.

Mr. Snape: In the Labour party it is safe only for my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich to say such things. Such a thought would never cross my mind and such words would never fall from my lips. However, my hon. Friend's comments show the depths of the stupidity involved.

Mr. Branson is not alone. Mr. James Sherwood has given evidence to the Select Committee. Those of us with rail experience know a little about Mr. Sherwood. I seem to remember that he sailed off with Sealink some years ago to Bermuda to equip the ships with a quick flag of convenience before demonstrating his patriotism elsewhere.

Mr. Sherwood wants to run double-decker coaches on British Rail. That is not a new idea. The much-maligned Southern region of British Rail ran double-decker coaches in the 1950s. However, the problem is that we have a comparatively small loading gate in Britain. That is what comes of being the first in the world to run a railway system. It became a little cramped upstairs on those double-decker coaches. Indeed, someone with a head like Mr. Sherwood would have had difficulty getting downstairs.

There was another operating difficulty with double-decker coaches on the inner suburban services of the former Southern region. As they were rather cramped, it was not possible to install an adequate number of doors in the coaches. Therefore, loading and unloading was difficult. The advantages of cramming people into double-decker coaches were dissipated by the amount of time that those trains had to stand at station platforms. I do not suggest that such difficulties are insurmountable. However, I doubt whether they have even crossed the minds of the two captains of industry who have already given evidence to the Select Committee.

Much mention has been made of the freight business. The hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell), a former Transport Minister, gave us the benefit of his views about rail freight. He was not a bad Minister at the Department of Transport—at least, not in comparison to the low standards of the present Administration. However, he showed why he was not a particularly good Minister. He said that the remedy for the loss of freight from British Rail was to throw open the freight market to all and sundry and so allow private operators to run the trains.

The Government have been in power for 14 years, although it seems a lot longer. During that time they have appointed all the current members of the British Rail board, including the present chairman and his namesake and predecessor. The Government have laid down the policies and parameters under which the board and chairman have operated. The Government now claim that what is wrong with British Rail is that it is in the public sector.

It does not seem to matter that the Government appointed the people who have run BR. Presumably the Government's appointees would be twice as good if the responsibility for running a public operation was taken from them and they were thrust into the embrace and climate of the private sector. That is the myth that was perpetrated once more this afternoon.

Ministers and civil servants who believe that they can second-guess managers in the public sector caused the public sector to get things wrong in the first place. The ownership of Railfreight is not the problem. The problem is that in the midst of the longest recession that the country has ever seen, Railfreight still has a legal obligation under this Administration to make an 8 per cent. return on its assets. Therefore, it has had to shed much of its traffic. If one owns a small haulage company and runs a lorry from Southampton to Glasgow, one would cut someone's throat for a return load. Yet British Rail has to charge 8 per cent. on that return load—Railfreight is forbidden by law to make a loss—so of course the traffic has been filched from the railway. There has been no recognition by the Government of the economic problems that they have caused. It is a similar story to that of the passenger train. They now blame British Rail and its various sectors for losing money, yet the recession means that fewer and fewer people travel.

With regard to the railway industry as a whole, we have seen under this Administration change for the sake of change. It started off under Sir Bob Reid mark I with sectorisation. That has some advantages, but it also has some drawbacks. It identifies profit and loss-making services as a general concept, but it makes it easier for the Government of the day to subsidise those services which they regard as socially necessary, such as the bulk of the services, operated by Regional Railways.

The problem about identifying those costs, as we have seen in so many other industries, is that if responsibility for running the trains is divided between two organisations, those costs have to be identified and people have to be employed to pay the other organisations for the cost of operating those services and to calculate that cost. Under sectorisation, despite the lack of money for investment, the various sectors are employing accountants and others——

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Just like the health service.

Mr. Snape: Yes, like the health service. They are employing these people to make the calculations so that one sector can pay another sector. Peterborough is a case in point. I have forgotten the exact price, but one of the platforms at Peterborough is owned by Network SouthEast. Derby is a similar case, but I will use the example of Peterborough. If an InterCity train uses a Network SouthEast platform at Peterborough a sum of money not far off £50 is paid by one sector to another. Imagine that multiplied umpteen times during the day in umpteen different localities and imagine the number of people who have to be hired to make those calculations —at the expense, of course, of those operating the railway system.

We can no longer afford a comprehensive railway network in many parts of the country because railway employees have been redeployed or made redundant so that railways on a fixed or falling budget can employ people to do these sums.

That was very soon superseded. Having got that system in place, we came along with "organising for quality"—O for Q, as it is called. One has to be careful how one says that because if one says it quickly it gives the impression that one is giving the Government's view of the railway industry. Organising for quality means that the earlier system, a great deal of the nation's money having been spent on it, was virtually superseded. And we are now about to supersede the O for Q system by privatising—I beg the Minister of State's pardon; semi-privatising. That will be another upheaval.

Do not the Government and the Conservative party stop to think sometimes about the damage that constant, non-stop change does to an industry such as the railways? Do they not stop to think that, whether or not Mr. Branson offers them incentives, most drivers want to get to their destination on time? Although many of the younger Conservative Members were brought up at a time when their mums used to terrify them by warning them that they would be thrown into a trade union branch meeting if they did not behave themselves, let me assure them that most drivers really do want to get to their destination on time without any incentive from Mr. Branson or anyone else.

In the face of this chopping and changing with regard to the railway industry, is it any wonder that morale from top to bottom is at the lowest ebb that I have ever seen it in the 30-odd years since I started to work in the railway industry?

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I have been listening very attentively to what the hon. Gentleman has been saying. He has said nothing whatsoever about the present quality of service. He should ask my constituent commuters if he wants to find out what a wonderful railway British Rail is at present operating. The North Kent line offers misery to every person who travels into London each day on Kent link and Kent coast. I hope that he will say something about how he would like to see British Rail improve its present services to those commuters who suffer daily in my constituency.

Mr. Snape: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's intervention will look marvellous in the Kent Bugle, or whatever his local newspaper is. His party has been in power for 14 years. If the railway service in North Kent is lousy, is not that partly as a result of 14 years of mismanagement by the present Administration, of which he is a loyal member, I know, and a would-be Minister, no doubt? Does he never stop to think, as a supporter of a Government who have appointed every member of the British Railways Board and the last two chairmen, that his own Administration might bear some responsibility? Does he agree with me that the lack of investment to which I referred in the north-west and the west midlands could also apply to the North Kent line?

I do not know it particularly well, but I know that the North Kent line was modernised as part of the 1955 modernisation plan, to which I have already referred. Of course, many of the assets have time-expired. If one is operating signal boxes that are even 30 years old, let alone over 100 years old like the ones to which I have referred, one will get unreliability, failures, and problems which cause delays to trains. If one operates trains which are 25 or 30 years old, some of them built from bits and pieces of other trains that were 70 or 80 years old, one can expect them to go wrong from time to time.

If the hon. Gentleman were driving a 25-year-old motor car between his constituency and the House, he would not be surprised if he had to ring the Automobile Association from time to time to tow him up here. Yet he presumably expects the much-maligned, currently publicly owned British Rail to run an immaculate service on the North Kent line. I will hazard a guess that once the first real snows of winter arrive his constituents will be queuing up to use the North Kent line, because the roads on which millions of pounds of public money are spent under every Government each and every year will very soon become impassable. There will be a lot more complaints then and if the train is five minutes late the driver will be soundly cursed. The fact that the company car is in the garage because it cannot be used never crosses the minds of people who criticise British Rail and its staff.

Money has not been made and is not being made available in sufficient quantity to enable lines such as the one to which the hon. Gentleman referred to be properly modernised. If he thinks that Richard Branson or James Sherwood, or anyone else, will come along with a pocket full of gold in order to buy up those trains that run on the North Kent line and modernise the signalling, he is living in a dream world.

Mr. Stephen rose——

Mr. Snape: No, I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman. I have given way to him once, even though he has not been here most of the time. He has been on his train for long enough.

If the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) believes that someone other than the taxpayer will pay to modernise that line, he is living in cloud-cuckoo-land.

I turn now to local rail services, particularly in my own part of the world and the west midlands. Will the Minister of State tell us when he replies to the debate whether, if the passenger transport authorities are to be the franchising authorities, that will be their only role, or whether they will be allowed to bid for services in their own area and to operate those services directly on behalf of the people whom they represent?

I remind the Minister of State that passenger transport authorities, such as Centro, consist of elected local authority members from his party as well as from mine and from minority parties. Are they deemed to be suitable people to acquire these assets should they wish to do so? After all, something like 60,000 passengers per day are carried on Centro-supported services in the west midlands.

[Mr. Snape]

There are 770 of those services and the passenger transport authority has invested £100 million in them over the past 20 years. Does that investment, that confidence, in the local rail services in the west midlands not entitle them, as elected councillors, to some say in the west midlands railway industry of the future?

Let me conclude—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Conservative Members say "Hear, hear." I look forward to hearing some of those eager young Turks, anxious as ever to get to the Front Bench, making any sort of case, intellectual or otherwise, for the privatisation of British Rail. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East was criticised for proposing a one-line motion today, but it is quite a simple debate. Earlier the Secretary of State talked about value for money for the taxpayer. Neither I nor anyone else who knows anything about the railway industry believes that the taxpayer will be given value for his money as a result of proposals based entirely on the ideological prejudices of the Conservative party and not at all on the future needs of the British railway industry.

Mr. Matthew Banks (Southport): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). I hope that my contribution to the debate will not be too great a contrast to his particular style. He was right to draw attention to the motion on the Order Paper,

"That this House opposes the privatisation of the railways.

This is not a classic privatisation. Nor, in my view, is it even a semi-privatisation. It is a deliberate and gradual introduction of private sector competition into the railways. It has my wholehearted support, and I am certain that it has the overwhelming support of Members on the Government side of the House.

I should like to comment particularly on the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell). I agree entirely with his remarks about Railfreight, and I look forward to hearing the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister of State when he replies to the debate.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes)—who, sadly, is no longer in the Chamber—and the hon. Member for West Bromwhich, East referred to the west coast main line, a line which is vital to my constituents going both north and south. I recognise the enormous investment required in that line, not to mention others, to bring it up to the standard that I should like to see. I travel to my constituency in Southport not just by rail but also by road and air. Unfortunately, I have to report to the House that when I travel by rail to Preston I am consistently late, sometimes by up to an hour. I fully recognise that there are many reasons for that—one of them being, particularly in Cheshire, that many of the signal boxes and other parts of the infrastructure are Victorian and in need of replacement. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier, a great deal of work is already being undertaken. In the current year, out of a record investment of £2 billion, some £1 billion is being spent on this kind of investment.

I referred to the proposals contained in the White Paper as a deliberate and gradual introduction of private sector competition. It is particularly important to make that point. As I listen to the contributions of Opposition Members, I sometimes think that they are concerned more about the railway and some of the vested interests in it than about the interests of their constituents and of the travelling public. That, too, is a vital point to make in such an important debate.

Although it might have been possible for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to bring forward a Green Paper some time ago, the fact that he has brought forward a White Paper and a genuinely consultative franchising document emphasises to me the importance that he attaches to pressing ahead with the task in hand. I very much welcome his comments of a few days ago, when he said that the introduction of private sector competition would go full steam ahead. Recently, Opposition Front Bench spokesmen have referred publicly to their agreement with the White Paper's analysis of what is required for Britain's railways. Where we seem to part company is in that they disagree with the market-place structure proposed. In my view, a market-based structure is vitally important and the Government should press ahead with what they intend to do.

I am particularly concerned that there has recently been enormous misrepresentation in the media about the so-called concerns of Conservative Members. As I look around the Chamber today, and as I talk to my colleagues, with one or two sincere and honourable exceptions, I find widespread support for what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is undertaking. As a member of the Select Committee on Transport, I am particularly concerned that throughout the Committee's investigation a number of obstacles have consistently been put in our way. I regret that the Select Committee has not always taken the opportunity to come forward with constructive questions and criticisms in the way in which it might have done. We have heard much about British Rail putting obstacles in the way of those who wish to run private services on its tracks. When the Select Committee visited Crewe, we were presented with the most complicated of graphs, designed to show us how difficult it was to run extra services into Birmingham New Street at peak times. No doubt there are enormous obstacles, but obstacles have been encountered in every privatisation that the Government have initiated and succeeded in pushing through. There are obstacles in these proposals, and they have been overcome.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Banks: I intend to make a short contribution. The hon. Gentleman will have plenty of time in his winding up speech—far more time than I have.

The obstacles put forward at that particular time demonstrate that many of the managers in British Rail are trying to prevaricate and to prevent a proper investigation by the Select Committee; they are getting in the way of my right hon. Friend's pressing ahead with the principles of introducing private sector competition, as I very much hope that he will. I look forward to seeing a Bill introduced in the next few weeks. I also look forward to the announcement in the next few weeks of the first shadow franchises.

I spoke earlier of the limited introduction of competition, which indeed this is. Talk of privatisation is way off the mark. I mentioned the media and I would like specifically to comment on that aspect. Last week I was asked to do a radio interview. When I called the BBC back as requested, after leaving a meeting, I was told that I was not needed as they had enough comment. When I left the Select Committee yesterday, I rang the "Today" programme as requested but was told that they needed no comment from me as they had spoken to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). With the greatest respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, with whom I enjoy the best of relations, I do not believe that his views are representative of the views on the Government side of the House, and it is important that I make the point in this debate.

Mr. Adley: The hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) has just walked into the Chamber. Does he agree with my views on this? Does he share them?

Mr. Banks: With respect, I did not give way to the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), who has only just walked into the Chamber. I have no idea what his particular interest in transport may be. He has only just arrived and it is 10 minutes to seven. Had he wished to contribute to the debate, he would no doubt have been here earlier. Of course I wish to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, but I do not think that it is his place to suggest what he has suggested. The media have recently given completely the wrong impression of what the Government are trying to do. It is a sensible, pragmatic, step-by-step approach—an approach which I wholeheartedly support and which has enormous support on this side of the House.

We often hear far too much about the railways and people who work in them, but I hope that we shall see franchising operations in 1994-95 even though we may see only one or two of them. I made the point in the debate on the White Paper that it did not concern me if only one or two private companies were running services at that time. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already made it clear in this debate that we are looking at a period of 12 or even more years to make sure that over a period of time the opportunity exists for private sector operators to come in.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East and others mentioned that few people seemed to have come to the Select Committee and said anything positive. No mention was made of the positive remarks by Sea Containers, Central Railways and the Virgin Group.

I mentioned obstruction by British Rail.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Banks: The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) is fairly new to the Front Bench and he ought to listen. If he listens, he might learn what I am going to say. I am not giving way.

Central Railways has been trying to run services from Coventry to the channel tunnel for some time, but every step of the way people from British Rail have been putting obstacles in its path. That is a classic example of people with vested interests trying to scupper the proposals. I have news for them: it will not work. There is widespread support for what the Government are attempting to undertake and it does not matter if it takes a number of years to see the proposals come to fruition. The fact is that they will, and ultimately they will benefit the consumer —the travelling public.

The hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey), for whom I have great respect, mentioned a number of very sensible proposals. The difficulty with Liberal Democrat proposals is that, while their Front Bench spokesmen here may say one thing, the Liberal Democrat conference voted down what the hon. Member was suggesting. Representing Southport and knowing the Liberal Democrats as I do, that situation is not new to me.

There are a number of obstacles which need to be overcome. I have mentioned rail freight charges and I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, when he comes to reply, will comment on the future of the Railtrack authority. My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat), who is momentarily not in the Chamber, spoke eloquently in the debate on the White Paper and made it clear that in his view any rail track authority should be completely independent. I do not believe that the proposals being put forward by the Secretary of State will work as well as they might unless and until an independent rail track authority is proposed.

Bearing in mind the enormous spending constraints that British Rail is at present under, I believe that these limited proposals are a step in the right direction. To draw a comparison with the benefits of private competition in the water industry, until that industry was privatised our beaches in Southport failed to meet EC bathing standards. Since North West Water went into the private sector, outside the constraints of Government spending, it has been able to find the £85 million needed to invest in a new pumping station and now the Southport and Formby beaches meet EC standards.

This is the right way forward. The proposals have enormous support on the Conservative Benches and I have no hesitation in supporting them.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): I think that I am the first speaker for some time to follow an hon. Member like the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks), who has shown support for the Government's proposals. I am sorry that the "Today" programme did not give him the opportunity to demonstrate his support and I hope that they will arrange a debate between the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and the hon. Member for Southport on this matter and on the findings of the Select Committee.

What characterised the speech of the hon. Member for Christchurch was the fact that he showed an enormous knowledge of the railway system, which we know he has, and he also showed care for the system. We know that the whole railway world respects his knowledge on the subject. In dealing with these proposals, I have not come across anyone who cares about the system and also supports the proposals. Nor have I come across anyone who is particularly knowledgeable about the railway proposals and supports the privatisation proposals as they stand. They must be examined seriously, and I hope that the message to think again on them will be taken today.

I want to raise the question of investment in a specific way. If I am going into my constituency from the centre of Leeds, one of the major routes that I might follow is that which would take me past the old Hunslet Engine Company, a distinguished company, some of whose products, dating back a very long time, are still to be found in operation on railways in the developing world. Some are to be found in museums in a variety of places. I am glad to say that the company is again producing material for railway transport. It is producing rolling stock, and would wish to continue producing rolling stock. When I was the leader of West Yorkshire council, I was responsible for some £250,000 of investment to ensure that the road system around the company was adequate to its needs and those of other users. When I was a member of the Leeds development corporation, I was involved in securing city grants for that company when it was putting in new lines for the construction of rolling stock.

I have recently received a letter from the chairman of the holding company, Telfos Holdings, which owns the engine company. It is worth referring to the letter. He writes:

"May I raise with you briefly the threat to the continuing employment of the majority of the employees at our Jack Lane, Hunslet facility, better known to you as the Hunslet Engine Company, due to the inability of the West Yorkshire PTA to clearly establish with Government their, (i.e., Government) policy with regard to enforcing future franchises under rail privatisation, to take over rolling stock purchased, or in particular, leased over a long period by PTAs or British Rail.

West Yorkshire wish to obtain from Hunslet some 39 additional passenger cars (Model 323) to those currently being built by Hunslet for various PTAs, including West Yorkshire. They wish to lease these cars and the finance is available subject to the clarification of continuity of use of leased rolling stock by any future franchisees on the relevant routes to ensure revenue to pay the lease costs which otherwise would fall on the local tax payer/authority.

This particular order, plus some in the pipe-line (subject to franchisee obligations as above) would fill a void in Hunslet's order book; without these orders the future is bleak with the very survival of the plant in question."

In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) yesterday, the Secretary of State referred to the £150 million which is being made available to British Rail for leasing purposes. It has been referred to several times in the debate. It is far from clear to the company whether that leasing arrangement will apply to PTA rolling stock. A reply from the Minister about that would be appreciated.

But even if those orders are saved, there is still great uncertainty about the future of investment in the rail network. As has been said, industry leaders are particularly concerned about the shortfall of investment for the future. A company named Steer, Davies and Gleave, having made a study of likely rail investment in the future, has produced a graph depicting a dropping off of investment, so that by the end of 1993 there will be no investment in track work, that by the end of 1994 there will be no investment in signalling and telecom work and that after 1995 there will most likely be no investment in railway engineering companies.

The House will appreciate that, representing a Yorkshire constituency, I have great interest in the subject. There are in the region four companies with important roles to play in railway engineering. I have referred to Telfos Holdings. We have ABB in York, RFS in Doncaster and Procor in Wakefield. All depend for their future on investment in the railways. Only by such investment will their employees have any security. The future looks bleak for them.

British Rail estimated that it needed £13 billion investment by the year 2000. It is clear, following the autumn statement, that that will not be forthcoming. Indeed, not only is there great uncertainty about the investment that will be available to British Rail, but the privatisation proposals do not give the railway engineering industry confidence for the future. Unless greater certainty can be engendered in the industry, more jobs will be lost in the companies to which I have referred and in others throughout the country.

That, in turn, will result in the skill of the work force being diminished. Let us face the fact that should the Government's current proposals turn out to be successful, the franchisees in need of rolling stock will have to look overseas, for our skilled force will have been lost. I hope that the Government will heed our warnings and appreciate how low are the order books in the industry now, let alone what the position will be in the future.

The industry must be given confidence by the Government that it will be able to operate under the privatisation proposals and that it is worth its while preparing to become franchisees. We are not convinced, from the evidence presented to the Select Committee, that companies capable of operating the system will want to become franchisees. Unless the Government can engender confidence and certainty, a worrying prospect lies ahead for the railway engineering industry.

There are other serious consequences from the proposals. It will be difficult for Britain to compete in the single European market if our railways are not up to European standards. Huge investment has gone into the European rail network, while United Kingdom investment in our railways has been minimal. In the United Kingdom 12 per cent. of costs are met by the public purse, compared with about 60 per cent. of costs in other European countries such as France. That has resulted in the quality and extent of our railway network being much lower than theirs.

So it is difficult to see how British companies relying on rail to serve the European market will be able to compete. Pressure on the roads will continue, and it is not surprising that firms which today intend to play a full part in the single European market are considering means of transport other than rail.

Mr. Stephen: The hon. Gentleman may agree that the present state of our railways, despite huge public investment, is due more than anything else to the fact that all nationalised industries under any Government are bound to suffer from political interference. They are always having to look over their shoulder at the man from the Ministry, who sometimes says no but who more often than not will not say anything, making it impossible for management to manage effectively. So the hon. Gentleman should welcome the Government's proposals to bring an element of private competition and enterprise into the railway system.

Mr. Gunnell: It should be clear from what my hon. Friends and I have said that we are not opposed to the use of private capital in the development of the railway system. The constraints that Government have placed on British Rail in the past have made it difficult for BR to operate. Many of the complaints that have been voiced about BR have arisen because of those constraints. The need to provide an 8 per cent. return—maintained and extended to Railtrack—does not exist elsewhere in Europe.

That is another reason why our channel tunnel proposals fall far short of what is needed. I may be accused of being parochial, but the level of service on the east coast main line, despite its being the most modern line capable of taking high speed trains, does not include a passenger service to west Yorkshire. There is nothing planned for such a service. We anticipate there being only a skeleton service on the east coast main line.

Until we can be assured of through trains on the east and west coast main lines to the channel tunnel, we shall be handicapping companies wishing to use rail. How can they have equality in the single market without equality of rail services? Our prospects in Europe are being handicapped by the lack of rail investment, and I fear that the Government's latest set of proposals will not help, and may even hinder, the process, making it even more difficult for our companies to compete in Europe.

In any event, will the private sector want to invest to bring channel tunnel trains direct to the north? Many have forecast that, once the channel tunnel is open and in use, sufficient traffic will be generated from London and the south-east to fill the tunnel's capacity. Should that happen, what incentive would the private sector have to make sure that firms in the north had direct access to the tunnel? A second tunnel might be needed. The present set-up has not provided, and the proposals that are before us will not result in the provision of, the investment that is needed to ensure for the regions, particularly the northern region, equal access to the European market.

Why is there so much opposition to the privatisation proposals? Why are former Conservative Members such as Lord Ridley and Lord Young so sceptical about them? Lord Ridley is clearly a case in point. No doubt he had the job of examining the proposals. The hon. Member for Southport does not share my view that many distinguished Conservatives are concerned about these proposals. When I was a member of the Audit Commission I sat alongside Sir Robert Wall, a distinguished Conservative in Bristol, where he is a leading member of the party. Like the hon. Member for Christchurch, Sir Robert believed passionately in the railway system. Indeed, he credited his earlier discussions with people having helped to prevent railway privatisation from becoming a serious proposal when the Thatcher Government were in power. Conservative Members should listen to those who care about the railway system.

We should also take note of this comment of the Confederation of British Industry:

"The overriding concern of CBI members is not primarily one of ownership but of how the quality and level of railway services can be improved . . . Far from encouraging private sector interests, there is a real danger that privatisation will be a blueprint for bureaucracy. We urge the Government to think hard before moving ahead with the legislation."

It seems to me that that is characteristic of the views of those who wish to use the railway system. It is certainly characteristic of the views of rail users who have expressed their opinions on the proposals.

These are complex proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) drew attention to the number of bureaucratic bodies that will be established under the privatisation legislation. It seems to me that market forces are being created artificially through the interaction of bodies that the Government are setting up under their privatisation proposals.

What we have here is a gamble. No one can say that what is proposed will work. Obviously the Government hope that it will work. We on the other hand hope that they will listen. Many of us believe that this is a gamble the nation cannot afford. People's concern about the cost of the railway system is understandable.

I should like to close with a comment about the situation in west Yorkshire, where I was as leader of the council very concerned about the question of value for money. We looked very carefully at the cost of the subsidies that we were providing for railway services between Leeds and Ilkley. We recognised that by replacing the rail service with a bus service we could have saved a very great deal. Indeed, that applied to every rail service in west Yorkshire. Taking into account the number of passengers carried, the rail subsidy was enormously higher than a bus subsidy would have been, but we knew that other factors made it extremely important that the railway service be retained. Our policy was to develop the rail network—to open new stations, to invest in the railways —so that more passengers would be provided with a service. The railway subsidy was still greater than that which would be required for a bus service, but it resulted in the maintenance of a network for the future. As a result, the number of commuters using already-congested roads was kept down. Indeed, the roads have become even more congested since then.

We must recognise that the gamble with the railway system that these proposals represent may well lead to fewer services. Indeed, that has already been acknowledged. More congestion on the roads will lead to more road accidents, including deaths, and to more destruction of the countryside. Is this a gamble that we should take? I urge the Government to think again.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Following the Labour party's electoral experience of last April, when it realised what the public was not prepared to risk, I would expect Labour Members to know about gambles that people should not take.

One of the interesting aspects of this debate is the not-too-subtle criticism of anybody who might support the Government's policy. The suggestion is that nobody who knows anything about the railways could possibly be in favour of what the Government are putting forward. That indicates a degree of intellectual arrogance. Those who criticise Government policy are always more vocal than those who agree with it. The latter expect the Government to stand up and make their own case.

One problem that has been highlighted this afternoon is the lack of forward orders for wagons and so on. Indeed, that problem confronts the bus industry, too. We are in a recession. People are not looking forward and investing enough. That is not just because of the Government's proposals, and the argument that it is is false.

I have been a Member of the House for a long time and I think that some people forget the background against which this debate and, indeed, the situation of British Rail must be considered. Over the years I have sat on Committees under Governments of both colours and have seen millions and millions of pounds of taxpayers' money spent in writing off debts incurred by British Rail. Hon. Members know that British Rail has a difficult financial past, and that it has had to struggle with debts that it could not repay. The British Railways Board brought forward plan after plan, but not one of them was ever taken to a successful conclusion. Despite the enormous improvement that we have seen in British Rail's management in recent years, the enormous subsidy has risen again, the public service obligation grant having reached £1 billion.

It is pointless for the Labour party, or anybody else who opposes the Government's proposals, not to accept that something has to be done. Any Government would have a responsibility to determine whether there was a better system of ownership or management.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), who is no longer in the Chamber, made a point about not allowing British Rail to try to secure any of the franchises. He drew an analogy by saying that it was like preventing doctors from being able to bid for work in the health service. That is quite wrong because individual managements and groups of managements will be able to tender. I remind my hon. Friend that trusts in the health service and health authority tenders provide health care more efficiently. The argument that somehow British Rail management is being disfranchised and rendered unable to get a franchise is totally wrong and is an inaccurate reading of the Government's proposals.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was particularly scathing about private sector attempts to run road-rail freight. The hon. Gentleman has a short memory. British Rail never ran a successful road-rail freight operation in my political lifetime. In 1968 the Secretary of State for Transport did away with the lorries owned by British Rail because BR was so inefficient and incompetent. Since then BR has never had an effective road-rail operation. The only way forward is by continual experiment and we hope that the private sector will find a solution.

One cannot deny that there is some concern over what is loosely called rail privatisation. The debate and the Government's publications make it clear that it is not privatisation in the classic sense: it is what I would call creeping privatisation. However, there would be no argument about the matter if British Rail was profitable. People worry that unprofitable services will go, but if they do not taxpayers will have to continue to foot the bill.

Spending public money is not always a guarantee of a good rail system. A few years ago when I was on a Select Committee we visited Canada and discovered that each time a person boarded a train there the taxpayer paid $70. The Canadian Government drew the inevitable conclusion that they had to reorganise the system and reduce subsidies. Much has been said about the German railways. The speeds of German trains cannot match those of British Rail. German rail finances are disastrous and the subsidies are enormous. One of the ways in which the German system survives is to have a veto over the use of coach competition. Thank goodness there is no such veto here.

Some people ask whether privatisation will make more lines profitable. The obvious answer is that an improved management will be able to tackle overmanning and will have the freedom to raise capital and to borrow on the open market. As in other privatised industries, such measures will undoubtedly help.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In almost every other privatisation more investment has been anticipated and experienced. The one phrase that is missing from the first paragraph of the White Paper is "greater investment". Was that deliberate?

Mr. Fry: Perhaps it was cautious, which is a change for the Government. I do not necessarily assume that there will not be investment, but it is important gradually to create an environment in which there can be. At the moment there is not a great queue of people who want to invest in British Rail as it is, but the aim of the Government's policy is to introduce a regime which could well attract investment.

The railways, in common with other forms of public transport, contain an element of social service and there is a real worry that that may be reduced. Many people who speak about a social service mean that those who pay for it will not be the people who use it. That has bedevilled public services in this country. It is difficult to quantify and to allow for social service in public transport, especially in British Rail. I shall give an example. Some commuters in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport and in mine use InterCity, which does not receive any subsidy or public service obligation payment because the trains run on InterCity track. However, many people who live in London and the south-east and who work alongside our constituents have their fares subsidised by the PSO payment.

Some years ago a Select Committee looked at that matter and suggested that an alternative system of paying PSO might be required. As that does not seem possible under the present system, I would welcome any change that would benefit my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Minister. Such a change might make it possible for commuters who do not use their cars to receive the same subsidy regardless of what part of the country they come from.

The core of the Government's policy is franchising. I gave a somewhat wry smile when I heard about that because during the passage of the Bill that led to the Transport Act 1985 I moved an amendment which suggested that franchising was one of the ways forward in privatising the bus industry. However, the Government and the Opposition violently opposed the idea. Not much later franchising came into being in London. It has operated excellently and has introduced competition to the only industry that the Government have nationalised—London Transport. I am satisfied to note that the Government have gone some way towards sharing my opinion of eight or nine years ago.

We need franchising because there will be no way forward unless we can offer security of tenure on some routes for some years at least. As the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) said, if that is not done there will be no investment. Investment can be encouraged only if the operator feels that he has a future and the possibility of a profit, or at least sufficient income to make his investment worth while.

The crucial decision will be how long the franchise is to operate and whether the bid is to be positive or negative—that is, whether any PSO will still be needed. Surely it is right that any PSO payment should relate to individual routes and services and should not be the generalised payment that it is at the moment. Under an individual route system one could see exactly where support is needed and how much it should be. That would allow local authorities and passenger transport authorities to determine the needs of their own areas and decide whether to contribute.

Local authorities should have a role in running public transport. Why should I and other British taxpayers be expected to pay fairly large subsidies to services that are used by comparatively few, perhaps in a remote part of the country? Such subsidies should be localised and we should attempt to bring local authorities into play and see what contribution they can make. A franchising system that concentrates on specific services and routes will make the subsidy more transparent and it will be much easier to maintain a service if those who are involved locally can see the true situation. Section 20 grants could be extended to cover services passing through several local authorities or PTAs and some services could well be improved by the new financing regime.

Essential to the success of those plans is the establishment of a true and fair assessment of the cost of using the permanent way. In that respect, I welcome again the Government's change of mind in relation to splitting British Rail into two parts—the maintenance of the infrastructure, track and signalling, and the operational side.

In the 1970s, when there was a Labour Government, the transport policy group advocated the split-up of the operation of rail services from the maintenance of the track. Here again, perhaps belatedly, the Government have come round to the view that some of us have expressed for many years. Perhaps even more surprising, the Department of Transport has come round to that view. On several occasions some of us tested that idea on officials from the Department of Transport, who said that it was completely impractical. Therefore, I congratulate the Government on their belated conversion in another area.

I have mentioned two areas where the Department of Transport has accepted points of view and policies that some of us have been putting forward for many years. May I suggest one more? I have already said that the local authorities and the PTAs can play a good role in the new system that will be established. There is one exceedingly important area of the country where it is difficult to put that idea into practice, and that is the south-east.

My hon. Friend should look at the first report ever published by the Select Committee on Transport on London's future transport policy. There is a need for an overall transport authority for the Greater London area and the counties that adjoin it. The kind of planning that is needed to provide the right co-ordination will be even more necessary under the new rail regime that the Government are putting forward. Having been converted on two points, I hope that conversion on the third is possible before too long.

I do not underestimate the problems that the Government will have in putting their ideas and policies into effect. One of the most important things is that they must get them right. It is no good the early franchises proving to be a failure because that will discredit the policy and undermine confidence in the future. The Government must go fairly slowly in order to ensure that the franchises will be a success. Therefore, I was pleased to hear what the Secretary of State had to say this afternoon about going slowly. That is the most sensible approach and should be generally welcomed.

Because there are many problems, I am not surprised that it will take up to 12 years for the Government to achieve the full potential of the policies before us. But those who criticise the Government must ask themselves whether they are satisfied with the present situation. The present level of British Rail services is not universally bad. In many areas it is good. But British Rail's history has been dogged by financial problems such as those that I listed earlier. They have been compounded by British Rail's position within the public sector.

The House should give understanding and sympathetic support to the Government's attempt to evolve a new system to enable our rail services to get away from the constant crises of increasing fares, having to take off trains and having problems with their borrowing requirement. Therefore, instead of being negative, we should give the Government support and accept that they will not rush ahead wildly in the hope that eventually we will solve the complex problems that British Rail has given to successive Governments ever since its nationalisation.

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): This has been an interesting debate and, apart from the first hour and a half of speeches from the Front Benches, quite a gentle one.

The privatisation or part-privatisation of the rail network is based on the false premise that privatisation, competition or free market forces must be better, but there is no proof of that.

Looking at the history of the railway system from the day the railways were constructed, it is apparent that they have always been subsidised in one form or another. In the early days they were subsidised because many of the people who bought shares in them ended up bankrupt and the concern which had been built or partly built was gobbled up by a larger company at a cut price and operated on that basis.

In 1921, more than 120 private companies had to be amalgamated into four companies because they were not providing the kind of service the Government thought that the country should have. The problem was all too obvious. In those days there was too much competition. It was not uncommon for two, three or four railways to serve the same district. When the railways were finally nationalised in 1948, there were many rationalisations and closures as a result of that excess in services.

Ever since the time of Sir Brian Robertson and the modernisation carried out in 1955, no matter what Government have held office, the House has never valued Britain's railways in the way it should have done. They were the cradle of the industrial revolution, providing tremendous wealth. In the 1930s they came into competition with roads in a fairly primitive form. As time went on, things became difficult. By the 1950s, there was great concern at the amount of money that was being lost and the word "subsidy" began to be bandied about as though it were a dirty word.

It is as well that the public should be aware what subsidy means in the context of the railways. It means the amount of money needed to provide a service that the Government think is required by the nation. It should not be a dirty word or something of which we should be ashamed. If we are getting the sort of service that is required, the cost—provided that it is within reason—should be accepted. If, instead of some of the doctrinaire statements that we have heard over the years about nationalisation being a bad thing, people had been prepared to accept that the service had to be paid for—all services have to be paid for in one form or another—we might not have had the hostility from the public against nationalised industries that we have had on many occasions.

Whether the railways are nationalised or privatised, the problems will be the same. Part-privatised, nationalised, or totally privatised, the service will still have to be paid for. I accept what has been said by one or two hon. Members in different forms in the debate. It does not matter whether the railways are nationalised or privatised—what matters is the quality of management, the amount of investment in the industry, and the industrial relations and employment practices within the industry. I hope that both sides of the House will accept that, all things being equal, a nationalised industry with good management and good relations is better than a private industry with bad management—and vice versa.

It is interesting that all the pundits of the great advantages of privatisation never refer to the fact that when most of the great public utilities were nationalised in the years after the war the same management was often kept on. That happened in the coal and electricity industries. That was the case almost everywhere. Those people did not suddenly become good or bad depending on whether their industry was privately or publicly owned. They were what they were and they did not change. I certainly do not accept that the partial denationalisation of the railway system will improve it.

Following the putting out to tender of local government services, the public have complained on a massive scale about the deterioration of standards of cleanliness in schools and hospitals, and about refuse collection. Aiming for the so-called goal of privatisation has not improved the service to the public. It was supposed to solve all the problems, but it has solved nothing. The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) had the effrontery to cite the success of the denationalisation that has taken place so far. I have observed no improvement in British Telecom, the water service or the electricity service and neither has anyone else—nor have those services become any cheaper.

Mr. Matthew Banks rose——

Mr. Etherington: I refuse to give way—not out of churlishness or for any personal reason, but because I intend to speak for no longer than 10 minutes or so. Many hon. Members have taken 20 or 25 minutes, largely due to interruptions.

There is no proof that privatisation works any better than nationalisation; in fact, the opposite seems to be the case. After 30 or 40 years of nationalisation, it is difficult to argue with the claim that privatisation might be an improvement. I am too young to remember what the great utilities were like when they were privately owned, although I have heard a good deal about it. It has even been claimed that private health insurance worked satisfactorily before the establishment of the national health service, though not many people have accepted that in my hearing.

The Government are proposing to return to a concept which failed. Between 1921 and 1948, only one of the four big railway companies ever made a return to its shareholders. When the Government had to take over the railway system during the war, they put a good deal of money into it, but they used the people who had been managing it before. By degrees, we are returning to that arrangement.

I am no expert on the railways. I cannot hold a candle to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), for instance. I have read much of his work over the years, and it is obvious that an understanding of railways is in his soul. My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) has worked on the railways and knows a lot about them. Nevertheless, I know that over the years many people have not valued the railways properly, and I believe that hon. Members do not value them properly. That feeds into the public perception. I also know that if the south-eastern service, which serves London so well, had to run on the basis that it would be closed if it did not pay, the country would grind to a halt. Far too much has been spent on the road network. It is clear that we shall not get the full benefit of the channel tunnel, which will mean unloading goods from trains on to wagons in the south-east and then sending them to places such as Inverness. What we need is an integrated transport system, rather than experimenting in the way proposed by the Government.

I issue a challenge to the Government: if franchising —which really means sub-contracting—is such a good idea, why has it never been considered before? I know the answer. When it was the responsibility of the railways to carry traffic in privately owned wagons, it was a disaster. The principle is exactly the same in this case. Hon. Members have mentioned safety. In industries which sub-contract—for instance, the building and coal industries—the accident rate is always higher. That is not a matter of opinion—it is a matter of fact, based on statistics, and there can be no argument about it. Naturally, the public have a great fear of accidents. The record of the railways before they were nationalised in 1948 left a good deal to be desired; it has improved greatly since then.

If you believe in equity and in real competition, as you claim, why do you not give the nationalised railways the same right as the private investor to put in for the franchise?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he is addressing me.

Mr. Etherington: I am sorry, Madam Deputy Speaker. It was force of habit: I am more used to addressing open meetings.

If the Government really believe in equity and free competition, why do they not give British Rail the same opportunity as the private entrepreneur to put in for the franchise, and then let the public decide who offers the best service?

7.45 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): The challenge issued by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) tempts me to launch a wide-ranging defence of privatisation, but I shall content myself with saying that I do not agree with him about its effect on organisations such as British Telecom. I think that it has brought about a remarkable improvement. Before privatisation, I would have had to wait until the year 2010 for my local exchange to be modernised; this week, I was informed that the work would be done during 1993. That shows the benefits of the increased investment that has followed privatisation.

Let me remind the House of the interest that I declared in the Register of Members' Interests, although I do not intend to talk about freight.

I am disappointed that the Opposition managed only a one-line motion rejecting BR's privatisation; there is some scope for argument about whether the Government's proposals merit that description. I should have thought that the Opposition would take the opportunity to add a few more lines about how they would approach the matter. We are left with the impression that all is for the best—or almost for the best—in this best of all possible worlds, except what £10 billion or £20 billion would improve. The Opposition have advanced no constructive suggestions in the debate; they have simply attempted to knock the Government's proposals.

It appears that most Opposition Members—and, possibly, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley)—do not understand the current state of those proposals. The style of the opening remarks of the hon. Member for Sunderland, North suggested that he does not understand them; he did not even take on board what my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) had said only a few minutes earlier, although that came much nearer to describing them.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport must recognise, as the rest of us do, that there is no gratitude in politics. A cut-and-dried plan for the sale of the railways would have represented a clear policy, but anyone advancing such a plan would have been accused of being dogmatic, peremptory and over-eager. Because the Government have been prepared to pace it rather more slowly, to consult, listen to ideas and adjust their proposals accordingly, they are being criticised for an apparent lack of clarity and purpose. Their approach has been well considered and they have listened to the arguments.

I am becoming impatient about the amount of misinformation on the subject. The Opposition have selected the wrong target. We have heard talk of breaking up the network, but, as the White Paper made clear, the Government do not propose to break up the system. The knockabout performance of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) showed that the Opposition are attacking targets that are no longer there and that the policies of the Government have matured.

The debate is all about the method that will be used to try to improve our rail system. The Government have decided that it is better to separate the maintenance of track and signalling from the operations of the railway. Responsibility for track and signalling will be vested in Railtrack. I am in two minds about Railtrack. Much concern has been expressed by people in the industry about whether a railway can be operated effectively without control over track and signalling. However, it seems possible to meet that concern.

If people are interested in running the rail system on a franchise basis, it rather gives the lie to the suggestion that there is apparently no interest. I sense that quite a number of people are interested, many of whom are employed by British Rail and want to take advantage of the opportunity of a management buy-out. If track and signalling is vested in Railtrack, there is no reason why care and maintenance cannot be delegated to a franchisee, just as a highways authority delegates care and maintenance to district councils. Under such an arrangement, it would be possible for franchisees to have the vertical franchise for which many of them have argued. It is possible to maintain this separation—I can see the reasons for the separation—and meet some of the concerns that might hold back the enthusiasm of people who would like to become franchisees.

We must ensure that Railtrack has the necessary investment. Hon. Members have expressed concern about the need to ensure that our railway improves. The Government have plainly stated in the White Paper their commitment to ensuring that improvement. My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), in an intervention in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough, said that it did not appear in the first line of the document. That is so. But in paragraph 43 the Government state that they want to see more investment and that capital grants will be made to Railtrack. The more the Government can underline that point, the more reassuring it will be to people who are concerned for the future of our railway system.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The hon. Gentleman is advocating that the Government should make grants to ensure that track is maintained in good condition, but why do not the Government do that now? We desperately need such money on the west coast main line. If the Government did so, they could then sell other parts of the network more easily.

Mr. Haselhurst: The Government do not propose to sell the railway. They are talking about keeping Railtrack in the public sector for the foreseeable future and about franchising operations, neither of which amounts to selling the railway. Under the system that the Government envisage, there will be liberalisation of the terms on which money can be obtained for investment in the rail system. I welcome and pin some hope on that. We all want more money to be allocated to improving our rail system.

There is scope for questioning whether there should be few or many franchising arrangements under the new system. The number of franchises that one might ideally seek will depend to some extent on what view is finally taken about the relationship between the franchise operators and Railtrack. As the Government are emphasising—this should be welcomed in many quarters—that they will proceed cautiously and carefully over a period of years and that there may be only six, seven or eight pilot franchises, perhaps we should stick to the number of business centres that emerged from the Organising for Quality campaign. It might reinforce the confidence of many British Rail employees who are considering becoming franchise operators if they can stay within the pattern that has become familiar to them as a result of the reorganisation that has taken place in British Rail.

That would ease the transition from the public sector to the new private regime and would not preclude the possibility of certain business areas being merged if that seemed the better way forward. For example, it would be possible to franchise the west Anglia and great northern division separately from the great eastern division, but equally one could take the view that all services out of Liverpool Street station should be a single franchise. I do not think that that needs to be determined at this stage. I would prefer to stick with the existing business centres as the basis for the franchise.

A quality threshold should be built into the franchise contract when it is devised so that we can try to ensure a commitment to the leasing or purchase of new rolling stock. Passengers will be reassured if they can see that there is a clear and more likely route to obtaining better quality rolling stock.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consider the concept of a rolling franchise. Franchisees will have the confidence to lease new equipment if they know that, by showing that they are performing satisfactorily, their term will be extended. That may overcome the difficulty of an operator being unwilling to invest in new track because the franchise term is too short.

If the structure of the new system outlined in the White Paper can be simplified, it will encourage more people to believe that they can play their part in the new system. If, for example, there is scope for merging the franchise authority and the regulator, it would not be such a bad thing. Anything that makes matters simpler will lead to greater confidence in the system.

We are faced with a choice. Those of us who have taken an interest in the railways over the years believe either that things can be improved by staying with the present system or that they can be improved by finding another system. Of course, there are difficulties in changing what has become familiar, but one can exaggerate those difficulties to the point of arguing that there is no way to improve the system and that everything is as good as it could be. However, if one pinches oneself, one realises that that is wrong; something must be done.

The Government are right. In the foreword to the White Paper, my right hon. Friend said that the purpose was "to improve the quality of railway services by creating many new opportunities for private sector involvement."

That is not a dogmatic but a constructive and sensible approach which should be welcomed. If we face a choice between doing something and doing nothing, I infinitely favour doing something along the lines of my right hon. Friend's proposals.

8.1 pm

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) said that the water quality on the beaches in his constituency had improved, but I do not know whether he realises that the cost involved has been passed to the consumer. In the Welsh context, I know of the vast increases in water rates. The excuse is that environmental work is being carried out, but the truth is that underinvestment over many years must now be redressed.

The Government's aim, as stated in the White Paper, is apparently to reduce bureaucracy, to improve efficiency and to lower unit costs. My respectful view is that privatisation is definitely not the answer whether it be creeping, running, rolling or any other form of privatisation. Surely the answer must be immediate investment by the proper authorities.

The White Paper was delayed and did not appear before the election. It is understood that the Cabinet was deeply divided over the issue and I trust that the divisions will in turn create an atmosphere in which coherent and constructive debate can take place because that is extremely important in this context. The hon. Member for Southport and others have today strongly protested their loyalty over this matter, which leads one to think that there is and will be a definite division between both parties.

It is supposed that the intended franchising authority will monitor the performance of franchisees, will be charged with collecting premiums from franchisees on popular franchises and will have a duty to subsidise others which are not so well off. That will be within the budgetary restraints set by the Secretary of State. The Government state that they are committed to the establishment of a general right of access to the railway network for companies which wish to provide new railway services and which can meet the necessary operational and safety standards. That means that independent train operators may also run services in addition to, and sometimes in competition with, franchised services.

The Government's proposals are extremely complex and involve various bodies frequently in competition with one another. To make the proposed system work, it will be necessary for the Secretary of State, the regulator, the franchising authority, Railtrack, the franchisees, British Rail, independent passenger operators, freight operators, passenger transport authorities, local authorities and the Health and Safety Executive, among others, to work together cohesively and constructively. That is a massively tall order.

Some of those bodies will have different objectives which will frequently bring them into conflict. In short, it is a bureaucratic nightmare of perhaps horrendous proportions. It is undoubtedly the exact opposite of the Government's stated aim of reducing bureaucracy and improving efficiency. Nothing could be further from the truth. I am not a prophet of doom, but I cannot envisage such a mass of interests working together cohesively.

The people of Wales felt the effect of Dr. Beeching's axe to a greater extent than other parts of the United Kingdom. We have very few lines currently operating, but we rely heavily on them. As we have a relatively sparse population, I foresee a rapid downgrading of the skeleton sevice now offered, so much so that it will no longer be a viable option for passengers.

My hon. Friends the Members for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) have long campaigned for the north Wales line to be electrified. It is an important gateway to Ireland and the rest of the European Community. The three of us asked the European Community to investigate the possibility of cohesion funds being made available for that purpose. To my great regret, the only recent change in the north Wales service was a cut in the number of InterCity services from Holyhead to London. I am very concerned that north Wales will languish in a backwater with such negative treatment. I am desperately worried that if the Government's proposals, which are complex and seemingly unworkable, come to fruition there will be little hope for north and mid-Wales as the lines there will appear unattractive to operators.

The Government should reconsider the schemes as it clearly behoves them to ensure that adequate investment is made now so that the infrastucture is brought up to date and that environmentally beneficial services are upgraded. Failure to do so would be but another exercise in the short-termism so frequently shown by the Government.

This is one sell-off which must be prevented because it is so fraught with problems as to be unworkable. The bureaucracy involved would soon ensure that the railways ground to an ignominious and economically disastrous halt.

The White Paper is badly lacking in any commitment or assurances for the future. For example, is the same amount of track to be retained? What will be the scale and level of passenger services? The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) mentioned the view of the Freight Transport Association with which I agree; it is, of course, very important to ensure that the infrastructure is brought up to date. That is a major factor in the success or otherwise of the scheme outlined. I believe that the scheme is definitely unworkable, but I heard what the hon. Gentleman said and I understand his argument.

Rail freight is facing an uncertain future. Despite being environmentally sensible, there is no commitment to the maintenance of rail freight capability or to a specified percentage level of freight to travel by rail. The upshot will be more congestion on the roads and more environmental pollution, all as a direct result of the demise of rail freight.

We have only to consider the fate of Charterail to realise that the Government are truly uninterested in the freight sector. That is a damning statement in this day and age when everyone must and surely can recognise the environmental benefits of freight transport. The managing director of Charterail stated that the regime offered to his company by BR was simply uneconomic. We all know that the company has since gone into liquidation.

The Government have said that they would continue to pay subsidy for "socially necessary services". My grave concern is that there will be no socially necessary services in Wales and that, in the short term, we shall see a downgrading of services leading to cuts which will further hamper Wales's efforts to rejuvenate its economy.

It does not take a genius to work out that train operators will not queue up for the privilege of running rural services in Wales. They will aim for the more lucrative areas to the detriment of rural services. That has already been mentioned by several Opposition Members. The rural services will in the short term rely on a subsidy, but after a short time they will definitely face the axe.

There are no specific references to Wales in the White Paper. In addition, neither the White Paper nor the franchising document specifies the operating lines to be incorporated into a franchise. There are two possible outcomes. First, there may be complete freedom and flexibility for companies to come up with viable schemes, both operationally and financially and with or without grants. Secondly, there will be a situation bordering on chaos in which there will be different propositions, overlapping networks, gaps in routing and variations in ticket prices. That will result in comparisons being almost impossible.

I am absolutely opposed to franchising. If it is to take place, even in the time scale referred to, the recommendation of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs may prove useful. The Committee suggested, first, that the operation in Wales should be administered by the Welsh Office and the regulator jointly. They would have a joint responsibility to the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Transport. Thus Wales's priorities in the provision of rural railways and in urban transit policy, in Cardiff for example, would be paramount.

Secondly, under the Committee's proposals, finance for subsidy and investment assistance would be provided by the Welsh Office. Thirdly, as the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said, local authority finance would continue—if we have local authorities in Wales in the near future. Fourthly, the rural nature of most of the Welsh network would be fully considered.

Initiatives were taken by the Government through a joint environment and transport study which examined planning regulations and policies governing land use to see whether they could be co-ordinated with transport and with infrastructure development to reduce the need for travel and to encourage modes that are less polluting than the lorry and the car. That study is to be welcomed and the approach implies that the proposals for change in the organisation, structure and control of the national railway system must be set out within the strategic approach to overall transport demands.

The Government must make a commitment to supplying adequate financial resources to allow the rail network to achieve greater use even though that may mean some continuing subsidy and funding of infrastructure and modernisation. Major infrastructure investment is needed on projects such as the Great Western line and the north Wales main line as track improvements and electrification will mean expenditure that is too substantial to be capable of being funded by new private sector investors alone.

As we know, the Government propose that the track infrastructure and the day-to-day control through signalling will remain the state's responsibility under the new body called Railtrack. The Government intend to introduce private sector passenger services through financing agreements over a period. The agreements with Railtrack will continue to provide passenger services through arm's-length operating companies. The White Paper says:

"The private sector would then compete to take over these companies for the life of the franchise."

A franchising authority would be established to supervise the programme for passenger services. Subsidies for certain passenger services in Wales would continue, but at an unspecified level. Subsidies would be made available to franchise.

The Government will establish a regulator to oversee arrangements for track access and charging, to promote competition, to prevent monopoly abuse and to promote consumer interests. Assurances have been made about the need for a national rail network with through tickets, cross-validity and a national timetable.

However, there is concern about the practical realities which are as yet undefined. The number of franchises is undefined and there will be different contract periods. There will be inherent disadvantages in terms of the fragmentation of the system across the network. The area most prone to disruption will be ticketing and timetabling, which are at the heart of passenger requirements. How do the Government intend to ensure adequate planning and implementation of railway ticketing and timetabling arrangements to ensure that mechanisms exist for the optimum network arrangements for passengers?

This morning, I received a fax message from Mencap which is obviously and rightly concerned about the proposals. I do not know whether other hon. Members received that communication. Mencap is concerned about the adequacy of support for the publishing of information and national timetables. It has a specialised and valid interest which must be addressed in due course.

Numerous questions must be answered and I want to ask the Government one or two. I am greatly interested in what steps will be taken to ensure that Railtrack is stimulated to be efficient and responsive to customer demands, which will now come from the franchisees and from the freight companies. How will Railtrack adjudicate between competing demands from different operators?

Will the franchising authority itself introduce proposals for the new passenger services? What criteria will it use in determining the level of need for the publicly supported network? The new private passenger service operator will have to meet the requirements of the passengers charter. As lack of punctuality and unreliability are the most serious interruptions to service, who will now take responsibility? If signalling is faulty, will Railtrack pay compensation? If a breakdown by a franchisee causes all services to be delayed, will that franchisee be responsible for compensation and/or reimbursement of losses to other operators? It is obvious that an individual franchisee could not accept the responsibilities outlined in paragraph 29 of the White Paper.

Will the Government specify the standards that must be met in the Railtrack contract with operators and in the operators' ticketing terms with the passenger? Will child fares at 50 per cent. be guaranteed for those between five and 16? Will an ABTA-type bonding arrangement be necessary so that compensation claims are met from a central pool? What other mechanisms are there to make such compensation payments?

How will Railtrack determine access priority where paths are scarce or where various train operators share the use of infrastructure? Will it be on the basis of auctioning paths, bearing in mind the constraints of the EC directive 91/440 on open access, or will other policy considerations be applied, such as social priorities? If so, by whom? How realistic is it to expect that private operators will be prepared and able to pay from their revenue Railtrack's charges for maintenance, including safety costs and modernisation of the network? Would such a requirement lead to substantial increases in fares and a converse reduction in passenger miles?

What role will the European regional development fund and other EC structural funds—particularly important in Wales—play in continuing to support infrastructure renewal and modernisation? Will the transfer of some assets and most operations to the private sector lead to a reduction in ERDF grant both in terms of percentage and in terms of eligibility? Has the EC already started to re-examine existing ERDF grant eligibility in the light of the scheme now proposed by the Government. That question is vital to us in Wales and I am sure has a bearing throughout the United Kingdom.

Those are some of the questions which I would like answered. We shall shortly be entering the consultation period. I sincerely hope that those questions will be answered fully and positively so we at least know where we stand. I dare say that that will not change my view or that of my party on this creeping privatisation but at least we shall be able to see exactly what is on offer and what the country faces in the medium term.

Many fundamental questions remain unanswered. In my respectful submission, the privatisation of rail services simply will not work. I trust that good sense will prevail to prevent the introduction of yet another disastrous scheme driven by unthinking Tory dogma. I agree with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and I urge all hon. Members to consider their constituents first. After all, we are talking about our constituents and about a vital rail network. It will be no use our looking at each other in 10 years' time, when the network has been decimated. We in Wales continue to suffer because of Dr. Beeching's axe and I am sure of one thing at least: we do not intend to suffer further and will therefore resist the proposals at all costs.

Any hon. Member whose constituency contains a rural area or areas must beware of the challenges to their rail network. If hon. Members are to represent their constituents properly, they must stand up and be counted and not just pledge blind loyalty to dogma as Conservative Members have done so far.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I apologise for not having been present during some of the earlier speeches. I serve on a Select Committee which met from 5 pm until 7.15 pm and I returned as soon as I could.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) seemed to criticise the Government's proposals on the ground that they were too complex. They are, indeed, complex proposals which touch on huge undertakings and embrace reforms that Conservative Members believe are necessary. The fact that they are complex does not weaken the case to be made for them. The hon. Gentleman invited us to consider our constituents. That is the one thought that motivates me to speak tonight. Any hon. Member who represents a commuter constituency like mine cannot fail to understand the huge range of problems that the travelling public have had to face in the past 20 years or more getting to and from their home and place of work.

I was interested in the terms of the motion tabled by the Opposition, which urges:

"That this House opposes the privatisation of the railways."

The motion tells us little. It simply states an objective that the Labour party has pursued for many years. There is no surprise in that. It is rather like a bishop being against sin —although these days perhaps that is rather more surprising as so many bishops are not. The Labour party has simply stated its bald objection to the privatisation of the railways. It has not said what it would like to do instead—except to ask for more money, and more money, and perhaps a bit more money yet from the ever-suffering taxpayer. At least the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy attempted to paint a picture of life in his constituency as he sees it. In other Opposition Members' speeches, however, I have failed to see any picture, any clarity of vision or any policy except a reliance on the traditional determination to make the thing work, which is something that we have not yet seen in this country.

I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who is a flamboyant and strong speaker. His speech seemed largely to echo the "Panorama" programme that I saw a little while ago. I am therefore moved to ask whether the hon. Gentleman is writing for "Panorama" or whether "Panorama" is writing for him. The hon. Gentleman simply restated the argument that he advanced in our debate on 29 October last.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: I have not finished my annoying attack yet. I shall give way later.

Many of the arguments advanced in that debate have simply been rehashed today. I am moved to ask what the Labour party believes in. I know that it is going through a period of Clintonisation. Everything must now be kept quiet and under wraps until a commission has reported, upon whose findings the current Leader of the Opposition can adjudicate. When the Labour party's bright young things come back from America we may find that one of the items of advice that they have received from Mr. Clinton on how to win an election is that they must endorse the freeing up of the railway system—because that is one way to get votes, especially in the south-east of England.

We are talking today about a great philosophical divide. The Labour party and, I am afraid, some of my hon. Friends believe that British Rail is like a white Mini—one has only to paint it black and one can pretend that it is a Rolls-Royce. That is simply not the case. It will not work. In his excellent speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said, "If faced with a choice of doing something or doing nothing, I would rather be doing something." That is a school of philosophy to which I belong. The Opposition have stated their views. At one time, they believed in something. They used to believe in helping people and putting people first, but now they are hidebound by advice from American politicians.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made matters quite plain. There were a number of items in his speech that the Opposition had not heard. Rail services are to be franchised—not sold—and ultimately, if standards are not met, the franchise can be withdrawn. My right hon. Friend also said that track and signalling would remain in public ownership—until such time as they may be privatised. Railtrack will still have public interest responsibilities which it will be required to meet. My right hon. Friend also said that this was not a speedy privatisation. I do not regard an evolving gradual process of privatisation over a period of 12 years as fast. Finally, my right hon. Friend said—the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) did not seem to hear him—that subsidies would continue under the arrangements that we are discussing and pass into legislation when the period of consultation is over.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy reminded us to put our constituents first. We are talking about a service to our people and the service has not been in accordance with the fare, price and tariff that they have had to pay. The railway service is a national service, but it is often delivered locally. My constituents who travel from Dartford to London and back will be delighted at the notion of privatisation: first, because it provides a degree of accountability that we have not had before; secondly, because it will free up the proper application of private sector rigour to be applied to the railway service. We have heard that a number of management groups within British Rail may wish to buy out or into a form of service. The management would transfer from one area to another, but at least it would be able to do it for itself. That essential freedom, which I believe British Rail needs, will be there for all our constituents to enjoy.

I wholeheartedly welcome the Government's proposals. The Labour party has not demonstrated its belief in the motion that it has tabled—a sad, pathetic motion doing no more than to oppose privatisation of the railways. I wish to give some advice not only to the Opposition but to my right hon. Friends Lords Ridley, Whitelaw and Young. They are pretty free with their advice. I do not blame the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East for using whatever evidence comes his way; I would do the same. I should like to issue a challenge to Lord Whitelaw, Lord Ridley, and Lord Young. For a period of 28 days they should travel from Dartford station at 7.30 in the morning and return in the rush hour at 6 o'clock at night. If they did that, I wonder whether they would express the same views as they expressed recently about the privatisation of British Rail. I make that challenge most carefully because I admire those great men who have had a past.

Mr. Prescott: They certainly have.

Mr. Dunn: I want to talk about that later. It is essential for the noble Lords to see life in the raw—the life of my constituents who have no option but to use British Rail.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Will my hon. Friend add to the challenge that he has made to the noble Lords and ask them to travel from Hertford, East to Liverpool Street daily? Perhaps they could divide their attention between the line to Dartford and the line to Hertford, East, and possibly even to Southend. If the noble Lords did that, they might possibly experience greater inconvenience than they have ever experienced before.

Mr. Dunn: Perhaps my hon. Friend could write to the noble Lords and make that suggestion in his own inimitable way.

In conclusion, I welcome the proposals. They are balanced, essential, and right. Because the proposals are gradual, they can be seen to be working and assimilated properly. I thank the House for listening to me so warmly.

8.33 pm

Ms. Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Like the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), I, as a Member who is sponsored by the rail union ASLEF, have the honour to represent a London constituency. I do not welcome the Government's proposals to privatise, or, rather, commercialise, British Railways. Anyone who has ever used the railways on the commuter network surrounding London and the south-east will have a horror story that concentrates on the old, cold, often dirty and invariably overcrowded railway carriage in a train that arrives all too often late and, on occasions, refuses to arrive at all.

In some cases people have had their job applications turned down simply because their journey to work would involve travelling on some of the most notoriously inefficient lines. Therefore, I am sure that most hon. Members would agree that the question to be answered is not whether our railways are in urgent need of modernisation, but how best that modernisation can be achieved and how standards can be maintained in subsequent years.

[Ms. Glenda Jackson]

Initially, I had written the word privatisation. However, after hearing the Minister's remarks this afternoon, I have opted for semi-privatisation. According to Ministers, semi-privatisation is the only sensible option. They have argued that semi-privatisation will introduce competition and vital new managerial expertise from the private sector. As the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) so saliently said this afternoon, the only people on these islands who have any experience in managing a railway are those who manage British Rail at present. The Government argue that privatisation is the option that is being chosen by our European partners and our major competitors such as Sweden, Germany and Japan.

The Minister referred to British Rail as a public monopoly. He argued that the monopoly is causing British Rail's problems and implied that what was needed was a short, sharp shock of competition. However, that simply is not the case. For example, InterCity is in direct competition with private cars, company cars, buses and even airlines. It has a market share of 8 per cent. Rail Freight Distribution has only 7 per cent. of the market share. Despite the Minister's reference to the monopoly that British Rail exercises over commuter traffic, Network SouthEast carries less than half of such traffic into inner London.

British Rail already operates in a highly competitive market. It will be to the benefit of no one if rail is forced to compete against itself in addition to its other competitors. It is a grave mistake for the Government to view British Rail in terms of nothing other than profit and loss. British Rail is not merely a business; it is vital in social, environmental and broad economic terms which go well beyond whether the Chingford to Liverpool Street line is showing a positive return.

The energy consumption of cars is six times greater than that of rail. Cars emit 200 times more nitrogen than trains and 500 times more carbon monoxide. I well remember with some chagrin my first visit to the United States when I stood and gazed in arrogant disbelief at weather forecasts which regularly carried something called breatheability air levels. In my arrogance I believed that such a situation could never arise in these islands. However, our weather reports regularly contain reports on the breatheability of our air.

What value will private enterprise place on a clean, breatheable environment? Will business men who are fighting against tight profit margins be content to see a greener Britain as an adequate return on their investment? What about the social dimension? Many regional railways already run services as infrequently as four times a day. Such lines are not attractive to investors, but they are vital to those who use them. If privatisation or commercialisation becomes a reality, the only incentive to maintain such services will be a guarantee of Government subsidy. Since 1983, the Government have cut British Rail's subsidy by half.

There is a broader economic picture. Our railways are vital to the economy of the nation as a whole. The Confederation of British Industry has estimated that road congestion costs our nation £15 billion per year. Sir John Banham has predicted that Britain will "enter the 21st century with the worst transport infrastructure in Western Europe".

It is imperative that Britain has a co-ordinated and integrated transport network. It is not feasible that such a network can evolve in an environment in which myriad individual companies struggle to capture lines, passengers and subsidies from each other.

If a train breaks down mid-route, in the present network a replacement can be dispatched from the nearest depot. In a privatised network, how willing will a company be to send one of its highly prized investments to the aid of one of its competitors?

I have said before that Ministers use the example of rail networks in Sweden and Japan, and the proposed privatisation of the German rail network, as justification for their scheme. I wonder how closely Ministers have examined the schemes which they praise so highly. The privatisation of Swedish railways resulted in the loss of 15,000 jobs, although it was done in co-ordination with the Swedish bus network. In Britain, the buses are being deregulated. Of the 25 networks that were opened up to competition, private contractors won contracts to operate only two.

In Germany, privatisation will be accompanied by a car tax, which is an environmental initiative to cut transport pollution by 30 per cent., and investment of DM108 billion in the railway infrastructure. The Japanese Government set up a headquarters to deal with the retraining and redeployment of 93,000 former railway employees and introduced legislation which gave it authority to recruit private enterprises to re-employ surplus personnel. In Japan, a corporation was set up to manage the debts of the former companies and shoulder the burden of pension payments. I have no doubt that the Minister's statements today about pension payments to British Rail employees will be welcomed. I hope that the Government's pension proposals were not simply a matter of take it or leave it.

How many of the proposals that I have set out will be found in the Government's privatisation plans? Will the Government introduce a car tax? Will it promise investment of £43 billion? Will it give guarantees on jobs and retraining?

There are reasons why British Rail is a nationalised industry. As I said, it is not a business which could or should be judged solely in terms of the profit that it provides for its investors. It is not sheltered from competition or devoid of incentive. As the nation's industry, it is driven by an incentive to do the things that it is not possible for a company in the private sector to do. As the nation's industry, it is able to provide services to those parts of the nation that are isolated and unattractive to the private investor.

What value can there be in leaving the infrastructure and the service which are so vital to our nation's future to the hurly burly and often less than honourable competition of the private sector? British Rail, as the nation's industry, can implement safety improvements in an integrated way throughout the entire network in a way that would be impossible for a small company with limited capital and a limited length of franchise. As the nation's industry, it has an incentive to provide a service that benefits the nation as a whole and fulfils long-term aims rather than the aims of a company which is obliged to show a quick return and to maximise its profits.

If the privatisation proposals are implemented, that commitment to the nation's service will be lost. That will be of absolutely no benefit to anyone.

8.40 pm

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): The Opposition and the railways have one thing in common: they both run on fixed tracks. We have heard a succession of speeches the gist of which is that the only way to improve the quality of our railway services is to spend more money and give greater subsidies.

Today, as always, there are limitations on the amount of public money that is available. I believe that there are also new ways to improve the quality of our railway services. I represent a railway constituency in which more than 2,000 people work on the railways. My constituents have a strong interest in the greater use of the railways and in transferring traffic from road to rail.

However, it is not enough to say, as do some people—including the Leader of the Opposition—that more people should travel by railways. Indeed, I understand that the Leader of the Opposition constantly travels to and from his constituency by plane. It is very easy to say that other people should travel by railway. If we are to encourage more people to use the railways, we must improve the quality of the service.

Many hon. Members have said, quite correctly, that BR has become much more efficient over the past 10 years. I pay tribute to the improvements that have been made on the railways through more efficient management. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said that it is possible to have more efficient public sector management. British Rail has achieved that.

Mr. Prescott: British Rail did that 10 years ago.

Mr. Milligan: It has improved over the last 10 years. British Rail now carries 49 per cent. more traffic per employee than the west European average at one sixth of the subsidy. That is a considerable achievement. However, we have exhausted the limits of improvement simply as a result of better public sector management. We must consider other methods to encourage improvement.

I believe that two aspects are important. The first is to try to give better service to the customer. Nationalised industries, which tend to be oriented towards output, are not so well geared to look after customers. The second point is to encourage innovation. Again nationalised industries do not have a good record on innovation. They tend to continue to produce what they have already produced.

It is not possible to privatise the entire railway network for reasons that are already well known. However, there are signs that experiments with privatisation on limited services have been a success. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East referred to Charterail, which went bust, and to Tiger Rail. However, he did not refer to Foster Yeoman, a west country quarrying company, which has a great interest in cheap transport costs.

Mr. Prescott: It is in the public sector.

Mr. Milligan: Foster Yeoman is not in the public sector. It is a private company.

Foster Yeoman wanted to use British Rail to transport aggregates for building work in the south-east. Transport costs were critical to that company if the aggregates were to be transported by rail rather than by road. Its experience was that BR could not do the job at the price the company wanted.

Foster Yeoman offered to provide a privatised service by buying its own locomotives with bigger trains and less maintenance. As a result, it runs a very efficient service with BR personnel. Goods have been taken off the roads and now are moved by rail. There is a similar experience, although in a minor way, in respect of private tourist services such as the Orient Express and the Royal Scot which have found niche markets which BR did not find.

Many hon. Members have referred to the foreign experience. That experience is the most significant factor. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East referred to Japan. I hope that he will forgive me when I say that I believe that he is slightly muddled about what is happening in Japan. He said that it was a question, not of privatisation in Japan, but of some kind of nationalised industry.

Roughly half the railways in Japan are already privatised. They have been in private hands for a very long time. Incidentally, they have as good a safety record as the railways in the public sector. Japanese railways in the public sector have been divided into six separate companies which operate independently and which, in time, will be floated on the stock market. They have not been floated yet because, as hon. Members may have noticed, the Japanese stock market has been in a pretty bad way. However, they will be floated and they have already gained considerable benefits by being independent of the national railways.

Mr. Enomoto, a managing director of the East Japan Railway, has said

"The railways in Japan are now in excellent condition."

With regard to the new arrangement, he stressed the improvement in employee morale. Such an improvement could be significant in this country. Using rather quaint Japanese terms in English translation, he said that one of the notable things now about the staff on Japanese railways is that they give "polite greetings" and "kind directions" to people who use the railways. We would very much appreciate that approach in this country.

We should also consider what has happened in Sweden. It has been said that only 1 per cent. of Swedish railways has been privatised. However, the part of the Swedish railways which has been put out to private tender has achieved enormous improvements. Fares have been halved and passenger usage has been greatly increased, by about 40 per cent. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) mentioned the improvements across the Swedish railways where costs have been cut by about 30 per cent. That has occurred partly as a result of imitation of the improvements achieved by private companies.

It is interesting that the Swedish Government are considering extending tendering, which until now has been confined to branch lines, to all main lines. Privatisation and franchising in Sweden have reduced costs and encouraged the use of the railways. Hon. Members on both sides of the House would like to see that.

Although the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East railed against privatisation at one point, he said that he did not think that ownership was critical. I hope that he will accept that it is possible to have a mixed system of ownership on the railways and that a degree of competition and of private enterprise can bring great improvements to the quality of the service.

We are entering new territory and it is right that the franchises should be experimental in the first phase. That is why I believe that it is right not to sell off the track and the assets. After five or six years it may be clear that the experience has not been good.

Our message to the people of this country should be, "You are fed up with the quality of the railway services in this country so we are now going to give private companies the chance to improve the quality of the service through innovation and new methods." That message would be widely welcomed.

The Opposition's negative approach is characteristic of them. They are not interested in new ideas to improve the railways or in privatisation. Since 1979 the Opposition have opposed every privatisation—privatisation that has been emulated around the world. We should not be surprised by the Opposition's motion and I hope that the House will reject it tonight.

8.50 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): First, I should remind the House that I am sponsored by the rail union RMT.

I wish to focus on something that the Secretary of State has stressed throughout the debate on rail privatisation, ever since the publication of the White Paper some months ago—his view that safety is paramount. If safety is his paramount consideration, a good test of whether privatisation will be a success should be whether it will make Britain's railways safer or less safe. Will it mean that we shall have more rail accidents, followed by Clapham and Cannon Street type inquiries, or will there be fewer of them?

Like other hon. Members, only earlier this afternoon did I receive the Department of Transport's latest report, "Ensuring safety on Britain's Railways", so I cannot claim to have read it in detail, but I have read the section headed "Preventing Fatigue—Controlling Hours of Work and Rest", and I am concerned by what I see there. The report says:

> "It is likely that there will be considerable public and Parliamentary pressure to apply limits to hours of work and rest periods for train drivers at least."

That is an understatement. It is not only likely that there will be such disquiet and such protests; it is absolutely certain. And why should the concern apply only to drivers? We should not forget that the Clapham crash, in which 35 people died, was caused, according to the Hidden inquiry, by a signal wiring fault, which was blamed on excessive overtime being worked by the person who did that bit of wiring.

The Department of Transport report which came out earlier today makes comparisons of the maximum permitted working hours of rail employees in Britain and in other European countries. All the countries in the report have an almost wholly, and in most cases a wholly, public sector railway system. One has to go a long way to find a private system.

In the autumn I went to the United States and met managers of Amtrak, who stressed to me the absolute importance in a mixed private-public rail system of having statutory regulation of railway employees' hours. I have been sent a copy of the American Hours of Service Act 1982, which stipulates in federal American law a general provision that no rail employee should work more than 14 hours, and more stringent conditions for some other types of staff. For operators and train despatchers—in English, signal men and women—the maximum is a nine-hour shift. For signals installation staff, like the man involved in the Clapham wiring, the maximum period of duty is 12 hours. There is no statutory limit in Britain, but since the Hidden report British Rail has operated a non-statutory 12-hour maximum in a 24-hour period.

Will the Minister, in replying, undertake to examine the United States Act and to consider bringing in similar statutory protection for rail workers and the travelling public here in Britain?

8.52 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): My concern in analysing the Government's proposals for privatisation is to ensure a better service for passengers. Part of that, in my view, is to ensure that there is greater opportunity for the disciplines of the private sector, because it is a facet of corporate monopolies in the public sector that they encourage the worst traditions of bureaucratic indolence and sloppy standards. Despite the substantial progress that has been made in British Rail in recent years, which I recognise and welcome, and despite the very large and ever increasing amounts, well ahead of inflation, which the Government have put into rail investment over the past few years—there has been well over £1 billion of investment this year alone, an increase in real terms of more than 50 per cent. since 1980—there are still very substantial difficulties.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Hawkins: Time is short and I am afraid that I cannot accept interventions.

The problems that passengers in my constituency of Blackpool, South and throughout the country face as a result of inadequate standards have to be addressed. The negative nature of the Opposition motion and the air of unreality that has pervaded pretty well all the speeches from the Opposition Benches are quite staggering. To hear Opposition Members talk, one would think that none of them ever heard complaints about rail services in their surgeries and constituency correspondence.

Only this morning I received a six-page letter, including a copy of a complaint form to British Rail, from a pensioner constituent of mine, and it is fairly typical. She and her husband were making a journey recently from my constituency to London and back. They had pre-booked their seats, as British Rail asks customers to do. Their train to London was over two hours late; their train coming back from London was over two hours late. The state of the toilets in the stations and on the trains was unspeakably disgusting, and the overcrowding was appalling. This, I am afraid, is the experience of far too many people.

There are many dedicated British Rail staff who do their best to minimise the difficulties, and there has been a massive improvement in British Rail services. They are vastly better today than they were in the bad old days of the 1960s and 1970s, when Labour Governments consistently underfunded British Rail, when there was no imaginative management, when there were none of the improvements that the Government have introduced in recent years. But there is so much more that can be done, and only by involving private sector capital can we ensure that we have a rail system to be proud of.

The benefits of rail privatisation are that passengers will get a better deal from a service in which management and employees will have a stronger incentive then ever before to provide high-quality service which responds to the customer's needs. Competition will provide a further incentive to improve and expand services. Safety will remain at the top of the Government's priorities, as it always has to and as the Health and Safety Commission has confirmed in today's report. Rail management will be able to concentrate on running services free from the constraints of the public sector spending round and without Government involvement in day-to-day matters.

There will be many opportunities to improve efficiency and quality as local management takes on greater responsibilities and works more and more closely with the public that it serves. The franchising authority will set clear standards which will be written into franchisees' contracts. Only when those standards are introduced and the disciplines of the private sector are seen to operate will the morale of the staff really be improved and will there be opportunities to have the kind of rail system of which the public can be justly proud.

I very much hope and expect that the House will rightly reject the Opposition motion, which is so negative and has nothing constructive to offer, and will support the Government's proposals wholeheartedly, as I do.

8.56 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I will endeavour to be brief—indeed, I am under instructions to be brief, so I will deal with the substantive point in a moment.

I cannot think of a more sloppy and disgraceful way of dealing with this matter than the Government's method of publishing relevant documents on a gradual basis whilst at the same time promising us a major Bill in the next few weeks. The minimum that we should expect is that the Minister should use his good offices with the Leader of the House to see if we can have two days for the Second Reading debate. There is much that needs to be scrutinised and we are incapable of doing that because we have not yet had the necessary documentation.

What we are about to embark upon as the legislation goes through the House can only be described as a political mortal sin. The criteria for a mortal sin are full knowledge, full consent and grave matter. The Government have full knowledge of, and fully consent to embarking on, something that will subsequently prove to be extremely reckless. They have had counsel from the media, from the industry, from the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), from Members of the other place who used to be until recently on the Treasury Bench; all have told the Government that it will not work. There are even prospective commercialisers who have made it abundantly clear that the franchising basis on which the Government are embarking will not work. I refer, in particular, to Sir James Sherwood, who gave evidence to the Select Committee on Transport. Unfortunately, the media were more preoccupied with Richard Branson's pullover on that day and failed to give sufficient attention to the valuable evidence of Sir James Sherwood, who indicated that he was not interested in the idea of the Railtrack authority and did not believe that it would work.

There has been reference to Foster Yeoman. We received considerable evidence from freight industry witnesses—and I think that Foster Yeoman was included in this particular point—who made it abundantly clear that, if the pricing regime of the track were to be based on what they understood the Government's proposals to be, they would have to look to moving their traffic from rail to road; it simply was "not on" to continue to run freight on the basis of that which we understand to be the Government's proposition. I use the phrase "we understand" because we do not know. This sloppy Government have not produced, at this critical stage, a document setting out the pricing regime for the use of the track. It is an absurd situation and one that they need to remedy before we have the Bill, in the interests of both the House itself and also of their parliamentary colleagues who, once they have seen what is proposed, will, I think, change their attitude to the Bill dramatically. They will have much less enthusiasm for it than has been demonstrated tonight.

I want to make one comment about the hon. Member for Christchurch. I have not been a Member of the House long, but I doubt whether there has been in recent times a more devasting speech by a Government Back-Bencher on a proposal of the Government than that which we heard from the hon. Gentleman. I commend his courage. I also commend his precision and his knowledge of how railways can and should work. His motive in speaking was not only to be a diligent Member but also, I suspect, to save the Government he supports from a disaster such as they experienced with the poll tax. The hon. Member has referred to the proposals as a poll tax on wheels.

As someone who represents a commuting constituency, I am concerned that my constituents will have no benefit from this very costly and lengthy legislation upon which we are about to embark. Others have spoken about the parlous state of British Rail at present, including the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) and the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins), who referred to the complaints that he had received in his constituency mail. Of course, we all receive complaints. They are an indication of how our important rail network has been run down by the Conservative Government over the past 14 years.

The remedy is not this franchising proposal. My great anxiety is that we are about to rush into changes which will lead eventually to a closure of lines, peak-hour only facilities in many areas, high costs to commuters and rail travellers and a continuing haemorrhage of freight from rail with no appreciable improvement of the service for people who live in and around London and those who wish to commute from other parts of the country.

There are many other of the Government's rail proposals that one would like to probe. There is no time tonight, but I hope that, at the very least, the Government will take on board the rights of hon. Members on both sides of the House so that when the legislation is introduced they will ensure, not only in Committee but on Second Reading, that we have an opportunity to develop our thoughts and our questions to a much greater extent than we are able to do today, both because of time constraints and because we have had insufficient detailed documentation on the intentions and effects of the Government's proposals.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Nothing has been more pathetic or revealing in this debate today than to hear Tory Members, particularly in the last few speeches, denigrating and berating British Rail services as they affect their constituents without acknowledging one iota of responsibility for this state of affairs and for under-investment in British Rail. They have had 14 years of power, but still lack the guts to accept any of the responsibility for what has resulted from it as regards either the railways or anything else. I would refer them, in particular, to a quotation from an article in The Independent by Christian Wolmar from the day on which the representatives of the French, Swedish and German railways gave evidence to the Select Committee on Transport. Mr. Wolmar summed things up like this:

"Their answers will send a shiver down the spines of all rail users as they both said"— the French and Swedish representatives—that, as a result of what the Government were proposing to do,

"there would be line closures, a transfer of freight and passengers to rail and competition on some well used lines. But even these services might become more unreliable because of under-investment in the infrastructure."

The core problem they identified was the years of under-investment in the United Kingdom network. As Mr. Lundberg, the director of corporate planning with Swedish railways, said:

"You must first invest, then you can privatise."

So even according to their own standards and by their own lights the Government are hoist on the petard of their own folly—of their failure to invest in the railways over the past 13 years. They have rendered the railways incapable of responding to the political ideology which they now wish to impose upon them.

Let us be in no doubt about what the indictment is tonight and will be in the weeks ahead as the debate develops. Rail privatisation would mean more bureaucracy, fewer services, more freight on the roads, substantial job losses and greater safety risks. The British public will agree that there is not a great deal in that offer for them. There is nothing in rail privatisation—nothing positive, nothing worth while, nothing creative, nothing to improve the environment or the economy for the passenger or the taxpayer. There will be more bureaucracy, fewer services, more freight on the roads, substantial job losses and greater safety risks: a poor agenda to offer the travelling public and the taxpayer alike.

I shall deal first with safety because that should always be dealt with first in these matters. The Health and Safety Commission report was the dog that was not meant to bark today. We had expected a statement on it. The statement disappeared. I believe that the reason why the statement disappeared and the whole thing became a bit of a mishmash in the course of the Secretary of State's speech was that the Government had been denied the opportunity to news-manage this document because the true thrust of the report was revealed in advance. However, what it did say cannot be avoided. I will not allow Tory Members to avoid the realities of what that report actually says as opposed to the gloss that the Secretary of State tried to put on it. I ask each hon. Member to note this because one day they will be held to account for this by their constituents. The report says under "Privatisation":

"Companies with little or no previous experience of operating on the railway and managers with limited experience of railway safety issues will enter the railway industry as the BR is broken. Many changes in traditional working arrangements may be proposed. Control of railway operations will be divided between many different organisations and this will generate a need to define the extent of the responsibilities of each party and to ensure effective management of safety . . .

Unless considerable care is taken to set up systems to ensure that new operators are properly equipped and organised there can be no confidence that risk will be effectively controlled right from the start and that important matters do not fall between the safety arrangements of the various parties."

I ask Tory Members, including the most glib and most sycophantic in supporting these proposals, to note the following words:

"The consequences of failing to achieve adequate systems of control will be seen in increased risk on the railway system and the likelihood of an increase in the numbers, and possibly also the severity, of accidents."

That is what the report says and the warning that it gives. Of course it goes on to set out a long list of measures to counter the threat and of course the Government accept those recommendations. It would be extremely odd if they did not, given that they are the political masters of the situation and they are the ones who are driving it. The Health and Safety Commission is telling the Government that they are putting in place a more dangerous system and unless they control it very carefully there will be more accidents and more serious accidents. That is what the Health and Safety Commission is saying.

I ask every Tory Back Bencher, where is the demand coming from to put in place that more dangerous system? That document is crucial and the message is, of course, that if you throw money and bureaucracy at them, every one of the risks can be countered in a more and more convoluted way. But who wants to create the danger just so that it must be met through such convoluted systems? That applies to only the few, the handful on the Government Benches, who have been dragooned into speaking in the debate. They have more loyalty to their party than to their constituents.

That might apply to those few here, but every witness before the Select Committee said, in effect, "We see no sense or advantage in it. We want a decent railway system, and this is not the way to achieve it." But because the Conservatives are driven by ideological and dogmatic insistence, they will press on with their proposals and the first price to be paid will be the certainty that the public are travelling on the safest possible railway system.

The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) probably has copyright on the phrase "poll tax on wheels." It started as something of a slogan, but the comparison continues to build to the point at which it becomes compelling. In recent years the Conservatives have introduced many measures which we have found unattractive and have opposed. However, the true analogy between the poll tax and rail privatisation lies not in its malevolence, but, first, in its intellectual absurdity and, secondly, in its unworkability. It lies in the contrived complexity of the mechanisms which must be devised to meet the objections. It lies in the increasing unease of those who are asked to support the policy, matched only by the increasing obsessiveness of those promoting the policy.

There was a compelling analogy with the poll tax last week when the Secretary of State for Transport, broadcasting to the nation, said that the whole problem was due not to the legislation and what was proposed but to the fact that people did not properly understand it. Lord

Ridley, Lord Young, Lord Whitelaw and the leader writer of The Daily Telegraph did not understand it. The whole world, including the hon. Member for Christchurch, did not understand it. If only they understood it, they would support it, the right hon. Gentleman claimed. It was as though he was retreating into the asylum shouting, "I'm not mad. It's just that the whole world doesn't understand."

I shall go through the objections one by one, the first being the future of passenger services. I regret that there are not many more Members in the House tonight. The situation is analogous with the poll tax; it takes a long time for matters such as this to build up, but build up this issue will as the Committee stage proceeds, as the debates continue and as the articles appear. Warnings will continue to come from consumer groups. Objections from local authorities of all complexions will be put forward. We shall have one debate after another on this subject in the coming two or three years and then the Benches will be fuller as Members begin to realise what the message is from their constituents.

I shall be proven correct in saying that Tory Back Benchers will have to get used to the idea that privatisation will mean the closure of railway lines, stations and services. Loss-making, and particularly rural services, need the protection of cross-subsidy within an integrated system. There is no escaping the fact that if we disintegrate the system, we threaten the weaker lines. Anybody wanting proof of that need only have seen the reaction of the Secretary of State this afternoon to my question about the future of the 11,000-mile network. "Shifty" would be too modest a description.

The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks), in what I thought was a notably naive and sycophantic speech, called in aid Mr. James Sherwood as a witness who had gone to the Select Committee to greet the proposals as good news. I do not think anybody else would have put that interpretation on Mr. Sherwood's evidence. The hon. Gentleman and Mr. Sherwood should go along the south coast of England to each of the stations that will lose the services that Mr. Sherwood said he would close as part of his interest in privatisation. While Mr. Sherwood's evidence might have been good news in Southport, it was not good for the coastal lines, which he has already said he will close if he ever gets his hands on them.

The figure is 11,000 miles, and the Secretary of State says that the great majority of them will survive. He must know that 7,000 miles is a great majority of 11,000. So is 8,000. Can he put a figure on it? We can, because there has been a figure on it for the last 20 years under Governments of both complexions. The figure is 11,000 miles. But today, in his evasions, the right hon. Gentleman confirmed that the expectation and reality must be the substantial closure of railway lines throughout the country and in particular rural lines which exist for a social as well as a communications purpose.

Nobody need be in any doubt about this. One has only to read the submissions from the would-be operators, such as the proposals of Sherwood. Already Sherwood knows what he is going to close. One has only to read about what the Badger Line wants to do about the Newquay branch in Cornwall, where it is already talking about bus substitution. One has only to read about what Grampian Transport wants to do. It wants to concrete over the rails and create busways. The same thing applies in the Isle of Wight, where the Invecta bus company operates.

About half the external expressions of interest in rail privatisation and franchising has come from bus companies. Can the Secretary of State for Transport seriously tell us that bus companies will compete against themselves? Can he tell us that when, in a year or two, they say that it would be more economic to take the trains off and put the passengers on their buses, he will say, "No, that is not cricket. You cannot do that. You will have to run the train services and bus services side by side". I hope very much that the Office of Fair Trading, which has expressed an interest in the creation of these local monopolies, with bus companies bidding for the franchises, will pursue the matter to the limit and say that it will not tolerate such a situation.

Every hon. Member knows in his heart of hearts that loss-making rural services will not stand the privatisation process.

Mr. Matthew Banks rose——

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Member for Southport declined to extend to me the courtesy of giving way. However, I shall give way to him.

Mr. Banks: The fact that the hon. Gentleman has made not one but successive comments about this matter indicates either that he has not listened at all since 3.30 this afternoon or that he is deliberately misrepresenting what the Government are trying to do.

Mr. Wilson: That is a sweeping statement, but the hon. Gentleman will have more success in sweeping Southport than in sweeping the House with it. I am dealing in specifics; he is dealing in pious hopes. Since I, too, have a majority of just 3,000 I, too, would hope that my rail services would not be taken away.

Of course, rural and loss making services will be more exposed. There is an argument for specifying how much each service loses. I understand that argument and it could be applied to any other system. However, with regard to this regime, if one were to start with the view that losses on specific local services should be set out, within months—certainly within years—the case that it would be reasonable to withdraw such routes would be built up. The case would be made that it is absurd to have only 10 people using a service that costs £X per person per user in subsidy. How ridiculous, it would be said. This is what is protected under the cross-subsidy system when it is run by people who believe in the railways as a national network. However, it does not take a soothsayer to predict that once the per capita cost of operating these services is known the Government will withdraw the subsidy and accept the overtures of the private operators for withdrawal, particularly if, in the meantime, they have managed to get rid of everyone else who uses the lines—the freight operators, who at present share the costs.

Mr. Snape: Is my hon. Friend aware that the identification of individual lines in terms of profit and loss is an idea that has been tried before? Indeed, it is one beloved of the Treasury, which has always believed that somewhere in there is the core of a profitable railway system. Is my hon. Friend aware that such a system was dropped as a result of the Railways Act 1974 because it was felt that, in order to bring British Rail's accounting into line with that in the rest of the European Community, we needed to get away from such an approach? So far as the Government are concerned, it is another case of back to the future.

Mr. Wilson: I am grateful for the fact that, in respect of these matters, my hon. Friend goes back much further than I do. What he says is entirely right. If we believe in a national railway we must resist the philosophy of the core railway. But the core railway is the logical progression of the privatised system, especially when operated by a Government who, at heart, as we have heard many times tonight, do not believe in the principle of subsidy on social or any other grounds.

What about passenger transport authorities and the services that they provide? The hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins), a cheerful proponent of breaking up the railways although that process has led to the loss of the InterCity service to Blackpool, spoke about the bags of mail that hon. Members receive about the inadequacy of local rail services. I do not receive such mail: my local rail services are extremely good because of the intelligent co-operation between Strathclyde regional council and British Rail through Strathclyde passenger transport executive. That is why the west of Scotland has excellent electrified services and why £100 million has been invested in passenger transport services in the west midlands.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) spoke about the experience in west Yorkshire. Innovations are prevented by restrictions imposed by the Department of Transport. Throughout the country, passenger transport authorities do an excellent job and strive to do a better one within the limits of the resources that are available to them. They are to be boxed out of this altogether. Local taxpayers' money will go into systems over which there is no democratic accountability through local authority representatives on the PTAs. How can that be justified? Their sole job, according to the Government, will be to administer on behalf of the private operators.

Is it seriously suggested that that is how local taxpayers' money should be used, or will the whole system simply collapse along with so much else? A creative public transport commitment is needed to carry out the work that the PTAs are doing and the Government are prepared to throw that work away to pursue the daft dogma of rail privatisation.

The certainty of rail privatisation is that it will drive more freight on to the roads. That is important to people outside even if it is not important to some hon. Members. There is no need to look into the crystal ball to see that because it is already happening on a large scale.

It would be unfair to Tory Members to say that they do not care. I have sat through debates in which many of them appeared to care. They care about their constituencies, about the roads of Kent, for instance, but they care in a localised, short-sighted, myopic way. They wonder whether in their areas something could be done to get more freight on to the railways. They fail to understand that while the Government pursue policies that are specifically directed towards the other trend, that will not happen. In order to reduce rail freight to a core business British Rail is working under conditions and towards objectives that nobody could reach and still maintain freight on the railways.

Mr. Hawkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilson: No.

Why is British Rail still operating under financial objectives that were laid down by Cecil Parkinson in December 1989 when he was Secretary of State for Transport? Those objectives were a profit of £50 million and an 8 per cent. return on investment. Can the Minister name one road haulage firm in the country that aims for an 8 per cent. return on investment in the present economic climate? Why was a letter sent from the Department of Transport last July to British Rail saying that there was to be no new investment in rail freight except for that directed towards the channel tunnel? Why was that done? If there is any desire to get freight on to the railways, why is not BR allowed to work to realistic objectives?

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): In his capacity as the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, will the hon. Gentleman say what sum his party would cite as a reasonable objective? To what extent would he subsidise freight transport and the business of trying to transfer freight from the roads? The hon. Gentleman is speaking in abstract terms, but perhaps he would put a figure on the subsidy that his party would provide for freight transport.

Mr. Wilson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the debate. I hope that he was here to listen to what I said about the prospect for services in Cornwall. Subsidy is another term for "nothing else to lose". If freight can be carried on the railways without additional cost to the infrastructure, any sensible society would opt for that because it has social and economic advantages.

Mr. Harris: Without subsidy?

Mr. Wilson: That seems to be roughly equivalent to zero. If goods can be carried without cost to the infrastructure, it makes sense to do so. In contrast, British Rail is forced to work under those objectives and that is why contracts are being thrown away.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman is dodging.

Mr. Wilson: I am not dodging anything. All the contracts that are being thrown away because of those objectives as part of the pre-privatisation aim of getting Railfreight down to a rump operation are exactly those that any sensible person would say should be carried on the railways—cement, oil, bitumens, chemicals and forestry products. Every time a 100,000-tonne contract is lost by British Rail it means another 4,000 lorries on our roads.

Let Tory Back Benchers who support rail privatisation go to their constituents with the slogan "More freight on the roads". One cement contract lost, not because it was unprofitable but because it was not profitable enough, will put another 200,000 tonnes of freight on to the roads. That is the reality of what is happening as a result of the run-up to privatisation. Conservative Members should not tell their constituents that they want more freight on the railways because everything that they and Ministers are doing in order to slim down the freight operation is having precisely the opposite effect.

Many people work on building trains, rolling stock and everything else that is needed for the railways. It is an important industry with a good tradition and many skills. But what does that matter to people who have destroyed so many other industries with great traditions and skills?

The Railway Industry Association warned the Select Committee on Transport, and thereby the House, that 30,000 jobs are at risk in the railway industries already because of the blight which the threat of privatisation has placed on investment in the railways. For the first time ever, InterCity plans no new investment in rolling stock. No one will invest in rolling stock or rail equipment when it is not known who will be running the trains in a few years' time. If Conservative Members check with railway suppliers in their constituencies they will find that their order books are empty.

The Railway Industry Association, which I suspect is not a great ideological friend of the Opposition, has warned that 30,000 jobs are at stake. On the railways the attrition is already on to slim down, with 5,000 redundancies scattered around the country, and that is only the start.

The bureaucracies that will be created in order to pursue the worthy aims of dividing up fares among half a dozen different companies and reviving the clearing house at Euston will result in the creation of white collar jobs while the people on whom the safety and efficiency of the railways depends are being got rid of. To take an example from my area, in the west of Scotland 131 track maintenance posts are to be done away with. The managers responsible for the crews which will be reduced in that way say:

"It is our view that . . . we have already reached the bottom line as far as manpower cuts are concerned and that any further reductions in staff will cause a sharp decline in track quality and compromise the safe running of trains."

That is what the managers in that region wrote to the British Rail management.

As similar job cuts are made throughout the country in order to complete the slimming down operation, that is the sort of message that will go to every region of British Rail and that, too, will filter back to Tory Members of Parliament.

The key to all the proposals is the separation of Railtrack from the operators of the trains; to say that not only will Railtrack be unsubsidised, but that it too has to give an 8 per cent. return on investment.

We have heard some nonsense today about comparisons with other systems. The Swedish system has been called in aid on various occasions. One hon. Member was particularly proud of the fact that the 1 per cent. of Swedish railways that is privately operated seems to be doing a terrific job. I wish it well, but the idea that there is any comparison is absurd.

The fundamental difference is that in Sweden the rail track operators are subsidised. That is where the subsidy goes in order to allow them to provide the railway infrastructure that we all want and on which other operators could potentially work, although, as we know now, 99 per cent. is still in the public sector.

It is, however, entirely different to suggest that the Railtrack authority will be unsubsidised and must therefore obtain all its revenue from the users. That is the catch 22. If the authority sets its charges at a realistic level —which I very much hope that it would—to take account of safety requirements and all the infrastructure over and above the track for which it will be responsible, the charges to operators will be so high that the operators will be bleating from day one, or will not operate the services at all.

The unthinkable alternative is to bring in some hard men from private enterprise to run the Railtrack authority, with the primary motive of getting the costs down, thus lowering the operators' charges. I fear that such a division of responsibility, with the operators constantly pressing the authority for lower charges, is a recipe for not a safer but a more dangerous railway, and for job losses in the short rather than the long term. Such a formula will ensure that traffic, both passenger and freight, will be driven off the railways.

Mr. Milligan: The hon. Gentleman suggests that it would be much better to subsidise the infrastructure company. The Government have already made it clear that, where it is necessary to continue to pay a subsidy for a service to exist, it will subsidise the running company. Why is it better to pay the owner of the track rather than the company that runs the service on the track?

Mr. Wilson: I do not have time to answer that question, but if the hon. Gentleman seriously wishes to answer it for himself, I am prepared to assist him; he will then begin to understand the fundamental flaws in the Government's proposals.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): The 1 per cent. is very effective.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman might just be able to understand the flaws; but I am afraid that there is no hope for the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman).

I know that The Daily Telegraph is now regarded in Tory circles as a dangerously radical rag, so there is no point in quoting from it. I also know that the various peers who have made their views felt are now persona non grata. I was not sure where to turn for a source that was sufficiently establishment to highlight the concerns felt by 99 per cent. of the population, but I felt that "Jane's World Railways" might prove adequate.

Mr. Snape: Who's she?

Mr. Wilson: A sister of "Jane's Fighting Ships".

Tories like talking about enterprise. How does this sound?

"In Britain, it seems, entrepreneurs innocent of debt arising from the past cost of developing a high-speed Inter-City system, will be able to lease modern BR rolling stock to cream off very profitably the premium peak business on key routes. Until the rest of the Inter-City operation can be sold off, piecemeal or as an entity, this must then struggle to make ends meet on its residual less lucrative and consequently contracting services."

That is really enterprising, is it not?

On the question of whether other European countries might follow us, "Jane's World Railways" says:

"It will be astonishing . . . if any Continental European government, let alone its railway, views this as better than a dogma-driven exercise, utterly irrelevant to national need of a well-balanced multi-modal transport system, and a damper of any further technological exploration of rail transport's potential."

That is what the Tories want: another great industry to be run down, flogged off and denigrated in advance. That is what they are doing to the railways, but they will not get away with it. Many analogies can be made with the poll tax. The more that people know about the Government's proposals, the more they will resist them and defeat them.

9.34 pm

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): Throughout this long debate, Conservative Members have given solid and consistent support to our proposals. Eight Conservative Members spoke. With the exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), the seven others—my hon. Friends the Members for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), for Hampshire North-West (Sir D. Mitchell), for Southport (Mr. Banks), for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan) and for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins)—supported the Government's proposals. That clearly showed the support of Conservative Members for our proposals.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was a prophet of gloom in the last general election campaign. He forecast that if a Tory Government were returned there would be a series of closures of stations, lines and services. He was wrong then, and he is wrong now. Let me deal with his point about Jim Sherwood. The Government do not accept what Mr. Sherwood proposes. When we franchise services there will be a competition and the company that wins will be obliged to run those services. No private sector company will close any railway service, so let us not be taken in by media comments or by comments from one individual.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North said that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had said that there could be closures on a significant scale. That is untrue. The franchising authority will start with the existing timetable and will impose on franchise companies a requirement to run a specific service for the length of the franchise. There will be clear closure procedures. In exchanges with the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) at the beginning of the debate, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it plain that to draw the inference that privatisation or the reforms that we propose will lead to closures was quite wrong.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North criticised the disaggregation of subsidy—the allocation of subsidy to individual railway lines. I think that he will find that he is in a minority. The transport users consultative committees are broadly in favour of the allocation of subsidy to particular lines and groups of services because they believe, and I believe that they are right—[Interruption.] No, the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North was not in favour of that. He talked erroneously about cross-subsidy. We are talking about taking the £1,000 million of subsidy to Regional Railways and Network SouthEast and, over time, allocating it to particular services. The Government believe that that will lead to a more informed debate about what is sensible and what is needed for rail services. The hon. Gentleman is out of step with his colleagues.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions about freight, as did the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who informed my right hon. Friend and me that she would not be here for the wind-up. The mail freight target set by Lord Parkinson, the then Secretary of State for Transport, was a profit of £50 million for the fiscal year 1992-93. Rail freight will lose £50 million this year, which is wide of the mark, and British Rail is rightly taking relatively modest steps to price up certain traffic. I think that it is sensible for British Rail to seek to increase prices where the business is not even covering its avoidable costs, making no contribution whatever to the infrastructure.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Freeman: No. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I have to answer 15 speeches and I intend to do so briefly in the time available. That is a courtesy to the House.

The 8 per cent. rate of return for new investment is modest compared with road haulage, shipping or aviation in the private sector.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West, in a powerful speech, asked a number of pertinent questions. He asked about contracting-out services by Railtrack, the infrastructure body. I give him a categoric assurance that when Railtrack, a nationalised industry, has been established—we hope that the infrastructure body will be established by April 1994—the Government will require it to contract out as many of its services as possible. That will be a powerful incentive to get the best value for money from national resources going into infrastructure.

Secondly, my hon. Friend referred to leasing and rolling stock procurement. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes next week to publish a consultation document on rolling stock procurement. We shall spell out carefully our plans for the development of a leasing industry so that the private sector can commence at an early stage—this year, we hope—the ordering of rolling stock and, ultimately, its leasing to private sector operators.

Mr. Morgan: Old or new?

Mr. Freeman: New rolling stock.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West asked about the ability of the private sector to commence the haulage of freight now. The first step is for us to publish yet another consultation document on the charging regime for not only freight but passenger services on the railway. My right hon. Friend hopes to publish that document in the next few weeks. It will enable the private sector to judge the viability and profitability of hauling freight, with private sector ownership of locos and wagons and private sector employment where profitable opportunities lie. I hope that in 1993, prior to privatisation, British Rail will take the opportunity of working with the private sector.

I see sitting on the Front Bench the previous Secretary of State for Transport, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind). My right hon. and learned Friend asked British Rail to encourage the private sector to haul freight now and not to wait until we have reformed the legislation. I confirm that we shall discuss with British Rail opportunities for the private sector in the immediate future.

Sir David Mitchell: Does that mean that there will be open access for the private sector freight operator to use British Rail track this year?

Mr. Freeman: There cannot be open access until Royal Assent has been given to legislation. Prior to Royal Assent, we need the co-operation of British Rail because it has a statutory right to provide the drivers of trains. I hope that British Rail will co-operate voluntarily in any passenger and freight opportunities prior to Royal Assent.

The hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) asked what were the benefits to passengers. During the debate, I noted 10 possible practical benefits to passengers, perhaps to commuters on Network SouthEast. It is not an exhaustive list, but I will quickly read out some examples of how a private sector franchised operator could improve the quality of passenger services.

The first is the interconnection of InterCity services and other rail services using buses or even aeroplanes. It would be a positive advantage for rail users, although, of course, one must be careful about monopoly legislation. The second example is an improvement not only in car parking facilities for users of commuter services but in the security of cars in the car parks.

Thirdly, there could be better passenger information systems. This is not merely a question of money but of attitude. It involves paying attention to passengers' interests. Fourthly, there could be the improvement of retailing opportunities at stations. Fifthly, there could be early provision of new equipment and the design of new rolling stock. Instead of engineers being responsible for designing what they think that the public needs—

Mr. Prescott: Who will do it?

Mr. Freeman: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman who will do it. The private sector owners of the rolling stock will be much more interested in designing stock to suit the passengers' needs.

Sixthly, there could be better marketing. There must be new opportunities for changes in the price structure—especially for off-peak travel—to encourage more traffic. Seventhly, there could be better on-board services and, eighthly, development at stations. There must be property development opportunities which will improve some of the provincial railway stations in particular.

Ninthly, there would be better staff incentives, giving rail staff the opportunity to own a share of the company, and there could be better performance pay arrangements. Finally——

Mr. Bayley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Freeman: No. On station services, more could be done at our major rail stations if the staff were interested in the passengers who use the rail stations rather than in the running of the trains.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Freeman: No. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me. I have only 14 minutes left.

The hon. Member for North Devon referred briefly to Tony Speller and to the Transport Act 1962 (Amendment) Act 1981, which he promoted. It is right that we should record the progress made in introducing experimental new rail services as a result of his initiative several years ago. I confirm that we shall preserve the Speller process, which brings great benefit to the rail services.

It is strange to see the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) sitting right at the back. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not resiling from the challenge of being a member of the Standing Committee. We look forward to his energetic and constant attendance in Committee—and to his sense of humour, which somewhat defeated him when he talked about rail investment. He implied that rail investment was being neglected. I looked at the record under the previous Labour Government. Between 1974 and 1979, at current prices——

Mr. Snape indicated dissent.

Mr. Freeman: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I shall give him the figures. From 1974 to 1979, in 1992-93 current prices, the average annual investment made by British Rail, with Government support, was £600 million. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned to the Select Committee only yesterday, next year—a difficult year—British Rail will invest £1 billion a year——

Mr. Wilson: Including the channel tunnel?

Mr. Freeman: Investment by British Rail in rolling stock and in improving the railway, whether it is in the channel tunnel or in commuter services, is rail investment.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Freeman: I shall come on to the other points raised by the hon. Gentleman. I will not give way.

I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Southport. He supported the concept of pilot franchises. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport hopes to announce the first tranche of franchises soon. During the course of 1993, that will enable negotiations with those who are interested in running the services. The first franchises cannot be let until there is Royal Assent to the Bill and until Railtrack is established. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support.

The hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell), who is in his place, referred specifically to rolling stock for the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority. I share his concern about that. I have arranged to meet the PTA at an early date to discuss whether the new leasing initiative announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with £150 million of leasing for rolling stock, will apply to the Leeds-Bradford railway. I understand that there are substantive negotiations on rolling stock and it may be appropriate to consider that stock under that facility.

On investment, order books for the past 44 years have reflected the fact that British Rail, being a nationalised industry, can look forward only a relatively short period. One of the great advantages of bringing in the private sector is that the time horizons for investment planning can be greater. That will be a great advantage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough asked a number of questions. He is a neighbouring Member of Parliament with long experience in transport. He asked about private management bids. I can confirm that British Rail will encourage and finance management buy-out bids. That is right. A price preference will be available when it comes to purchases of freight operations. We want the management of British Rail to play an active part.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough also asked about closure procedures. His argument is exactly right. The public sector will get better value for money for the £1 billion subsidy currently spent if the private sector operates existing railway services more efficiently. That must be right.

I should make it plain that the 12-year time horizon referred to during the debate applies to privatisation on the German model, which marches closely with the British Government's proposals. During this Parliament, we hope to make progress with transferring freight into the private sector and also to make significant progress with franchising. The 12-year time horizon is for the complete privatisation of the railway, as proposed by the Germans.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) talked about channel tunnel freight. I share his view that such freight, which should be running in about 12 months' time, should travel all the way by rail to the north-east and the north-west. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the terminal at Wilton and to the Government's belief that we must look forward into the 21st century for alternative routes around London for the transport of freight beyond London.

Mr. Morgan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Freeman: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me; I have nine minutes left and have yet to deal with some of the points raised by Members on the Opposition Front Bench.

My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden made a number of helpful points. I agree that the Opposition's approach has been extremely negative. We have heard nothing positive from the Opposition Front Bench. Labour Members argue that there is nothing wrong with British railways that a lot more money will not solve. That is the sum total of their argument. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support of the concept of Railtrack. He was right in talking about the Government's new initiative in providing capital grants for investment in infrastructure —the new department announced in the White Paper last summer. Moreover, the Chancellor's autumn statement provides the opportunity for the private sector to play a role in the financing of infrastructure as well as rolling stock.

On the subject of the franchising process, I confirm that we do not rule out the possibility of what we call vertical franchising. In certain cases, it may make a lot of sense for franchisees to control the signalling and the infrastructure —subject, or course, to the freeholding interest of Railtrack. If that makes sense, we are prepared to consider it.

In his short speech, the hon. Member for Meironnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) asked me 15 questions. I shall read the record and reply to all of them. The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to say that, whatever answer I gave, he would not change his mind, but some of his constituents may. The hon. Gentleman asked how the franchising authority would go about subsidising—what the criteria would be. I can confirm that when it comes to the letting of franchises and the holding of competitions, the franchising authority will start with the service provided by British Rail. It will know the cost of the subsidy provided to that line and will be looking for better value for money. If that cannot be obtained, the service will continue to be provided by British Rail. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the revenue subsidy regime will continue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford would go with three peers a-commuting. I look forward to hearing of my hon. Friend's experience with Lords Young, Ridley and Whitelaw on the 8 am from Dartford. Perhaps he will report back to us on that. The Government agree with my hon. Friend's view that private sector franchising will improve accountability. We shall have a leaner management, with shorter lines of reporting and a better service provided.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms. Jackson) is not in her place, so I will write to her.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh for his support. In his powerful speech, he drew upon the experience in Sweden, Japan and Germany, all of which helps support our proposals. My hon. Friend is right to talk about the successes of Foster Yeomen and the Royal Scot because those services currently provided by the private sector will expand under our provisions of open access.

In answer to the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley), I shall explain that the safety document published today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recommends consultation on the desirability of imposing controls of drivers' hours. We are prepared to listen to representations not only from the hon. Gentleman but from other people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch raised a number of matters which deserve comment. The Government will publish eight consultation documents. I am sure that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East and the whole House will welcome the consultation process. It is not a dogmatic imposition of policy; it is a dialogue that the Government will conduct with the industry and those who are interested in running services.

We have published four documents—on franchising, the British Transport police, safety and consumer representation—and we shall publish four other documents: on pensions, rolling stock procurement, access and charging, and the structure of the freight industry that will be transferred to the private sector. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch will appreciate, as I know that many of my other hon. and right hon. Friends will appreciate, the open way in which the consultation process will be conducted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch referred to the role of British Rail in bidding for services. I can confirm that when the franchising authority lets franchises for passenger services it will pay special attention to bids from management and staff. If a bid does not present good value for money, British Rail will continue to provide the service. I hope that that will provide some protection, certainly for the Exchequer, to ensure that the service provided is efficient.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch also referred to leasing and the public sector borrowing requirement. The £150 million is not counted in British Rail's public financing limit and, therefore, represents additional resources provided by the Government to British Rail.

In conclusion, I shall draw on three matters raised by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. I have tried to answer questions raised, rather than resort to cheap exchanges, as typified to a certain extent in the hon. Gentleman's speech. The hon. Gentleman cannot quite reconcile two different statements that he made. First, he said that private sector operators are not as good as the state.

Mr. Prescott: I did not say that.

Mr. Freeman: The hon. Gentleman did say that—I wrote it down very carefully. The hon. Gentleman can read the record in the morning. Later in his speech, he said that he was happy for private sector operators to provide public transport services.

The difference between the Labour party and the Conservative party is that we see the private sector working in partnership with the public sector to improve the quality of the rail services. We see the infrastructure being provided initially by the state, Railtrack, and financed by the state with an improvement in the mechanism for financing it. We also see the transfer of freight services to the private sector. All other modes of freight movement in the United Kingdom, whether by ship, air or road, are in the private sector and are not subsidised. There is no reason why rail freight should not be in the same position.

The privatisation of passenger services has the strong support of Conservative Members. To bring in the private sector to run certain passenger services will be a gradual process. The Government will continue to provide a substantial level of subsidy. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is dogmatic, although he charged the Government with being dogmatic. He is not prepared to see any private sector operation of a passenger train. By opposing the Government's proposals, he is against the concept of the private sector operating passenger services. He is also against the transfer of freight to the private sector.

The Government are determined to introduce legislation shortly which will command the overwhelming support of Conservative Members. The reforms in such legislation will provide a service which improves the quality and quantity of passenger services provided by British Rail at present. I commend the Government amendment to my colleagues on the Conservative Benches. I invite the House to throw out the Opposition motion and go, to use the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, "full steam ahead."

Resolved,

That this House recognises that progress has recently been made in improving British Rail's services; believes that further necessary improvements for rail users can best be achieved by creating the opportunity for introducing into the railways private sector ownership, management skills and capital; and therefore supports the Government's proposals as set out in the White Paper, "New Opportunities for the Railways".

Insurance Companies

10.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): I beg to move,

That the draft Insurance Companies (Amendment No. 2) Regulations 1992, which were laid before this House on 30th November, be approved.

The regulations which I have laid before the House are intended to fulfil our obligation to implement the second Council directive on life insurance, directive 90/619/EEC, of 8 November 1990.

The main purpose of the directive is to allow life insurance companies which have head offices in one member state to operate in another without having to set up a branch or agency in that state. This concept of selling insurance across member states' borders is known as the freedom-to-provide services. This freedom has existed for most non-life insurance for two years and was extended in November last year to companies providing cover for motor insurance risks. The regulations now before the House extend this freedom to life insurance, although not, for the time being at least, to long-term business falling within class VII, that is, pension fund management.

This freedom is, however, of limited effect. Only insurers of large non-life risks and life contracts which are taken out by the policyholder on his own initiative enjoy full freedom to provide services under the second directive. The directives allow the member state where the services are provided to continue to authorise the provision of other insurance into that member state. The Government did not take up this option in respect of non-life insurance provided into the United Kingdom, and do not propose doing so for life insurance. Thus we will continue to allow freedom to provide services into the United Kingdom.

The directive represents a midway stage between the first life directive, which in 1979 allowed life insurers for the first time to establish branches in other member states, and the third directives which were adopted last year and which complete the single market for insurance by introducing the single passport concept for all direct insurance. This single passport will mean that an insurer will be able to offer insurance anywhere in the European Community on the basis of a single authorisation which it receives in the state where its head office is situated. These third directives are due to be implemented by July 1994. I shall be laying measures later this year to implement the third directives. Tonight, however, we have to consider the implementation of the midway stage of the second life directive.

The directive is in two main parts. First, it amends and extends the first life directive by introducing provisions in four areas: first, rules governing the law applicable to direct life insurance contracts; secondly, procedures for the transfer of life insurance contracts from one insurer to another; thirdly, an extension of the supervisory authority's powers to take action against an insurer which infringes the laws of another member state; and, fourthly, the establishment of reserve powers to enable member states to act together to obtain effective access to non-EC markets.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Can the Minister give an assurance that he is satisfied as to the measures of protection for individual policyholders contained in the regulations?

Mr. Hamilton: As regards contracts which are written in the United Kingdom, there is no change in the protection that applies to policyholders. As regards United Kingdom residents who wish to take advantage of the opportunity to purchase contracts of insurance from other member states in the Community, they will be protected by such arrangements as are in force for those member states.

I reiterate that this is a halfway stage between the first and third directives. We are not going to be in a situation where there is complete freedom to provide services throughout the Community which we shall eventually enjoy, and to that extent the need to be authorised as an insurer in other member states will, to some extent, I suppose, provide the kind of protection which the hon. Gentleman might be envisaging.

Secondly, the directive introduces freedom for life insurers to provide services. The provisions include a requirement on the insurer to notify the supervisory authorities in the member state where his head office is situated of his intention to provide services in another state, to notify the authorities in the state where the services are to be provided, and, where the insurance is to be provided from a branch established in another member state, to notify the authorities of that state also.

The option to which I referred for member states to choose to make the provision of services in their territory conditional on the grant of an official authorisation from their authorities except where the policyholder takes the initiative to conclude a contract on a cross-border services basis includes also a power for the competent authorities in the member state where the services are provided to take action against companies which fail to comply with the laws applicable to them in that state, and if the authorities in the member state where that establishment is situated fail to do so it also provides for cooling-off rights for all individual life assurance policyholders contracting on a cross-border services basis, and the exchange of statistics on premium income receivable from services contracts.

I have placed in the Library and in the Vote Office detailed notes on the regulations. I hope that hon. Members will find those helpful to their understanding of their effect. I shall explain briefly how each regulation implements those principles, but I shall be happy to explain any point should hon. Members find that helpful.

Regulations 2 and 4 extend to long-term insurance business existing provisions in the Insurance Companies Act 1982 which were introduced by earlier regulations in respect of general insurance business. Regulation 2 extends the Secretary of State's powers of intervention, powers to withdraw a company's authorisation and powers to petition for the winding up of a company where that company has failed to comply with the laws of another member state if those laws implement the first or second life directives.

Regulation 4 extends the provisions relating to the provision of life insurance into the United Kingdom from another member state and thus fulfils one of the key purposes of the directive. Regulation 6 provides interpretation for certain phrases used in the Insurance Companies Act 1982, as amended by these regulations.

Regulation 3 implements article 6 of the directive, which lays down detailed arrangments for consultation with the authorities in other member states before approval can be given to a transfer of long-term insurance business from one authorised insurer to another. It also requires the authorities in the member state where the head office of the transferee company is situated to certify that the transferee will have the necessary margin of solvency after taking the transfer into account.

Regulations 5 and 9 implement the provisions of the directive which determine the law applicable to direct life insurance contracts. Regulation 5 amends the Insurance Companies Act by introducing the rules of article 4 of the directive and the Rome convention. Regulation 9 clarifies the relationship between article 4 and the Rome convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations.

Regulation 7 limits the notification requirements on EC insurers providing insurance into the United Kingdom, if that insurance is investment business within the definition in the Financial Services Act 1986. The FSA requires such insurers to notify the Securities and Investments Board of its intention to provide such services into the United Kingdom. However, all EC insurers providing any sort of life insurance services into the United Kingdom are required by the Insurance Companies Act to notify the Secretary of State. That regulation allows such insurers to be deemed to have complied with the FSA by submitting a single notification to the Secretary of State, who will in turn forward such notification to the SIB.

Regulation 8 completes the implementation of article 9 of the directive and article 4 of the motor services directive, which is directive 90/618/EEC, which for the most part were implemented by the Insurance Companies (Amendment) Regulations 1992, in the consideration of which I had the advantage of the presence of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) on 19 November last year.

That regulation ensures that the Secretary of State's or the Treasury's powers to take action under section 183 of the Financial Services Act against an insurer which is connected with a non-EEC country cannot be exercised in situations where the Council or Commission may issue a direction under the directives. In the view of the Government, the powers of the Council and Commission are exclusive. A similar provision in respect of banking was made last month in the Banking Co-ordination (Second Council Directive) Regulations 1992.

Regulations 10 and 11 introduce a statistical requirement on life insurers to provide details of premium income receivable from their services business broken down into each class of business in each member state in which the services have been provided. Regulation 11 limits the provision of statistics to cover only that business provided from the time the regulations come into force —that is, after 20 May this year—thus ensuring that the requirement is not retrospective.

The schedule to the regulations provides the form in which this information should be supplied.

These regulations do not implement the cooling-off provisions of article 15, to which I referred earlier. This article was amended by article 30 of the third life directive, which was adopted on 10 November last year. I intend, in due course—shortly, I hope—to lay separate regulations to implement the cancellation provisions of both directives. These regulations would come into force on the same day—20 May—as the regulations we are discussing now.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): This means that we shall end up with two different cooling-off periods —one, of 10 days, for policies within the Community, and another, of 14 days, for those involving countries outside. Does the Minister agree that this will be rather confusing?

Mr. Hamilton: I admit that it is less than satisfactory. As the Church of England might say, it falls short of the ideal. The difficulty is caused by the problem of vires under European Community legislation, inasmuch as we can implement by order the provisions of the directive only insofar as it is required to fulfil the purposes of the directive with regard to the provision of services entirely within the European Community. As regards third countries, it is not possible for us to include provisions to harmonise the legislation by order. We should have to introduce primary legislation to do that.

In view of the fact that the regime under these directives will subsist for only a relatively short period—12 months or so—it does not seem to us to pose too great a risk, although I have to admit that if we had had a completely free hand in the matter we might have acted differently. However, I see no prospect of our being able to implement a common regime by means of primary legislation in the meantime. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) knows, we have much pressing business to do in the remainder of this Session.

The Government attach high priority to the completion of the single market in insurance. The second directive and the regulations that we are discussing tonight represent a small but useful step. I therefore look forward to bringing before the House later this year regulations to implement the third directives, which, as I have said, will grant the single passport to European Community insurers and make the single market a reality.

On that basis, I commend the regulations to the House.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful to the Minister for taking us through the regulations and explaining the great entanglements involved in dealing with European Communities legislation. We can see that our signing the Single European Act, with the single market coming into force on 1 January, permeates all the legislation that goes through this House and produces entanglements such as the Minister has described. We have here a clear example. The regulations with which we are dealing impinge upon and modify the Insurance Companies Act 1982, the Financial Services Act 1986, the Insurance Companies (Amendment) Regulations 1992—not to mention the Contracts (Applicable Law) Act 1990.

Today I have noticed a curious paradox. On one hand, the Prime Minister called for more deregulation, whereas later in the day we are debating more, rather than less, regulation. While the Government consistently call for more deregulation, anyone in the business of protecting the consumer—it is the duty of the Department of Trade and Industry to supervise the insurance industry—must look for regulations such as we are debating tonight.

Regulation or not, it can hardly be said that the Government have been particularly successful in maintaining the pre-eminence of our insurance industry as an international leader at the heart of the European Communities. In 1990 the insurance sector's net foreign earnings were £2·2 billion—below its 1983 level, and well short of the peak of £4·9 billion attained in 1986. An analysis of London's actual share of international insurance business suggests a decline from 50 per cent. in 1976 to 25 per cent. now. Specialist insurance, a field in which London was formerly an international leader, has also registered a decline. In total, funds such as pension and life assurance under portfolio management in the United Kingdom fell some way short of the equivalent totals managed in Tokyo and New York.

The insurance industry has not provided a reassuring face for the British public. Throughout the country there is genuine concern about increased premiums and the sheer inability to get insurance cover. I—and, I am sure, many hon. Members—have constituents who cannot get insurance cover for items such as rented flats, youth clubs and community centres or even for businesses whose leases are running out and will not be renewed because of the absence of insurance cover.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): The hon. Gentleman is aware of my interest as a member of Lloyd's. One of the reasons for British insurance not being so successful as it should is that the tax regimes of successive Governments have made it impossible for British insurance companies and, indeed, Lloyd's to build up adequate reserves in the way that all our overseas insurance competitors have done. Will the Opposition support tax measures which will make such reserves possible?

Mr. Bell: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's interest in Lloyd's and in insurance in general. One of the side issues of the directive will be taxation and whether there should be support for the view that policyholders' funds relating to services business written by United Kingdom insurers should not be taxed as they build up, so that United Kingdom insurers can compete on an equal footing with insurers in other countries. The debate has consequences for taxation. I shall deal with the matter of Lloyd's later in my speech.

The uncertainty and insecurity that the Governments of the noble Lady Thatcher liked to strew around the country as her own particular stardust have now affected the insurance industry—those who are insured and those who do the insuring. Equally important is the effect on those who invest their lives in their work for insurance companies. Local authorities encountered difficulties following the sudden withdrawal from the insurance market of MMI. Those difficulties have been lessened by its acquisition by the Zurich Insurance Company and by the hiving off of other assets of MMI. Those difficulties arose because MMI diversified into property, finance and computing and moved from its traditional base of insuring local authorities.

Local authorities throughout the country must have adequate insurance cover at reasonable premiums to avoid additional charges upon their council tax payers—especially at this time of Government-induced stringency. With the threat of council tax capping hanging over them, reasonable premiums are even more important. I am grateful to the Minister for his courtesy to me and my hon. Friends when we met him to discuss the future of MMI and the uncertainties faced by its staff. We are hopeful that the Zurich Insurance Company will understand that its future success will be founded on the kind of co-operation between management and workers that existed at MMI.

Insurance companies throughout Europe which will be covered by the directive employ nearly 790,000 people. Life assurance accounts for about 44 per cent. of premiums. We should all encourage that industry.

[Mr. Bell]

In this country, the Confederation of Insurance Trade Unions alone represents more than 100,000 insurance staff.

It is ironic that the Government use the cloak of European Council directives to amend our internal legislation, notably the Lloyd's Act 1982 and the Insurance Companies Act 1982. That means that the Secretary of State, in accordance with regulation 2 of the order to which the Minister referred, now has powers of intervention over Lloyd's underwriters when they fail to satisfy obligations laid down in Community legislation.

It is a significant turn of events whereby the House is called upon to modify domestic legislation through the instigation of a European directive rather than a Bill through the House, especially on such an important matter as Lloyd's underwriters. The Minister was honest enough to say that the kind of primary legislation that we would need to put the various Community directives into order is not likely to happen, due to pressure on time. Therefore, we welcome this short debate tonight which allows us to air some of the matters that we have wanted to debate which otherwise would be excluded.

We have seen the untoward publicity that Lloyd's of London has received of late, the allegations of widespread insider dealing, financial mismanagement, the steps that Lloyd's has taken to put its house in order, the appointment of a new chief executive and chairman—both of whom I wish well in their work—the actions of the so-called burnt names and the difficulties with certain syndicates. We are looking closely at the question of self-regulation and statutory regulation. We are even considering in the long term whether the Lloyd's Act should be repealed.

On the complex question of taxation that the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) raised, while the Opposition closely scrutinise the regulation of Lloyd's, we are anxious to ensure that the Lloyd's market is successful not only in the City of London but within the framework of the EC and on the global stage.

The regulations touch on solvency margins. Will the Secretary of State tell the House what the solvency margins referred to in the directive and the regulations are? What is the excess of assets over liabilities within the EC? Is the minimum margin permitted approximately 17 per cent. of premiums, but is the benchmark throughout Europe the 30 per cent. margin that the Department of Trade and Industry thinks is the more appropriate margin?

We can also see from the regulations that there has to be full reciprocity throughout the Community in that regulation 8 precludes the issue of a notice in relation to a subsidiary insurance company where the only ground for the issue is the failure of a third country to allow insurance companies in the United Kingdom to carry on direct insurance business on an equal basis.

Regulation 8 also highlights the intertwining of insurance business throughout the European Community, which the Minister mentioned when he referred to the variety of regulations that we shall have to debate and discuss. We can also see the application of private international law in the regulations—that is to say, a court in this country looking into another's jurisdiction and satisfying itself that specified conditions in that member state are met.

We see, too, that under Community legislation not only must the Secretary of State satisfy himself as to the obligations of an insurance company under our own United Kingdom law, but he may also act to satisfy an obligation under the law of another member state. The Chinese walls between member states become ever thinner in what is clearly a drive to harmonisation and, it is hoped, consumer protection.

We see under regulation 10 how the Department of Trade and Industry maintains its supervisory status—its watchdog status—by requiring establishments to prepare additional information to be submitted to the Secretary of State in respect of operations, namely, in the case of gross premiums.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) and the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to the cooling-off period. As I understand it, the regulations introduce a mandatory cooling-off period of between 14 and 30 days for all cross-border business, and that is extended to establishment business by the life framework directive. As the Minister has said, it is proposed to implement those provisions at the same time by insurance companies' cancellation regulations and he issued a consultation document last year. There may be some anomalies and paradoxes, but the 14 to 30-day cooling off period will be of assistance to those who wish to take out insurance in another country in accordance with the framework of the directive.

The Minister referred to a Committee sitting which took place on 19 November. Over a period, the Committee has observed the way in which EC financial directives are affecting the City's relation to Europe—and the insurance industry is at the centre of the City. Opposition Members believe that, while the City may be a leading player in the world financial markets, it is no longer the sole leading player.

We consider the City to be a leading financial centre, which will be working within the Single European Act—under a variety of directives, such as the one that we are debating tonight—to ensure that the single market includes a basic harmonisation of the rules and operations of financial intermediaries and markets. Our party will look carefully at the way in which we handle regulation in the City. We shall consider whether that regulation should be self-induced or independently induced; and whether there should be statutory regulation, along the lines of the Securities and Exchange Commission, or whether there is another form of regulation in harmony with the European legislation and directives that we can enact. We shall also consider the fact that we have two life investor protection statutes and two prudential supervisors for the life assurance industry.

The strategy that we shall work out will be one which links the City to Europe through directives such as this, and which links the City to industry. It will ensure that insurance industries are able to satisfy the home market with appropriate premiums at reasonable rates, which are within the reach of those who wish to insure, while at the same time playing a full part in that sector of the globalised economy which is Europe.

The insurance industry is a massive employer: some 490,000 people are employed in it throughout Europe. It is a creator of work, which we should encourage as we will encourage the City of London as a whole, but we should do that within a framework which not only protects the consumer and those who work in the industry, but gives the City a reputation for health, wealth and encouraging people throughout the country.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): People in the insurance industry have told me how much they appreciate the co-operation that has been shown by the Department of Trade and Industry—not only in regard to the specific issues in the regulations, but in regard to their representations to the Treasury about taxation. Although this is only an interim measure, it will assist greatly in the completion of the single market, which is so important to the UK insurance industry.

One or two matters, however, present problems. One, which was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), is the difference in the cooling-off period. As I understand it, the difference will arise in respect of policies provided by UK insurers for non-EC policyholders and the UK branches of non-EC insurers for UK policyholders. Those are the policies for which primary legislation would be required and which at present involve the anomaly of a 10-day cooling-off period rather than the 14-day period that is proposed.

In his reply to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, my hon. Friend the Minister suggested that the anomaly would disappear in a year's time—presumably when the life framework directive comes into force in July 1994. It would be helpful if he could confirm that that is so and tell us under what mechanism UK statute law will be changed through implementation of that directive.

Another matter that is still giving rise to concern is a new one concerning taxation. There has been no problem with the overseas branches of UK insurers being able to conduct business on the same footing as companies in the countries concerned. The problem is that the directive will permit United Kingdom life offices to sell direct to people who are resident in other EC countries. As I understand our present tax system, those policies would be subject to the principle of United Kingdom taxation, whereby the policyholder's funds are taxed as they build up. United Kingdom insurers selling across border would therefore be at a competitive disadvantage with other EC insurers who may be selling domestically or across borders. I am sure that that is not what the Government intend. Has my hon. Friend the Minister made representations to the Treasury on that matter and can we look forward to the Government addressing the problem?

I repeat my welcome for this measure and for the constructive approach of the Department to the problems.

10.45 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Although the regulation is, as the Minister said, a temporary measure, it is nevertheless important for the workings of an important industry that is a major employer, especially outside London. One thinks of cities such as Norwich, Bristol and Edinburgh, where the insurance industry is a major employer. The Minister has the headquarters of Refuge, which is an important employer around the country, on the edge of his constituency. It is doubly important, therefore, that we ensure that the regulations are as accurate and satisfactory as possible.

I mentioned the cooling-off period, about which questions were well put by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), so I shall not add to what I said.

Mention has been made of the tax implications of the regulations and the belief of British insurance companies that they will be at a competitive disadvantage in trying to attract business from customers in the face of competition from businesses based elsewhere in Europe whose taxation system does not operate in the same way as ours but treats earnings on a basis that allows the expenses of getting the business to be reckoned against income at the beginning and which pays more regard to the way in which income arises and the investment that follows insurance business. The Government contend that other aspects of company taxation in Britain may help to compensate for that, but the significant difference in the way in which insurance operations are taxed will have to be taken into account.

Another factor that will loom large if we ever have a single currency will be divergence and fluctuation in the United Kingdom exchange rate in relation to other European countries. This is an uncomfortable matter for the Minister, who, when he pointed to the existence of legislation that is filling our parliamentary timetable, could not mention his own traditional hostility to much of that legislation now that he has to vote for it. People taking out insurance policies in the future will have to have regard to exchange rate fluctuations and will have to make calculations about what they think will happen to their stream of income from, for example, a policy in retirement if they do not know what the relative strength of the currencies will be and if those currencies are not pegged together. Most parts of business and industry are well aware of the importance of a single currency to a single market, not least in financial services.

There is another area where the implementation of this regulation will present new problems for the insurance industry that are not so much of the Government's making but more of the industry's making. British companies will have to compete in a market that is not so dominated by tying as has latterly become the practice in the British insurance industry. It has suited large parts of the British industry and most of the large financial institutions to develop tying arrangements under which the decision to take out a mortgage commits the subsequent decision about which company will be used for endowment insurance policies or other insurance policies. That is not the pattern throughout Europe, where insurance brokers play a large role in a number of countries. The British insurance industry may have to look once again to its traditional ways of seeking business when it cannot rely on such tying arrangements.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) mentioned some of the problems faced by customers who find gaps in insurance provision which may lead them to look to overseas companies. I constantly come across such problems, but the other day I heard of a new one. Someone in my constituency was seeking to let his home, but found that his existing building society and insurer would not accept his current insurance for any tenant whose rent was paid by the Department of Social Security. He applied to other insurance companies and found that they too would not accept insurance for property if the tenant's rent was paid by the DSS. That is another restraint on the provision of rented housing for those who need it, but in this case one arising from the insurance industry.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I am surprised by what the right hon. Gentleman said about insurance, tenants and the DSS. Is he convinced that it is legal to prevent DSS tenants from renting a house in such circumstances?

Mr. Beith: I do not think that it could possibly be illegal. An insurance company is merely placing conditions on the letting of a property on which there is a mortgage. Many different conditions can be imposed, including the approval of a tenancy. If it becomes a blanket condition that no one whose rent is paid by the DSS can be a tenant, it will be extremely damaging although not illegal. It would be a severe restraint and something would have to be done about it.

The example that I gave is another reason why there should be more competition in the insurance market. British consumers should have the opportunity to compare British products with those of other countries and I want our insurance companies to operate successfully and obtain business in the rest of Europe, thereby bringing employment to this country.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I suspect that this is an issue on which there is much agreement across the House. I also welcome the regulations in principle, but I have two concerns one of which has been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). One is a minor concern and the other major, and I should be grateful if the Minister could reassure me on both of them.

My minor concern is that the Minister explained that under the directive member states will be granted the option of insisting that all life contracts which are not sold as a result of the initiative of the assured remain subject to authorisation and that we had decided not to take advantage of that option although it existed. The assumption is that others will take advantage of it. Clearly there is a lack of reciprocity inherent in such a situation. At first sight, it seems to go against the purpose of a single market. I should be grateful for the Minister's assurance that, in practice, it is not a basis on which the export channel from this country will be constricted whereas the import channel will not.

My major concern involves tax but is not the point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). He spoke about the different tax treatment of insurance provisioning here and in other Community countries. It is a very important point, with which I agree. My major concern, however, is the one mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West.

In this country, the tradition has always been that life insurance funds are subject to tax as they accumulate and not subject to tax in the hands of the beneficiary when payment is finally made to him. On the continent, the reverse generally applies. The funds roll up free of tax—they are, in effect, gross funds, like pension funds in this country—and the beneficiary is taxed when he receives payment. It follows that if in this country a fund is subject to tax as it builds up, and if the beneficiary is the resident of another Community state, he will be charged by his own tax authorities in the country in which he is resident tax on the amounts accruing from the policy when he receives it, and he gets the worst of all possible worlds.

It seems at first sight—and, I fear, probably at second and third sight as well—that, if that is the case, the tax handicap carried by life insurance policies written in this country will be such that no sane man or woman on the continent will purchase one. It must be blindingly obvious to the whole House that all the tremendous bureaucratic and ministerial effort—I am sure that it was very gallant and talented effort—that went into the negotiation and drafting of the directive will have been completely wasted in terms of the interests of this country or of our insurance industry if such a tax handicap is carried by any policies written in this country as we enter the single market in life insurance.

I know that it will be possible for life insurance companies based in this country to sell policies through their subsidiaries in other Community countries and that they will thereby be able to escape from that tax charge. However, the whole purpose of the directive was supposedly to make progress on the regime we have had since 1979 under which it has been possible for British life insurance companies to set up subsidiaries in the Community and to sell life insurance policies from there. My point is fundamental to the utility for this country in practice of the new arrangements that are represented by the directive. I look forward with great interest to what the Minister will say. I am sure that my hon. Friend will say that any remedy to the problem that——

Mr. Corbyn: He is not listening.

Mr. Davies: He probably knows the answer already and we shall get it in due time.

Mr. Corbyn: He is not listening.

Mr. Davies: So that the hon. Gentleman——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We cannot have a sub-conversation going on.

Mr. Davies: So that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) can fully appreciate the weightiness of the ministerial answer when he hears it, it may be a good idea for me to establish the essential question with which my hon. Friend will deal.

Mr. Corbyn: I was only trying to assist, Madam Deputy Speaker, and to ensure that the Minister understood the question. I had the distinct impression that the Minister was not giving the slightest attention to the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies).

Mr. Davies: The Minister has no doubt grasped my point, and I am sure that we shall hear an answer. I hope that it will be a reassuring answer because much of the industrial interest in the directive turns on the question of tax.

I also share the concerns of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) about the prospects of a single currency emerging in the European Community in terms of our ability to exploit the single market in financial services. We could argue all night—we may do so tomorrow—about the merits of a single currency or about the prospects of such a phenomenon arising. If it does come about by the end of the century or in any other timetable that a large part of the continent adopts a single currency, that will create a major problem for any British insurance company that seeks to sell life insurance products or other financial services, such as unit trusts, on the continent.

A life insurance policy is something that people will always want to buy denominated in their own currencies. It is a fundamental asset for any individual who holds it. No one would seriously wish to incur a foreign exchange risk for such a fundamental asset. It follows that if one wants to sell a life insurance policy in France or in Germany and those countries have at the time a single currency, one will have to offer a live insurance policy denominated in that currency. To be able to do that, one will have to invest the premiums in assets largely denominated in that currency.

That means that people will not be able to cross-sell the products that they have in this country in the single market. There will have to be different products managed, packaged and marketed in different ways. They will be very different products. Therefore, in the single market, British life insurance companies will not be able to benefit from their very good management record by citing the returns that they have been able to make for their clients and beneficiaries over the years. They will not be able to point to what a particular policy has done over the past 20 or 25 years. Rationally or not, life insurance products have to be sold on historic record and our companies will not be able to use that record because it will relate to a sterling product.

One of the fundamental premises on the basis of which we entered the single market was that there are some sectors in which we in Britain have an inherent competitive advantage, and many of us for a long time believed that financial services, insurance products and life insurance were among those sectors. That will not be the case, however, if a single currency emerges in the single market and we are not part of it.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I have no wish to detain the House at this late hour, but there are so few opportunities for us to speak on the insurance industry that I felt it appropriate to make one or two comments. Essentially, my comments are directed at the Minister, because I want to give him some encouragement. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is absolutely right and, like him, I want to place on record the fact that the Minister's efforts on behalf of the United Kingdom insurance industry are much appreciated.

Although, as the Minister said, the directive is an important, if small, step on the road towards the single market, we should not delude ourselves into thinking that the single market—particularly in the life assurance sector—will mushroom overnight. A great deal of effort will be required on the part of United Kingdom life assurers and life insurance companies if they are to exploit that market and I suspect that it will be five to 10 years before we see much development of it.

There are clear cultural and structural differences between the insurance industry in the United Kingdom and that on the continent, although I often speak on behalf of the all-party group—which, as the Minister knows, is blossoming at the moment—and I hear encouraging noises to the effect that the markets in Spain and Italy look particularly attractive.

Will the Minister please give our life assurers every possible encouragement to be innovative, flexible and entrepreneurial? The market creates an opportunity for us to expand into the European dimension in a sector in which Britain has great traditions, great expertise and a great deal to offer. I sense, however, that those who work in the industry sometimes need a little encouragement to put their entrepreneurial hat on and be as innovative as their forebears were 100 or 200 years ago, when the United Kingdom life assurance industry and the great mutual funds—I shall not advertise by mentioning any of them, but I think that the House will know those to which I refer—were born. The industry has provided a great service to United Kingdom policyholders and can provide a similar service to policyholders on the continent.

When the Minister is persuaded to try to argue with the Treasury that we want a level playing field as regards tax—I entirely endorse and agree with what has been said—he should remind the life assurers that, on premium rates, we have an enormous competitive advantage which makes some of the tax problems shrink into insignificance.

That brings me to my third point. One of the reasons why the United Kingdom has such a competitive industry is that we have a strong independent intermediary sector. It is that sector that has provided the competitive market in life assurance in the United Kingdom which will provide the springboard for a competitive market in Europe and every prospect for United Kingdom life assurers to take advantage of the single market.

There is one caveat, however. We must ensure that in the next year or 18 months we get right the United Kingdom regulatory framework for insurance intermediaries, whether in the financial services sector or in the general insurance sector. I am sure that hon. Members will not need much imagination to recognise that there would have been considerable difficulty in and damage to the United Kingdom insurance industry if the Financial Services Act 1986—often much maligned—which brought to the surface a number of scandals and the fraudulent behaviour of disreputable firms, had involved European policyholders and not just those in the United Kingdom. I want us to look to the longer term, the next five, seven or 10 years, and recognise that we will be able to launch ourselves confidently in Europe and secure a much bigger market for the United Kingdom insurance industry if we get our regulatory framework right and ensure that those who work in the industry are properly regulated and are, above all, fit and proper to be in the industry.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I am grateful to all hon. Members, on both sides of the House, for their helpful speeches on the regulations. As I said earlier, the second life directive represents a small but useful step towards completion of a single market in insurance. The directive is a small step for the United Kingdom because we already have a more open market than that provided by it. Of course, the directive represents a bigger step for other member states.

The directive is useful because it established the principle of single-country supervision for certain insurance contracts—those entered into by the policy holder on his own initiative. The principle of single-country supervision became the foundation stone for the much more significant third directive which was agreed last year.

[Mr. Neil Hamilton]

I have no difficulty whatever in agreeing with the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and my hon. Friends the Members for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) and others who lauded the achievements of the British insurance industry. As a result of the flexibility which we have traditionally exhibited, the British insurance industry stands to gain considerably from the increased freedom which will come from the implementation of the third directive next year.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hamilton: I am sorry if I omitted the hon. Gentleman from my litany of financial experts.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister comment on the matter raised by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) about insurance companies refusing to allow Department of Social Security claimants to become tenants in houses in which they have an insurance interest? Is the Minister aware that the hon. Members for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) and for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) have declared interests, one in the insurance industry and the other as a merchant banker? Clearly they were speaking on behalf of those interests in the general sense of the industry.

Mr. Hamilton: I know that the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is a considerable disadvantage to know what one is talking about when one speaks in a debate. However, we could not accuse him of that when he speaks on such complex matters, so I acquit him of any knowledge or understanding as a result of experience. I hope that he is pleased by the accolade which I have just given him.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hamilton: I have made one mistake, and that should probably be sufficient. I will respond to the matter raised by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as I will attempt to deal with all of the matters raised by hon. Members in the debate.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) brings great expertise to our debates. I welcome him to the Opposition Front Bench because it is worth listening to him. He raised a number of matters which were referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and others, and I hope to respond to them.

I shall start with the matter of taxation. I know that representations have been made by the industry and others about the different approach to taxation which has been adopted in respect of the insurance industry in the United Kingdom. It is always possible to pick out the tax advantages and disadvantages in the various member states of the Community. To believe that we will ever harmonise the tax regimes of the different Community member states so that there is no difference between the tax systems is fantasy. However, the Government have said that they will consider action if clear evidence shows that United Kingdom insurers are worse off, overall, than their EC counterparts. In particular, we must consider the lower tax rates in the United Kingdom.

I do not know how many of my hon. Friends or how many Opposition Members noticed my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer lurking behind the Chair at the beginning of the debate. He is enjoying a period of purdah in the Chamber. I am therefore limited in what I can say as I cannot anticipate his Budget. However, the competitive position of United Kingdom insurers as opposed to those in the rest of the European Community is currently being examined.

Hon. Members may have no doubt that the Department of Trade and Industry sees it as its role to be the advocate for British industry and commerce and, if arguments are put to us that are relevant to the policies of other Departments, we will ensure that they receive a fair hearing.

Mr. Bell: In response to a point raised by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the Minister referred to the number of directives that are required. One of the difficulties of the Minister and of the House is the division of responsibility between the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry. However, as the DTI has a supervisory role over insurance, we would welcome confirmation from the Minister that there will be the closest co-operation between the two Departments.

Mr. Hamilton: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the Government are indivisible. We are indistinguishable from one another in all respects and wholly united on all policies at any one time. I confirm that the position is as the hon. Member for Middlesbrough would hope it to be. I guarantee that the representations that he and other hon. Members have made in respect of complex taxation issues will certainly be considered very carefully.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the Minister for responding to me, but I now have a longer intervention to make on two points. The first point relates to the comments made by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed after my reflections and the second to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) about those who rent premises or apartments for which the Department of Social Security is paying board and lodging.

In respect of the second point, insurance companies are now refusing to insure landlords in respect of such properties. As a result, landlords are reluctant to rent property to those individuals. It is not a question of it being illegal to rent the property. However, landlords will be worried if there is no proper insurance on such flats. That is a cause for concern on the Opposition Benches, and that point must be examined.

Will the Minister also note the intervention of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who made a significant contribution in respect of regulation? We have certain views about regulation. In respect of the City and the industry, it is a matter of "physician heal thyself." The industry must note the comments made in this place and elsewhere about the need for clear regulation which works in relation to those who insure with insurance companies and which gives confidence to the outside world. I should like the Minister to address those specific points.

Mr. Hamilton: On the latter point, as the deregulation Minister I am well aware of the costs that can be imposed by laws that we pass which are not clear or effective in achieving the objectives that we set when we draft legislation. I assure the hon. Member for Middlesbrough that we attach considerable importance to that matter.

With regard to the alleged lack of insurance cover for properties in multiple occupation, it is not simply a question of DSS claimants. As my correspondence with hon. Members shows, the problem can also be found in other areas.

This is first and foremost a commercial matter for the companies. My principal responsibility as the insurance regulator is to protect the interests of policyholders. I have to ensure that insurance companies manage their business in such a way as to satisfy the prudential requirements of the insurance companies legislation. It would be quite wrong for us to seek to lean upon companies in the carrying out of their day-to-day commercial business to try to slant things in favour of one class of policyholder rather than another, particularly if the consequence of that were to be to expose them to an excessive risk, which would be paid for by other policyholders. I am not in a position to second-guess insurance companies in this respect.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough and others will know from their correspondence with me on this and similar topics that it is not the case that no cover whatever can be obtained in the market, although I admit that fewer and fewer companies are prepared to take the risk which they believe to be associated with that kind of occupation. It is not a question of discriminating against people because they happen to be social security claimants; it is just that a multiple occupation property presents higher risks for insurance companies. There is an increased risk of fire and various other characteristics which make it a less acceptable risk for the companies. Consequently, if insurance can be obtained, inevitably the premiums will reflect that risk.

It would be wrong for the Government, in my view, to seek to intervene in the commercial contracts of insurance companies in that way. If we do it for one class of insurer, we have to do it for all classes, and in that way madness lies.

Mr. Beith: I remind the Minister that this problem is not confined to multi-occupation. In the case that I mentioned to him, it was a straightforward letting of a single house to a single family, and it seems a little odd to the outside world that those people whose rents the Government are paying can be regarded by the industry as a bad risk.

Mr. Hamilton: It is a mistake for the hon. Gentleman to say that the industry regards it as a bad risk, because the industry does not speak with a common voice. There is competition in the insurance market; insurance is a highly competitive business. I believe that if, through the intermediaries about which my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) spoke so eloquently, as he always does—he knows what he is talking about, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman appreciates—the cover can be obtained.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough asked me some technical questions. I shall have to crave his indulgence, if he will excuse me for using such an elitist and gentlemanly term in respect of him, and carry on to deal with some more serious points which he and others have raised in the debate.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough raised some questions, to which the answers are complex, about solvency margins. I know that this is an issue which has excited some interest and comment in recent months. I have seen criticism of both the slimness of the minimum margin for general business and the inability of the factors included in the margin calculation to reflect all the risks to which an insurance company is exposed. Supervisors generally expect companies to maintain a margin of at least double the minimum and to examine a wide range of other parameters—for example, type of business, profitability, the level of reserving, quality of management and systems—in forming their view on the financial strength of companies. So, important as the solvency margin is, it is not the whole story.

The answer to the specific questions which the hon. Gentleman asked me is contained in the first life directive, in articles 18 to 20. It would probably confuse the House as much as I am confused myself if I were to go into too much detail on that, but he will find all the details on the questions which he asked in those articles. If he still has some specific doubts or questions that he wishes me to answer, I will of course be more than willing to put on record, by means of a written reply, the facts that he requires. I answered a question from his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), which said precisely what I have just said about the statutory minimum solvency margin insofar as there are Community obligations stemming from the first insurance directives in respect of non-life insurance, 1973, and of life insurance, 1979.

The Commissioners have undertaken to review and report on the need for further harmonisation of the solvency margin by July 1997 at the latest, so these are matters which will be under active consideration and the hon. Gentleman will be able to contribute to the debate on that. I would welcome his active co-operation. We will certainly bear in mind the implications of the questions that the hon. Gentleman raised.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the situation as regards Municipal Mutual Insurance. I was grateful for the opportunity to meet him, his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle), representatives of MSF and others who were concerend about the employment implications of the unfortunate events surrounding MMI. I share with him the joy at what appears to be in prospect, the rescue of MMI by Zurich Insurance, and, although contracts have not yet been signed, we very much hope that all the loose ends will shortly be tied up. I bore in mind very much the arguments that the hon. Member raised with me in the Department, and although, as I indicated then and earlier in the course of this speech, my principal concern must be the interests of policyholders, as I am a prudential supervisor in respect of them, I do not depreciate the importance of the employment-related issues that he has raised, and I will certainly draw attention once more to the points that he has made in this debate to the Zurich Insurance Company.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates the difficulty that the DTI always encounters in circumstances such as those surrounding MMI, whether to use our powers to cease to authorise business or to put it into run-off, effectively to reduce the value of the assets of the company; and there are circumstances in which immediate action is required in the interests of policyholders. In other circumstances, if one can preserve the company in being as a going concern, the assets that can be realised in the interests of the policyholders can be augmented and therefore the interests of policyholders can be advanced. Happily, this is one of the cases in which there appears to be such a consequence, and that is to be applauded. I hope that as a result the solvency of MMI, in effect, will be restored.

We have had a wide-ranging debate which in some respects has gone beyond the details of the regulations, but that is no bad thing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale pointed out, there are few opportunities for us to exhibit a serious interest in debating insurance matters, and I am glad to have had this opportunity of doing so. The Government attach considerable importance to a successful insurance industry in this country. I pay tribute to the ability of our insurance industry to compete successfully in the world and, in particular, in the single market in insurance which will shortly be upon us. I am sure that the flexibility which the relatively free market that we in this country have traditionally enjoyed will be rewarded by an increasing share of European business.

I take, in particular, the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding about reciprocity in the authorisation of business within the Community. He asked me whether it was not an unlevel playing field, that we did not propose to authorise or require authorisation for business sold into this country from other member States of the Community, and whether it would be reciprocated elsewhere.

So far as I am aware, only the Netherlands intends, like us, not to require the authorisation of business sold into its own country. We do not yet know for certain what is to happen with other member states, and the hon. Gentleman will know that the second directive is a temporary state of affairs. It will not be in force for very long before the third directive supervenes and takes over, after which there will be no need for authorisation for the inward sale of business. So I suppose it is true to some extent that in all probability we shall have a more liberal regime than some of our Community partners, but I do not think that we should regard that as a weakness. Ultimately, as the experience of the years shows, a protectionist attitude weakens one's industry, makes it less able to respond flexibly to the requirements of the market and therefore, when the restrictions are reduced or removed, the consequence is that one is not as strong as those who have had to compete in rather more rigorous selling conditions.

I have every confidence in the British insurance industry being able to compete successfully in the regime which will shortly be inaugurated to give us a single market in insurance in the Community. We attach considerable importance to the completion of the single market in insurance, and I know that the directives which we are debating tonight and which we shall debate in due course have the support of the insurance industry and consumer organisations.

I welcome the opportunity to put these points on record and welcome the contributions which have been made by my hon. Friends and Opposition Members. I therefore commend——

Mr. Butterfill: May I press my hon. Friend on the point of harmonisation of the cooling-off period? He indicated earlier that there was some mechanism whereby that would be achieved by 1994. Would he deal with that?

Mr. Hamilton: I apologise to my hon. Friend for forgetting to deal with that point. In response to the earlier intervention of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, I pointed out that we cannot remove the difference in treatment by means of orders because the European Communities Act does not allow us to do that. Section 2(2) of the Act gives us the vires to implement our obligations by secondary legislation only in respect of insurance business within the Community. Outside the Community we require primary legislation to achieve that effect. I hope that it will be possible at the time we implement the third directive to complement that by means of primary legislation in order to remove this anomaly.

That depends, of course, upon the good will of my hon. Friends the business managers, by whom I am surrounded, and who are glaring at me and looking at the clock. I cannot guarantee to my hon. Friend that we shall be able to align them in terms of time because that will take place in a different Session, but I am well aware that this is an unsatisfactory situation and we shall seek to correct it at the earliest opportunity. I hope that I have been able to satisfy my hon. Friend.

I commend the regulations to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Insurance Companies (Amendment No. 2) Regulations 1992, which were laid before this House on 30 November, be approved.

PETITION

Asylum Seekers

11.29 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I have the pleasure of presenting a petition to the House which has been circulated widely throughout the country concerning the passage of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill which completed its Third Reading in the House yesterday and is now on its way through the House of Lords. I will read the petition:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The humble petition of the people of the United Kingdom sheweth:

That we wish to register strong protest at the Government's proposals to restrict the rights of asylum-seekers;

That the fast-track systems for the determination of claims will deny natural justice to asylum-seekers, giving only 48 hours in which to give notice of appeals against refusal;

That some of the proposed changes in the Immigration Rules will make it more difficult for asylum-seekers to establish their claim and are against the letter and spirit of the 1951 UN Convention on Refugees;

That the increased powers to fine airlines will further erode the spirit of the 1951 United Nations convention on refugees, as will proposals to send British officials to scrutinise passports at foreign airports;

That fingerprinting asylum-seekers is discriminatory and will criminalise innocent people;

That the housing restrictions proposed are discriminatory;

And that the secret intergovernmental discussions currently taking place in the ad-hoc group on immigration are apparently proposing even more restrictive asylum policies.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will not proceed with those unjust proposals, and your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I am told that the petition is supported by 6,962 signatories, in addition to the three on the face of the petition. I fully endorse and support it.

To lie upon the Table.

Pension Funds (Transport Industries)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

11.31 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I speak on this subject as a sponsored Member of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers. I speak on a day when the Secretary of State for Transport has announced an industry-wide effort to reorganise the British Rail pension scheme. I had intended to use this occasion to urge the Government to take that step, so I welcome his announcement and hope that the Minister, in replying to this debate, will give more details of his right hon. Friend's proposals.

My hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) hopes also to comment on the important matters that I am raising, which are important to many tens of thousands of workers. I hope that the Minister will explain whether his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends to issue a White Paper, will give details of the scope of that document and will say what class of employees will be included in any provisions.

There is a wider remit to this debate. It is about pension funds in the privatised transport industries, so we are dealing with workers in British Rail and in the bus and coach industry and with seafarers. Before dealing with my main points of concern, I remind the House that the transport sector is low paid. While not all employees in the sector are low paid, the sections of the industry which have been privatised contain, by and large, many low-paid employees. I hope that the Minister and hon. Members in all parts of the House agree that we do not want those employees, due to a deteriorating pension situation, to be thrown on to income support and become supplicants to the Department of Social Security. We want them to be in a position to make pension contributions and later to live on those pensions in their own right without recourse to DSS funding.

That being our desire, there must be something wrong with what is happening to pensions in Britain. We are familiar with the Maxwell fraud, but it goes further than that. There are frauds and near-frauds, but there are also perfectly legitimate ways by which companies can take money out of pension funds to the detriment of the pensioners-to-be. For example, the National Freight Corporation, Sealink, British Rail Engineering Limited and Travellers Fare have all been privatised, and the sales required that the pension benefits should be of equal, or better, value after privatisation. In fact, all those pension schemes now offer inferior benefits—and that is in spite of what the Government said at the time. Companies enjoyed pension holidays, and they introduced new schemes which gave them greater control. Transfer values tend to work against the transferee. That is one of the ways in which, I believe, companies cheat.

I will give some examples of bad cases. CityLink wound up its mirror image pension scheme and now offers personal pensions which exclude any employer contribution. That is not what employees were led to believe would happen, but it is what they now have to put up with. I hope that the Minister agrees with me that it is wrong. British Transport Hotels, when they were privatised, were all required to establish their own pension schemes, providing the same or better benefits. Some of those hotels have changed hands several times, and many of the schemes have been wound up or closed to new entrants. Again, that is quite wrong and is against what was intended when the privatisation took place.

A worse case is that of Nightingale Coaches. For two years employees paid their contributions, but instead of putting the money into the pension scheme, the company pocketed it and used it for cash flow purposes. Then it ceased trading. Action is proceeding at the moment. Whether those employees will ever receive full pension benefit is a moot point. I do not think that they will. Clearly, that is wrong, and it has resulted directly from the Government's policy and action on privatisation. Here, I am not seeking to engage in a debate about whether the privatisation was right or wrong; I am simply drawing attention to what happened as a result of Government policy and action. The effects on many people's pensions have been unfortunate.

Recently the Devon General Bus Company decided that from 6 September it could no longer afford the benefits provided under its hourly and monthly pay schemes. The schemes will be closed to new entrants, who will be able to join another scheme providing only minimal benefits. The Southern National Bus Company is now enjoying its second pension holiday. The fact that such a holiday is available to the company but not to the employees is a matter that we could debate. Opposition Members regard it as something that is not right.

Then there is the recent example of the National Welsh Bus Company. It may be that more than £1 million is missing from the pension fund of the former National Bus Company subsidiary, National Welsh. Having gone into receivership at the beginning of last year, it has deducted employees' pension contributions from pay but has not put them into the pension fund. In south Wales, about 800 former employees have been told that the fund is unable to meet its liabilities. Again that is quite wrong but it is a direct consequence of the bus privatisation policies of the present Government and of the previous Conservative Administration. It is true that the pension fund of the former National Bus Company is safe, but that does not apply to recent contributions.

I contend that pensions are deferred pay. They are part of the contract between employees and employers—employees agreeing to contribute part of their pay, and employers agreeing to contribute an additional amount. It is quite wrong that companies should be able to cheat, either through fraud or through changes in pension schemes. It is wrong that employees should not get what they expect. Employees have a right to have their pension funds managed properly. They have a right to know that their weekly or monthly contributions go into the fund. They have a right to know that, on retirement, they will receive benefits that have not been eroded. Funds should be managed in the interests of the employees—not in the interests of the company. Unfortunately, money has been stolen from former employees of National Welsh and of Nightingale Coaches. Money has also been stolen from employees of companies which have changed the rules or taken contribution holidays.

I am pleased at the announcement by the Secretary of State for Transport of an industry-wide scheme for British Rail employees when, or rather if, the railways are privatised or franchised. I say "if" because there is no general acceptance of the Government's proposals. Will that scheme be open to new entrants after franchising or privatisation? Will it be open to outside employees? The Government intend to franchise London's buses, but how that will be done is another issue. Will there be franchises for different routes, such as Nos. 88, 12 or 53 which pass the House? If after three years the franchisee decides that he cannot make a profit and gives up the route and his employees are engaged by another franchise operator, the only sensible course would be to have a nation-wide scheme or extend the BR scheme to allow people who are not BR employees, perhaps bus workers, to join.

The Goode committee was set up as a result of the Maxwell scandal and will produce a considered report addressing some of my other concerns. Will the Government act quickly on that report to ensure that there is statutory provision for the setting up of pension funds, that contributions go to the fund and that it is managed properly in the interests of fund holders so that they receive what they expect when they retire? They should not have to put up with lame excuses that the money is not there but has been used for other purposes or fraudulently spirited away. The Government have a duty in these matters. Tens of thousands of people want to know what the Government intend to do. They should act as quickly as possible.

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) for his generosity in permitting me to participate in this debate on these important matters. I welcome the statement on pensions today by the Secretary of State for Transport. In some respects, it seems to meet the requirements of British Rail pension fund members and their representatives and has ended the powerful sense of uncertainty and anxiety which has built up on the subject in the past few months. It will be necessary, however, to study the Secretary of State's precise words in print and to examine in detail the consultation document on pensions promised within the next two weeks.

I especially welcome the commitment to an industry-wide railway pension fund. That proposal, which is the preferred option of the railway trade unions, was first mentioned by me in a speech in Standing Committee on the British Coal and British Rail (Transfer Proposals) Bill in June. The Government Whip nods. I am glad that he remembers my contribution in Committee. At that time, the Minister for Public Transport said that he would give careful attention to the proposal. I am grateful to him for his response and I am happy to have played a modest part in what seems to be a successful outcome to the representations.

The model for the industry-wide scheme is the Electricity Act 1989, which provided protection for past service so long as members remained in their respective schemes during and after transition from the nationalised electricity undertaking to the new privatised electricity companies. We shall have to confirm that that is the model that the Government will use for the railways. If it is, and provided there are long-term guarantees for the integrity and maintenance of the value of benefit, that commitment will be an important reassurance to railway workers in a period of understandable anxiety as the railways are privatised.

Regrettably, however, the Government still seem intent on excluding future recruits to the proposed new franchising companies from the industry-wide scheme. I very much hope that the Government will display a further degree of open-mindedness on the issue.

If, as will presumably be the case, the franchisee will be required to sustain, at the same level as British Rail formerly did, the employer's contribution to the industry-wide scheme, it seems quite unfair that new employees, working side by side with longer serving railway employees, should not enjoy the same level of benefits. Equity surely demands that employees doing similar work, in identical conditions, making the same contribution to the success of the company, should be entitled to equal pension benefits. That arrangement operates in the shipping industry; it should apply in the railway industry as well.

I assume, of course, that existing scheme members will retain total freedom to remain in the industry-wide scheme for as long as they so choose. If, however, as may be the case, they choose to enter an alterntive scheme arranged by the new franchisee, it is essential that copper-bottomed guarantees should be enshrined in law to ensure the long-term viability of the alternative scheme. In particular, there must be an appropriate mechanism to ensure that the liabilty continues to any subsequent franchisee.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham has demonstrated, it has been the all-too-frequent and painful experience of employees in privatised transport industries that attractive new schemes, initiated at the moment of privatisation, have collapsed after the second transfer of ownership. In other words, the transfer value of the scheme must be organised on an actuarial basis with the assurance of adequate funding to sustain the scheme, and there must be similar guarantees to protect the pension rights of employees in the event of failure of the franchisee.

The Secretary of State's statement also embraced the position of current pensioners under the British Rail scheme. I especially welcome the Government's rejection of the possibility that present pensioners should become the responsibility of the franchising companies. That would have been to place at intolerable risk the moral and legal rights of a large number of pensioners who, in many cases, have given a lifetime of service to the railway industry and now derive a modest reward for that service.

The Secretary of State seemed to outline two alternative arrangements for the future of the pension fund, and we shall need to look at that proposal with great care. What is paramount, however, is that the assets of the fund should be ring-fenced to protect the individuals concerned: we want no corporate raids from the Treasury.

While I am speaking of the Treasury, I add a special plea that there should be no undermining of the small, historic pension schemes inherited from the original railway companies. Those funds benefit from a topping up from the Treasury under the terms of the Transport Act 1980. They still have a large number of beneficiaries. It is essential that the protection of the 1980 Act should be maintained for them.

I hope that the Minister will be able to offer reassurance on that subject and on the ring-fencing of the larger British Rail pension fund. I hope that she will also undertake, on behalf of the Government, to extend the proposed industry-wide scheme to new recruits to the privatised railway undertakings.

With those specific qualifications, I repeat my welcome for the announcement that we have heard today.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on securing this Adjournment debate and the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) on his interesting intervention.

There are two difficulties in replying to the debate. The first is that much of the material quite properly raised by hon. Members concerns the responsibilities of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I hope that hon. Members will be patient with me when I say that I cannot enter into detailed discussions on what he may or may not have in mind as a result of his announcement this afternoon. However, I undertake to draw specifically to my right hon. Friend's attention the particular points that hon. Members have raised, and I am sure that he, or one of his Ministers on his behalf, will respond to them in so far as it is possible at this stage.

My second difficulty is that the parts of the debate that concern my responsibilities—namely, the protection of occupational pension rights—are also subject to an independent review by Professor Goode, as the hon. Member for Streatham pointed out. It would be quite improper for me to pre-empt what Professor Goode might decide to do. However, I will undertake to ensure that the remarks made specifically about protection for scheme members on transfer of schemes are drawn to his attention.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): When is Professor Goode likely to report?

Miss Widdecombe: I shall come to that. I was asked a pertinent question about how quickly we would react.

My third difficulty is this. Such is the availability of NHS dentistry that I have had three dental operations in as many weeks, and for that reason I may sound a bit peculiar.

We expect Professor Goode to report in the summer. We have given two undertakings. The first is that if at any time in his deliberations—before he produces his report—he should by any chance conclude that a particular measure could be taken that is so urgent that it should be taken out of context with the rest of his report, the Government will consider implementing it ahead of any general Bill that we might introduce to meet the professor's general recommendations. So far we have had no indication that that is likely to happen, but the undertaking was given very clearly by the Secretary of State and would be honoured if the situation arose.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): If my hon. Friend makes contact with Professor Goode and with colleagues in other Departments—the Secretary of State for Transport and, perhaps, the Secretary of State for the Environment, who deals with local government matters—will she mention the points raised with me by the managing director of Blackpool Transport Services Ltd., in my constituency? They are not dissimilar to the points raised tonight by the hon. Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Streatham (Mr. Hill). Will she follow up the helpful reply that I received from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment in December? Perhaps if I write to her about the company's concerns—which were raised again in a letter that I received today, the managing director having heard about the debate—she will consider his anxieties about employees who were members of the local government superannuation scheme——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. This is a very long intervention in a short debate.

Mr. Hawkins: I am coming to my last sentence, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has already come to it.

Miss Widdecombe: I think that I can anticipate that last sentence. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) that I will relay his remarks to the relevant quarters, and ensure that he receives answers to them if necessary.

Let me now deal with some of the specific points that have been raised. First, there is the question of contribution holidays. The purpose of a contribution holiday is not to undermine the rights of employees so much as to undermine revenue received by the Inland Revenue. Once a scheme has reached 105 per cent., it can attract tax liabilities. As a result, many employers choose to take a contributions holiday rather than meet that liability. Professor Goode will consider contributions holidays. I am sure that he will also consider the ownership of funds and the protection that is available to members who transfer schemes from one employer to another.

Under trust law, trustees are obliged to act in accordance with what is of the greatest benefit to the fund rather than to the employer or to existing employees. The duties of the trustees are to secure the best for the fund and always to act in its interests. I am sure that Professor Goode will consider whether that duty can be tightened in law to ensure that it is better discharged in some cases. In doing so, he will wish to consider the composition of trustees and the law that lays down their duties and obligations.

It would be wrong to leave the House with the impression that we examine occupational pensions law only when something goes wrong. It was nothing to do with the Maxwell scandal that the Social Security Act 1990 provided for the restriction of self-investment by schemes and for a deficit on the winding up of a scheme to become a debt on the employer. That Act introduced the pensions ombudsman. Last year, we extended and strengthened the requirement on schemes to disclose information to members.

An Opposition Member—I am ashamed to say that I have forgotten who it was—raised the issue of information. It is important not only that individuals have rights of access to information about their scheme but that they are encouraged, as individuals or through their trade unions or representative bodies, to make such inquiries. People should understand that once they have joined a pension scheme they should treat it in exactly the same way as they would treat savings on deposit in a bank or some other account. We have an extremely successful pensions tracing registry in Newcastle, which is often asked to trace schemes going back 20 or 21 years with which members have lost contact. I urge anybody with an occupational pension to treat it as preciously as they would something under a mattress that they would check from time to time.

We all regret what was done by Maxwell. The only good that has come out of Maxwell is that it has drawn the attention of individuals to the importance of occupational pensions, whereas in the past there has been a tendency to take such schemes for granted.

I have every faith in Professor Goode and we shall react as soon as practicable to his recommendations. When he reports, we shall want to examine his proposals and to consult on particular aspects of them. There will be no undue delay in implementing anything that seems to us to be wise, reasonable, practical and in the interests of pensioners.

The vast majority of pension funds in this country are properly, securely and responsibly operated—only a few, which are known to the Occupational Pensions Board, are not.

I will ensure that hon. Members receive specific answers to the transport issues that they raised, which are not within my remit. I am satisfied that occupational pensions are, in general, very safe, a very good investment, are greatly to be encouraged and have added significantly, particularly in the past 10 years, to the retirement income of many people who otherwise would not have had that additional income above their state provision.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EC-ASEAN Relations

1. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made in developing relations between the European Community and the ASEAN countries.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): Considerable progress has been made in strengthening relations during the United Kingdom's presidency. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs personally attended two ministerial meetings with ASEAN in Manila in 1992, the second of which I also attended. The outcome of the EC-ASEAN ministerial meeting last October has increased co-operation in a range of fields, including trade, environmental protection, technical co-operation and human rights.

Mr. Spring: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the meeting of the ASEAN Trade and Industry Ministers in Jakarta in December, to discuss and promote the newly created free trade area? That new area offers important investment and export opportunities to British business. In the light of those developments, will my right hon. Friend comment on the relationship between the EC and the emerging ASEAN free trade area?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes. We and our European Community parners welcome the establishment of the ASEAN free trade area, which seeks to achieve a trading regime compatible with the general agreement on tariffs and trade, with progressively lower tariffs. On 11 December, the AFTA council decided on the first tranche of tariff reductions on a wide range of articles from 1 January this year. We hope that that will boost commercial relations between the Community and ASEAN countries, which already run at $50 billion a year in two-way trade. Our trade relations are of great importance. The ASEAN countries are enjoying high growth rates and offer many significant opportunities for British investment and trade.

Middle East

2. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards peace in the middle east.

4. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on progress with the middle east peace process.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): The eighth round of bilateral negotiations between the Arabs and Israel ended in Washington on 16 December. It is slow progress and the next round is expected next month. Recent events, including the killing of Sergeant Major Toledano and the deportation of 415 Palestinians from the occupied territories, underline the fact that the peace process is the only way to resolve the problem.

Mr. Carrington: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is unacceptable for Saddam Hussein to ignore United Nations resolutions and for Israel to ignore United Nations resolutions over the plight of the 415 Palestinians deported from that country? Will my right hon. Friend make representations to the Israeli Government, pointing out the urgency of complying with the United Nations resolution if there is to be any return to peace and any possibility of success with the peace process in the middle east?

Mr. Hurd: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's first point. The two cases are, of course, very different. On the second, the Israeli Government know our view—which is the Security Council's view—that the action that they have taken is in violation of their obligations under the fourth Geneva convention, which prohibits deportation from occupied territory regardless of the motive. We believe —we hope—that the Israeli Government will allow those deported to return to their homes.

Mr. Dalyell: Do Egypt and Bahrain support military action against Iraq?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman must ask them for their views. I am accountable for the policy of this Government. Iraq is defying the United Nations and the international community. It has not complied with representations made to it on the southern no-fly zone and has refused UNSCOM—the United Nations special commission—permission to fly into Iraq. It has violated the border with Kuwait and has moved missiles into northern Iraq.

The Security Council has made clear its views on all these matters and Iraq should be in no doubt that the consequences will be serious. The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to speculate on the form that those consequences might take. The House will be kept closely informed. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State will be answering a private notice question later this afternoon; I have to leave for a special Foreign Affairs Council on Yugoslavia.

Mr. Sumberg: When my right hon. Friend considers recent events in the middle east, will he bear in mind the fact that Israel has to deal with the Iranian-backed Hamas movement—an organisation which is dedicated not only to the destruction of the state of Israel but to the ending of the whole peace process on which so many hopes and lives ultimately depend?

Mr. Hurd: Certainly Israel has legitimate security interests and we entirely sympathise with its desire to stamp out terrorism. I do not, however, believe that the means that it has used on this occasion—by deporting the people in question—are a sensible way of setting about it.

Sir David Steel: Will the Foreign Secretary make it clear that, deplorable though the murder of the Israeli sergeant-major was, the Israeli Government's response has been completely disproportionate and that that response is not only inhumane—as we have all seen from the television pictures—but extremely stupid, because it plays precisely into the hands of those Palestinian extremists who wish to stop the peace process?

Mr. Hurd: If I commented, I should be repeating what I have already said. We condemned the murder of the Israeli border guard and we entirely understand Israeli preoccupations with Hamas and its negative and destructive policies. We also believe, however, that the peace process—including, in particular, the dialogue with the Palestinians—is crucial. We hope that it will be possible to solve this problem before it gets in the way of the resumption of the talks.

Mr. Renton: Bearing in mind the tragic plight of the 415 Palestinians, does my right hon. Friend see any great possibility of negotiating more successfully with the present Israeli Government than with the previous one?

Mr. Hurd: Indeed so. There has been a radical and welcome change of policy in Israel as a result of the election. I hope that the present problem can be solved. The Secretary-General's special envoy, Mr. Gharekhan, is reporting on his mission to the region. Discussions are in progress and I very much hope that they will succeed.

Mr. Kaufman: Reverting to the first part of the question of the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), may I ask the Foreign Secretary whether he agrees that the repeated Iraqi violations of the ceasefire resolutions are unacceptable and that Iraqi offers of constructive negotiation are ludicrous in the light of those violations and of Iraq's repeated attacks on the Kurds and Shi'ites? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that many hon. Members will support military action—provided that civilians are protected—to ensure that Iraq obeys the ceasefire resolutions?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his remarks and I agree with his analysis. The House will not expect me to say anything further at this point, but, as I said, the House will be kept closely informed.

Mr. Marlow: Given that it is nearly 50 years since the last war ended, should not we now treat Israel in the same way diplomatically as we would treat any other delinquent country? Given that the 400 people were picked up from their only home without trial or charge and deposited on someone else's territory, should not we consider some form of sanction against Israel until it learns how to behave properly?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that that would be right. We have made clear our view of the Israeli action and what we think should happen—that a way should be found for those deported to be returned home. That way is now being sought and I hope that it can be found.

Dr. John Cunningham: Does the Secretary of State recognise that we denounce the activities of Saddam Hussein unequivocally and that we support—and have always supported—the enforcement of the air exclusion zones in Iraq to safeguard the Kurds in the north and the Shi'ite Muslims in the south? Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that, whatever military action may ensue in support of the enforcement of those air exclusion zones, it is covered by the terms of the United Nations resolution 688, under which the air exclusion zones were established in the first place?

Will he also explain whether it is true, as reported in the Sunday Mirror recently, that he personally authorised a visit to Britain of people from Iraq to discuss with GEC the purchase of telecommunications systems? If it is true, does that give completely confusing messages to not only Saddam Hussein about our relations with him, but the people of Britain about the Government's real intentions?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to speculate on the possible consequences of Iraq's defiance of the United Nations Security Council. I am grateful for what he said about that. Obviously, any measures that are taken will need to be, and will be, in full compliance with international law.

The same point covers the hon. Gentleman's second question. I have not come to the House armed with details of the matter reported in the Sunday Mirror, so I must clearly supply him with them, which I will. Certainly, neither I nor any of my colleagues have authorised any action which could lead anyone in the United Kingdom to believe that it was correct or possible under our law to break the sanctions of the United Nations.

Mr. Batiste: As Hamas is an Iranian-sponsored organisation, what representations have been made to the Iranian Government with a view to curtailing the activities of Hamas in seeking to disrupt the middle east peace process?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that such representations are likely to be fruitful, but I will certainly study my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the Foreign Secretary's reply, may I give notice that I hope to raise this matter under Standing Order No. 20?

Yugoslavia

3. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what current discussions he has had with other Foreign Ministers about the long-term future of the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: European and north American Foreign Ministers met repeatedly in December for discussions on the problems of the former Yugoslavia in a number of fora, including the NATO council, the EC and the steering committee of the international conference in Geneva.

The European Council in Edinburgh declared again that the Serbian nation faced a clear choice: if there were a radical change of policy, Serbia would gradually be admitted to the international community. If not, existing sanctions and pressures would be tightened and extended to isolate Serbia.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that Common Market countries are partly responsible for the problems that exist in the former Yugoslavia? Is not it true that several months ago Germany, after annexing East Germany, decided to recognise Croatia, and that the Government and the rest of the Common Market countries agreed with it? Is not that the same Croatia which supported Hitler in the second world war and was responsible for slaughtering hundreds of thousands of Serbs?

Is not it ironic that the Common Market, which wants political union with 12 nation states, is now taking part in the fragmentation of the former Yugoslavia? Are not these double standards?

Mr. Hurd: I am sorry to have to tell the House that a British soldier was killed in Bosnia this morning. I know that the House will join me in expressing our sorrow and sympathy to his family.

I do not accept the analysis of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). It was right for us all, and certainly the Government, to find out whether it was possible to hold Yugoslavia together by consent, which would have been the best answer. However, that was made impossible, not least by the Serbs.

So we had the emergence of republics. Historians will argue for years about the timing of recognition, but, whatever one's feelings about it, it was a matter of months. No one would seriously argue that we should today refuse to recognise the existence, which is a fact, of a Croatia which is very different from the Croatia and Croat leadership of 1943, 1944 and 1945.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is every bit as important to have peace in the Balkans as it is to have peace in the middle east? Does he further agree that if, as we all devoutly hope, the talks in Geneva result in a proper peace under international auspices, it will be the duty of the international community to guarantee that settlement?

Mr. Hurd: I certainly welcome the extent of progress yesterday in Geneva. My hon. Friend brought the Foreign Minister of Bosnia to see me this morning and I am grateful for that. I found that he, who represented his country at the talks, welcomed the progress, although he was understandably sceptical on the ground that what counts is not what is agreed at Geneva but whether the Bosnian Serbs honour that agreement. Meanwhile, we must keep up the pressure. But my hon. Friend is perfectly right that any eventual agreement achieved in Geneva through the EC-UN process will need to be underwritten by the international community.

Mr. George Robertson: First, may I join in expressing the sympathy and deep condolences of the Opposition for the relations of the British soldier who was killed this morning in Bosnia. Our troops, wearing the blue helmet of the United Nations, are involved in the heroic task of getting humanitarian help to thousands of people who would otherwise die in the winter of this horrible civil war. It was never going to be a risk-free operation, but it is still a singular tragedy when even one of our troops is killed for the greater good of the people of that troubled area.

May I also commend the outcome of the Vance-Owen talks in Geneva, which have shown the first glimmer of hope for that area for a long time? My hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary and I met the Bosnian Foreign Minister, Mr. Silajdic, this morning, as did the Foreign Secretary. Does the Foreign Secretary accept that it is crucial that when Lord Owen reports at the EC Foreign Ministers' meeting this afternoon, it is made clear that an enduring peace will be guaranteed only by the permanent cessation of the use of heavy weapons in the area and that we must continue the pursuit of those who are accused of war crimes in the region?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his first point. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence told the House yesterday, our troops in Bosnia are carrying out a necessary job successfully. So far they have escorted 147 convoys and carried almost 12,000 tonnes of food and humanitarian supplies. That means that lives have been saved in places which until then it was hard to reach. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's second point. The corralling of heavy weapons was agreed in principle at the London conference in August. It has not happened, partly because the Bosnian Serbs have not agreed to it and partly as a result of the difficulties of arranging it. I am sure that we shall discuss both points this evening with Lord Owen.

Mr. Colvin: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will have heard from the Bosnian Foreign Minister this morning that he wants the arms embargoes lifted so that Bosnia does not continue to fight with one arm behind its back. He also wants the no-fly zone under Security Council resolution 781 to be enforced. What further steps can be taken on both matters?

Mr. Hurd: On the no-fly zone, there are no combat missions—that is, no Bosnian Serb bombers or fighters are striking at targets in Bosnia—from those airports. There have been helicopter flights, which are certainly in breach of the United Nations resolution, as are some Croation flights. The members of the Security Council are fairly near the end of their consideration of how the Security Council should react to those violations.

I know the Foreign Minister's view about the arms embargo, although it was not at the top of his agenda this morning. I do not believe in half an arms embargo. In practice, it will not be possible to allow the arming of one party to a conflict and expect the other party to go without resupply. In practice we would find that Serbia would be resupplied by those who sympathise with her. As Bosnia is already awash with arms, the war would be likely to continue rather than be brought to an end. Perhaps that is why this morning the Bosnian Foreign Minister put the emphasis on demilitarisation, beginning with the corralling of heavy weapons, not on militarisation.

Bosnia

5. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make an official visit to Bosnia to discuss British relations with Bosnia; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): There are no immediate plans for a further ministerial visit to Bosnia. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I visited Bosnia on 22 December to see British troops deployed in the UNPROFOR peacekeeping operation. Our relations with the Bosnian Government are good. As has been said, my right hon. Friend and I met the Bosnian Foreign Minister this morning. The British Government have played a leading role in the international effort to resolve the Bosnian crisis.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Foreign Secretary was right to express the wish, which I am sure is reflected in all parts of the House, that our condolences should be sent to the relatives of the British service man who lost his life this morning.

What representations are the Government making about that tragic death and what consequences will it have for our approach, for example, to the United Nations with a view to beefing up the mandate, to prevent such tragic incidents from happening? What assurances can the Minister give the House about bringing all possible pressure to bear on the Serbs in Bosnia to conclude a speedy negotiated settlement which will satisfy the international community? Finally, can he assure us that no such settlement would preclude the right of the international community to pursue and bring to book people found guilty of crimes during the conflict and recent events in Serbia?

Mr. Hogg: The death of the British soldier is a tragedy. We do not yet know the full circumstances. We shall try to find them out as speedily as possible and we must then determine what lessons are to be learnt. We shall make a report as soon as possible.

On the question of the Bosnian Serbs, the hon. Gentleman is broadly right. We must make it entirely plain to them that if the agreement to which Dr. Karadzic put his hand is not approved and carried forward, the Serbs in Bosnia will face an ever-deepening crisis.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that British military involvement in Bosnia is, and continues to be perceived to be, purely for humanitarian purposes? Will he endeavour to preserve that position?

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence responded to a similar question yesterday. He confirmed the statement that my hon. Friend has just made and I can confirm it once again.

Mr. Wareing: Does the Minister accept that there is always a danger of the conflict spreading to Kosovo, Macedonia and elsewhere in the region? Military intervention by other powers would turn that risk into an absolute certainty and encourage people in other parts of Yugoslavia who are even more extreme than those who have power. Will he also make it clear to President Tudjman of Croatia that the existence of UNPROFOR in Krajina is essential beyond the end of next February, to ensure that a conflict does not arise there, too?

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree with what the hon. Gentleman said in the latter part of his question. I saw President Tudjman in late December and told him that the presence of United Nations forces in the United Nations protected areas was, to our way of thinking, a matter of cardinal importance. I hope that the mandate will be renewed when it expires in the latter part of February. As regards Kosovo and Macedonia, I have a great deal of sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman has just said. It is partly for that reason that I am glad that there is a CSCE presence in Kosovo and that a reconnaissance party of United Nations troops is already in Macedonia.

Mr. Churchill: While we must all hope that the Vance-Owen plan brings peace to Bosnia, is it not now a matter of urgency for the international community to move to ensure that all heavy weapons in Bosnia come under direct United Nations control? Will my right hon. and learned Friend make that a high priority for Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. Hogg: In a sense, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has already responded to my hon. Friend's question. The demilitarisation of Bosnia is a very important part of the agreement to which Dr. Karadzic put his signature yesterday.

Mr. John D. Taylor: With many of my constituents serving with the Royal Irish Regiment in Bosnia, I naturally wish to extend sympathy to the family whose son has been killed today.

Does the Minister agree that the Government are placing British troops in an impossible position by asking them to carry out humanitarian work in the midst of a civil war in which, politically, we are seen to be actively opposed to one of the participants?

Mr. Hogg: I think that the proper way to describe the activities of British soldiers in Bosnia is to say that they have been remarkably successful in performing an immensely important task. They have acted with enormous courage and skill and, as a result of what they have done and are doing, tens of thousands of people are now living who might otherwise be dead.

European Community

6. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on developments in the EC since the Edinburgh summit.

Mr. Hurd: There have been two substantial developments in the European Community since the summit in Edinburgh; notably the single market, which came into effect on 1 January, and the agreement of Foreign Ministers on 21 December that negotiations for full membership of the Community with Austria, Finland and Sweden should open at our meeting on 1 and 2 February.

Mr. Riddick: May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on a United Kingdom presidency which was far more successful than the knockers and whingers on the Opposition Benches would have us believe?

Now that the single market is in place, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that we will have less red tape and fewer directives coming out of Brussels? Will he also confirm that, as a result, the EC in general and the Commission in particular will turn their attention to extending free trade throughout the world, which, of course, means in particular ensuring a successful outcome of the GATT negotiations?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The presidency had its roughish moments, but I am glad that it ended with a success and a smile. As my hon. Friend has said, one result of the single market is that the volume of legislation in the EC has already begun to drop markedly. We expect and hope that that trend will continue, partly as a result of subsidiarity as it comes into effect.

My hon. Friend is right about the importance of the GATT negotiations. It is the aim of the Commission and of most member states to achieve agreement as soon as possible. The basic deadlock between the EC and the United States on agriculture was removed during our presidency and now we have to wrap up other details, some of which are still intractable.

Mrs. Ewing: Given that one of the important issues discussed during the British presidency was the need for increased powers for the European Parliament, as crystallised at the Edinburgh summit by the agreement to increase the number of seats at that Parliament, is the right hon. Gentleman yet able to advise us how the extra six seats allocated to the United Kingdom will be distributed? Will he tell us whether, in the interests of fairness, proportional representation will come into play?

Mr. Hurd: No. I think that the hon. Lady can take it that we will need to change the boundaries of the European parliamentary seats, and decisions about how to proceed will be taken soon.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Foreign Secretary aware of the widespread confusion that was created when the leaders of countries such as Spain and Eire went back to their homelands after the Edinburgh summit to report that they had gained billions of pounds while the leaders of countries such as Britain and Germany, which pay the money, said that the extra costs would be minimal? Would it not help to remove that confusion if the Foreign Secretary appealed to the Commission or the Council of Ministers to publish their estimate of who will gain what as a result of Edinburgh and who will pay for it? It will simply undermine confidence if the sums do not add up.

Mr. Hurd: It is not unusual for people who go to a negotiating session to return and say that they are reasonably satisfied with the result, but to no Member of this House is there any mystery about the actual facts and figures or about the way in which the original proposals by President Delors were first whittled down as a result of his own compromise and then further substantially reduced at Edinburgh. The result was modest compared with that of the last review, in 1988, and that will give my hon. Friend substantial satisfaction.

Armenia

7. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the current position in Armenia; and what further measures he intends to take to relieve the situation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Armenia is experiencing acute hardship as a result of the collapse of the Soviet system, shortage of natural resources and the confrontation with Azerbaijan. We are urging Armenia and Azerbaijan to resolve their differences through the negotiations of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe on Nagorno-Karabakh. The United Kingdom is contributing £450,000 to Nagorno-Karabakh relief programmes of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross and is a contributor to the European Community's 36 million ecu loan to help Armenia to buy food and medicines.

Mr. Tipping: The Foreign Secretary will know that the Lord Byron school in Leninakhan was gifted by the British Government. It is twinned with the Holgate school in Hucknall, Nottinghamshire. The staff, pupils and parents of the latter have collected enormous sums of money and equipment for their friends in Armenia, but the aid is not reaching its destination because lorries are being hijacked. Will the Minister consider ways in which he might complement the excellent work of the people at this school?

Mr. Hogg: All credit to the pupils of the school who have raised this money. I am afraid that I am not aware of the particular problem to which the hon. Gentleman refers. If he would care to discuss it with me in greater detail I shall see what, if anything, we can do to help.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: In view of the assistance that the British Government are giving to Armenia, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the continuing six-year war between Armenia and Azerbaijan over Nagorno-Karabakh is a significant source of instability in the region? Does he agree that an important role in any negotiations to end that dispute must be taken by Turkey, which is giving significant assistance to Turkish people in Azerbaijan?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is quite right: the fighting in Nagorno-Karabakh is extremely destabilising for that region. The proper way forward is for everybody to recognise that there must be autonomy, within Azerbaijan, for the peoples of Nagorno-Karabakh, that Nagorno-Karabakh cannot be an independent state and cannot be absorbed into Armenia. The proper way forward is through negotiations designed to achieve autonomy status for Nagorno-Karabakh within Azerbaijan.

On the question of Turkey, the Turkish Government do indeed have a prominent role to play in stabilising the situation. I have spoken to the Turkish ambassador and others about this matter; my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has raised it with the Turkish Foreign Minister; and we have had other high-level contacts with the Turkish Government to reinforce the point.

Arab-Israel Dispute

8. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made to resolve the Arab-Israel dispute.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has already said, the eighth round of bilateral negotiations ended in Washington on 16 December. Slow progress continues, and the next round is expected to take place in February. Recent events, including the killing of Sergeant-Major Toledano and the deportation of 415 Palestinians from the occupied territories, underline the fact that the peace process is the only way to resolve the problems of the region.

Mr. Madel: As Mr. Rabin has offered to make concessions over the future of the Golan Heights—the first time Israel has made such an offer—will the Government press Syria to respond positively to this genuine move towards peace?

Mr. Hogg: As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has said, the election of Mr. Rabin opens the prospect of really promising negotiations such as we have not seen previously. Prime Minister Rabin's statement on the question of the Golan Heights is important and much to be welcomed. I should like to see the Government of Syria respond by recognising the need for a permanent peace agreement with the state of Israel.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Does the Minister accept that the middle east peace talks will always be vulnerable when the Israeli Government over-react, as they have on this occasion by deporting 415 Palestinians? The peace talks will continue to be vulnerable unless and until the Israeli Government believe that serious international action will be taken against them when they violate international law. The Israeli Government have clearly broken international law and 415 Palestinians are somewhere between Lebanon and Israel, yet Israel is still allowed to participate in international organisations, there is still bilateral trade between ourselves and Israel, and there is still contact between Israel and the EC. Only when Israel believes that serious retaliation will be taken will the middle east peace talks get on stream and be protected.

Mr. Hogg: The British Government have made their position plain on the deportation of the 415 Palestinians. Clearly, it was a serious breach of the fourth Geneva convention and is a serious infringement of human rights. As the hon. Gentleman and the rest of the House know, we have condemned it in many ways. We now need to find ways to persuade, induce and cause the Israeli Government to reverse the effect of their decision—a decision which we greatly deplore.

Mr. Rathbone: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, in pursuance of what he has just said, it might be useful carefully to review the access that Israel has been given to the European Community and the help that it receives from the Community?

Mr. Hogg: We must consider how most effectively we can persuade the Israelis to reverse the effect of their decision—a decision which we deeply deplore.

Mr. Galloway: Does not the Minister understand the dynamics that lie behind the process that has led hundreds of thousands of Palestinians under occupation and in exile to look towards the Islamic extremists of Hamas? Do the Government understand that the failure of the secular nationalist leadership of the Palestinian people to obtain any significant concession has led to that radicalisation and Islamicisation of the whole national consciousness in Palestine? Does the Minister realise that, for example, the British Government's refusal to meet leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organisation when they were recently in London strengthens the arm of the extremists in that regard? The alacrity with which they are preparing to pulverise the Iraqis, while allowing the Bosnian Muslims to be massacred in Yugoslavia, does not help either.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is simply not correct to suggest that the Israeli Government have made no movement since the election of Prime Minister Rabin. The change that has taken place with regard to the settlement policy, for instance, is an important step forward, although it may not go far enough. We must push forward on the basis of resolutions 242 and 338, and recognise that the Palestinian people have a right to self determination and to land to make a reality of that self determination. That is our policy and we shall keep with it.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the greatest threat to peace in the middle east comes from Saddam Hussein, and any action that is taken against him is in the interests both of the people of Iraq and of peace in that troubled region?

Mr. Hogg: There are a number of threats to peace in the middle east and Saddam Hussein is one of the most prominent. However, it is also important that we do what we can to promote an agreement between the state of Israel, the peoples of the occupied territories and the Arab states.

Dr. John Cunningham: Does the Minister recognise that we deplore the Israeli Government's actions, which are in clear breach of international law and the fourth Geneva convention? I regret having to say that, as I warmly welcomed the election of a new Labour Government in Israel. Is it not clear that that breach of international law has given Hamas a huge propaganda victory?

Is it not also clear that the actions of the Israeli Government have undermined the legitimate leadership of the Palestinian people in Israel, too? Do not both those things militate against a successful outcome to the continuing peace initiative which we strongly support? Will Her Majesty's Government make it clear to the Israeli ambassador, as I did yesterday, that his Government should be obliged, in line with the decisions of the United Nations and the condemnation internationally, to rethink this decision and to treat these people using the proper legal procedures to which they are entitled?

Mr. Hogg: I think that I agree with almost everything that the hon. Gentleman has just said, and I welcome his statement. Yes, the action by the Israeli Government is deeply to be deplored, it is illegal and it is contrary to the fourth Geneva convention. Yes, too, it is a recruiting sergeant for people in the occupied territories to join Hamas. It makes martyrs of them. It is a terrible thing to have done. Yes, I entirely agree that it undermines the peace process. What we must all seriously hope is that it does not destroy the peace process and, in so far as any of us has influence in this matter, we must try to keep the peace process alive.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has rightly called for pressure to be mixed with persuasion in the case of Serbia. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is also appropriate for Israel?

Mr. Hogg: I think that I have said all I can usefully say on this matter. There has been a serious breach of international law by Israel. That breach of international law has been roundly condemned by, for example, the United Nations and by the British Government. What we now need to do is, first, to get the Government of Israel to reverse the effect of their policy, and secondly, to exercise our best efforts to keep the peace process alive.

Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill

9. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the implications for the staff establishments of British overseas posts of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: It is too soon to assess the affect of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill on staffing establishments at British posts abroad, but, as the removal of appeal rights does not imply any change in the criteria under which visit visa applications are considered, it is likely to be limited. Staffing establishments are primarily determined by the number of applications for visas.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister understand that a growing number of people, including British entry clearance officers, recognise that clause 9 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill represents a serious denial of natural justice? Does he also accept that if genuine visitors, those who wish to come here to share in joy and grief with their relatives and friends, often in emergencies, are denied those visits, he and other Foreign Office Ministers will be deluged with requests to intervene from hon. Members? I hope very much that he will be prepared to offer us his private telephone number for telephone calls at weekends, over public holidays and during parliamentary recesses, because I suspect that a very large number of such requests will be made if this ridiculous clause becomes law.

Mr. Goodlad: No such reservations have been expressed to me or to my colleagues by entry clearance officers. Applicants will be given every opportunity as before to present their case, and applications will not be considered any less thoroughly than at present. There will be no change in the criteria used to assess applications. Entry clearance officers are under a duty to act fairly and will continue to do so.

Mrs. Currie: Is the Minister aware that a number of my constituents, with families in Bangladesh, particularly in Derby, have an interest in this question? Will he consider, if he has any problems with a shortage of trained officers accustomed to dealing with passports, immigration and the like, making far better use of the staff who currently waste travellers' time, particularly on the cross-channel ferries, insisting on seeing all our passports? Surely there must be a better way, if we are serious about chasing illegal immigrants and about helping the small number of genuine asylum-seekers, than having these officers spend hundreds of hours of publicly paid time sitting on their backsides on the cross-channel ferries?

Mr Goodlad: I know that my hon. Friend takes a close interest in such matters and she has made an interesting suggestion.

EC Foreign and Security Policy

10. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next be attending a meeting of the EC foreign affairs troika to discuss the future of EC common foreign and security policy.

Mr. Hurd: The 12 Foreign Ministers meet Lord Owen in Paris this evening to discuss events in the former Yugoslavia as part of the continuing co-operation beteen Governments on a number of foreign and security issues.

Mr. Gapes: When the Foreign Secretary meets his colleagues will he draw any lessons from the failure of the Western European Union to impose effective sanctions to stop oil reaching Serbia, as it has during recent months? Will he, from that experience, draw lessons about the role of the WEU assembly—the putative defence arm of the European Community? Will he also discuss with his colleagues the contingency plans to be put into operation if military action is taken in the next few weeks? If that happens, the WEU will be evacuating the humanitarian forces who will be the meat in the sandwich—inadequately protected and vulnerable to attacks from Serbs and others as a result of retaliation.

Mr. Hurd: We believe that oil reached Serbia and Montenegro from the Adriatic before the warships on patrol there were given powers by the Security Council to stop and search. We believe that the stop and search resolution has been effective. We must now concentrate on the supplies that are still coming down the Danube, which will certainly be one of our main themes this evening, although pressure there has increased.

On the hon. Member's second point, I should make it clear—as my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State has already done—that we do not believe that a political answer can be imposed on Bosnia by military force. That is not the purpose of having troops there, and nor will it be.

Sir Michael Marshall: What consideration does my right hon. Friend believe the troika will be able to give to the issue of common security and foreign policy in the Community in relation to the work of the proposed Assises—the new Community parliamentary Assembly? What progress has my right hon. Friend to report and what hopes does he hold for the future?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that that will specifically be a matter for the troika. The CSCE has decided in principle to have a parliamentary Assembly. I have mixed feelings about that prospect, as a large number of parliamentary assemblies are already attached to different organisations, but we must wait to see how we proceed on that issue. I do not think that it is a particularly urgent matter at present.

Mr. Faulds: In view of the murderous treatment of the Bosnian Muslims by the Christian Serbs, would it not be advisable for the right hon. Gentleman to discuss with his fellow Foreign Ministers the dangers and implications of the reactions of the vast Islamic community throughout the whole world?

Mr. Hurd: As the hon. Gentleman says, that reaction is certainly sharp, and we have been in close touch with a number of Governments, particularly the Turkish, Saudi and Egyptian—as the hon. Gentleman knows, a meeting on that theme is being held in Dakar. We are well aware of the reaction.

European Community

11. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current developments in the European Community.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Garel-Jones): I refer my hon. Friend to the pamphlet entitled published by Her Majesty's Government on 11 January, which summarises developments in the European Community under the United Kingdom presidency. I refer my hon. Friend also to the statement made to the House by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister after the Edinburgh European Council.

Mr. Shaw: My right hon. Friend will be aware that, with the introduction of the single European market, the European Community has agreed that 24 mecu should be made available to assist customs clearance brokers and freight forwarders—many of whom work and live in my constituency. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that every effort is being made by the British Government to ensure that the money is made available to businesses in Great Britain for their use and that the form filling—about which many businesses are concerned—is made easier? Will he also ensure that the money is adequately distributed?

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is characteristically assiduous in the defence of his constituents' interests. He asks about the regulation which will enable the Community to assist in areas hardest hit by the regulation. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry is co-ordinating that effort. I know that my hon. Friend is in contact with him and is working closely with the east Kent initiative which has been invited to draw up proposals on how to spend that money in Kent for the benefit of my hon. Friend's constituents and the companies that are affected in his constituency.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: Since the conclusion of the British presidency, has the Minister or the Foreign Secretary come across any other Foreign Ministers or Government leaders of the other member states who agree with the description given by the Prime Minister when he reported on the Edinburgh summit of the distinction between subsidiarity as it is understood at Community level and devolution as it is understood in the United Kingdom? I cite in particular last year's speech by Chancellor Kohl whose clear view was that subsidiarity meant proper delegation of power, not just to national Parliaments but within the United Kingdom to Scotland, Wales and the regions of England.

Mr. Garel-Jones: If I may say so, it is the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of subsidiarity which strikes me and many others in Europe as bizarre. Subsidiarity means distinguishing those areas which are the responsibility of nation states from areas that may be the Commission's responsibility. Once that distinction has been made, subsidiarity means that each member state should decide how those competences should be distributed within it.

Sir Peter Emery: Can my right hon. Friend assure us that in future actions and developments, major consideration will be given to finding a solution to the problems of a GATT treaty? Has any thought been given to persuading the new American President to arrange for the fast track to be made available for settling a GATT treaty? The negotiations could fail if we do not do something fairly quickly.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I can certainly give my right hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. As he knows, the British presidency attaches the highest importance to finding a solution to the GATT problems. In spite of the difficulties that have been heralded recently, we hope that by the end of this month agreement can be reached which will enable us to take advantage of the fast track.

Mr. Home Robertson: Returning to subsidiarity, may I ask whether the Minister has grasped the fact that Britain is not a nation but a union of nations? Does he accept that the most significant happening at the Edinburgh summit was a demonstration by 25,000 Scots on the streets of Edinburgh demanding democracy for Scotland within Britain and within the European Community? When will the Government address the case for democratic accountability for the government of Scotland according to the principle of subsidiarity in Europe?

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Birmingham declaration made perfectly clear the interpretation of subsidiarity and it was agreed by all member states. I am sure that the House agrees that decisions made in the United Kingdom about local government, devolution and other matters should be made by this House and our sovereign Parliament and not by Brussels or anywhere else.

Tibet

12. Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about human rights in Tibet.

Mr. Goodlad: We remain very concerned over reports of human rights abuses in Tibet and throughout China, and Ministers have made our concerns clear to the Chinese at a high level both in public and in private on many occasions. My noble and learned Friend Lord Howe of Aberavon who visited China from 1 to 7 December will in due course submit a formal report on his visit to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. That report will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Trend: In view of the appalling human rights record in Tibet, will the Government use their good offices and best endeavours to encourage direct negotiations between the People's Republic of China and the Tibetans on the basis—and this is the heart of the matter—that there be no pre-conditions on either side?

Mr. Goodlad: The present position, as we understand it, is that the Chinese have offered to talk to the Dalai Lama about Tibet but have set certain conditions. The Dalai Lama has in the past responded positively to the principle of talks, but was not happy with some of the conditions. Although there have been reports in the media of subsequent talks, we believe that the impasse has still to be resolved. We believe that dialogue between the Chinese Government and the Tibetan people offers the best hope for a solution to the problem of Tibet. We shall continue to encourage both sides in this process. We are strongly in favour of the principle of talks without preconditions. We have consistently urged the Chinese authorities to get into a real dialogue with the Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama. We reminded the Chinese embassy of our position only yesterday.

Dr. Godman: The continuing Chinese violations of Tibetan human rights are surely made worse by the Chinese Government's policy of moving hundreds of thousands of Chinese citizens into the very heart of Tibet. Does the Minister agree that that policy of mass migration has as its objective the systematic destruction of the culture of the Tibetan people? When will the Government stand up to the ancient men in Beijing and tell them to stop these horrible violations of the rights of the peaceable and peaceful people of Tibet?

Mr. Goodlad: We are not in a position to confirm the accuracy of the reports alluded to by the hon. Gentleman. We are, however, as I have repeatedly said, deeply concerned about reports of widespread human rights abuses in Tibet and throughout China. We have raised the issue with senior Chinese leaders on several occasions in recent months.

Human rights are a central issue in our bilateral relations with the Chinese and are on the agenda of every ministerial meeting. We and our EC partners will continue to urge the Chinese authorities to adhere to internationally recognised standards of behaviour and to improve their record on human rights. My right hon. noble and learned Friend has, as I have said, recently led a mission to China as an earnest of our hope that, in particular, legal protection of the individual can be improved.

Kuwait Border (Iraqi Violations)

3.32 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the situation on the Iraq-Kuwait border.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): Over the past few weeks, there have been a number of violations by the Iraqis of the border with Kuwait. The United Nations Secretary-General reported on 10 January that, on that morning, a party of some 200 Iraqis with trucks and heavy loading equipment forced entry into six ammunition bunkers in a former Iraqi naval base at Umm Qasr on Kuwaiti territory and took away most of their contents, including four anti-ship Silkworm missiles. Later that day, 500 Iraqis continued to dismantle prefabricated buildings in the former naval base. Similar violations have continued until today.

The Secretary-General reported to the Security Council that these activities were in violation of the procedures established by the Security Council. The Security Council responded on 11 January with a statement condemning the action taken by Iraq which constituted further material breaches of Security Council resolution 687, which established the formal ceasefire at the end of the Gulf war.

The council demanded that Iraq co-operate fully with the United Nations Iraq/Kuwait observer mission—UNIKOM—and warned Iraq of the serious consequences that would flow from continued defiance. We hope that Iraq will not miscalculate, that the violations of the border will cease immediately, as will other Iraqi provocations, and that Iraq will comply with all United Nations resolutions.

Mr. Robertson: We fully understand why the Foreign Secretary cannot be here but has to be in Brussels this evening.

Is the Minister aware that there is wide international agreement that the conduct of President Saddam Hussein in the last few days has been designed as a deliberate and calculated provocation by a despicable regime, which calls in one breath for constructive dialogue and with the next says that it will recover Kuwait again? Is he further aware that there is no question but that Saddam Hussein must comply with the provisions of the United Nations Security Council resolutions that formed the basis for the ceasefire at the end of the Gulf war?

I assure the Minister that the good reasons for implementing the two air exclusion zones over northern and southern Iraq—protection from Saddam's genocidal attacks on the Kurds in the north and the Shi'ite Muslims in the south—remain as valid as they ever were. The imposition of the two air exclusion zones was supported by the Opposition in order to save many lives which were and are still in danger, and for that same reason we shall continue to support the air exclusion zones and their enforcement.

I welcome the assurance that the Foreign Secretary gave the House earlier today—that whatever necessary military action is taken will be taken in accordance with international law. I also strongly welcome the Foreign Secretary's assurance that he will keep the House fully informed of all developments, because that is an assurance which is of extreme importance to hon. Members from both sides.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he has said. He is right: Saddam Hussein must comply with the Security Council resolutions. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support for the no-fly zones. He is right to say that Iraq must not infringe the zones.

I can give the assurance once again that any action that may be contemplated at any stage by any party would proceed in accordance with international law. I can also assure the House once again that any material acts of any kind will be reported to the House.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): Everybody supports action against Saddam Hussein to make sure that he complies with United Nations resolutions, but will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that any action is taken with the agreement and support of our Arab allies in the Gulf war?

Mr. Hogg: It is very important that our Arab allies should support any action that the international community might deem appropriate; that is why it is important that any appropriate action should proceed in accordance with international law.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Does the Minister agree that it is not just border incursions but the deployment of anti-aircraft missiles in southern Iraq and the interference with the United Nations arms inspection teams' rights to fly into Baghdad which mount up to a worrying picture? Is it not necessary to remind Saddam Hussein that he finds himself in the position that he does today only because of his invasion of a neighbouring member state of the United Nations?

In view of the disturbing report this morning by Saddam Hussein's press officer in an Iraqi newspaper that Iraq intends to "retake Kuwait", is it not important that the Government enjoy cross-party support in the House for whatever action they take in an international context against Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) for the remarks that have already been made this afternoon. I agree with the great importance of proceeding in accordance with international law and maintaining cross-House agreement. It also needs to be said that the violations that the right hon. Gentleman has described amount to a pattern of conduct which must be deeply deplored.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that no United Nations aid has reached the south of Iraq for many months, nor are there any plans for it to be sent, and that the recent meagre aid flows to the Kurds in the north were fire-bombed and have now ceased completely? Therefore, does he agree that the memorandum of understanding and the United Nations' plans to send food to the south and the north are in rags and tatters and that nothing save intervention on the ground will save millions of people in the north and hundreds of thousands in the south from death by starvation this winter?

Mr. Hogg: As the House is well aware, my hon. Friend has been deeply involved in trying to take assistance to the people of south Iraq. She deserves all our praise.

The suffering in south Iraq, especially among the Shia people, is one of the reasons why it was thought right to impose a no-fly zone south of parallel 32.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Has not the ceasefire agreement been systematically broken over the past two years, ever since it was signed by Iraq's criminal regime? Saddam Hussein has taken every possible opportunity to test and tease the allies.

I understand the difficulties that arose when the war of aggression against Kuwait was decisively defeated; but does not the Minister appreciate that many people—probably not least those in Iraq—are asking why the allies did not take the opportunity of ending once and for all the bloodstained tyranny that has been responsible for so many deaths and tortures in Iraq, and for all that has occurred since the invasion of Kuwait?

Mr. Hogg: I well understand why people ask on occasion why Saddam Hussein was not removed at the end of the Gulf war. The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind, however, that we were part of a coalition acting under the authority of the United Nations, for the purposes authorised by the Security Council and none other. Had we tried to go beyond the scope of those authorised purposes, the coalition would have fallen apart—and, incidentally, Ministers would have betrayed the word that they gave hon. Members in the House.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Does my right hon. Friend agree that Saddam Hussein has won every move on the board? He is still in power, and he is still mocking all the western countries and treating them as a laughing stock.

What worries me particularly is the fact that, for some years, one of my constituents has been waiting for compensation for the death of her husband in Baghdad. There has been no movement whatever. The United Nations compensation committee has agreed that she should receive compensation, but Saddam Hussein simply refuses to sell oil for that purpose. Is it not time that he was taught a fundamental lesson in keeping his word? Should we not go in and do exactly what the United Nations has recommended, instead of playing what amounts to a game of draughts with him? Is it not time for firm action?

Mr. Hogg: I do not agree with my hon. Friend's observation that Saddam Hussein has won every game on the board. He has not. He invaded Iran; he lost that war, and tens of thousands of his people were killed. He invaded Kuwait; he lost that war too, and again tens of thousands of his people were killed. His country is now in a state of ruin. That is not winning every game on the board.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): The Minister's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) was disingenuous, to say the least. Hostilities ceased because of American domestic political opinion, not because our forces would have been acting beyond the constraint of the United Nations resolution; and the Republican Guard army units just north of our forces should have been taken out.

Will the Minister tell us which idiot left those Silkworms where they are? They pose a real threat.

Mr. Hogg: I was responding to a specific question from the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick)—whether we should in some way have deprived Saddam Hussein of the leadership of Iraq. My point was that we were acting within the authority given to us by the Security Council; we could not go outside that authority without the coalition falling apart, and without Ministers having misled the House in previous statements.

Sir George Gardiner (Reigate): I refer to my right hon. and learned Friend's comment about the need to maintain the coalition at the end of the Gulf war. Will he give a further assurance that, if counter-action against Saddam Hussein is authorised, at least he will do his level best to ensure that this time the effort does not fall short of the objectives to be achieved?

Mr. Hogg: We shall proceed, in anything we do, in accordance with the principles of international law.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why does not the Government more strenuously support the Iraqi opposition abroad, and in particular the Iraqi National Congress? Should not moneys owned by the Iraqi Government in the form of assets abroad be defrozen in part and handed to the INC to promote its internal campaigning in Iraq and to give it credibility in Baghdad?

Mr. Hogg: We have done various things to encourage the Iraqi opposition. We welcome the fact that a broad-based opposition is developing because that provides the people of Iraq with an alternative. As to compensation and assets, the hon. Gentleman makes an interesting proposal that has not yet been advanced. I can see two obvious difficulties. It would be a clear breach of the Security Council resolution freezing those assets, and there is a whole range of other claims on them. However I shall reflect on the hon. Gentleman's point, as I do on all his points.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Has my right hon. and learned Friend held any discussions with the Kuwaiti Government, and will he confirm that it is no use the international community extending threats to Saddam Hussein, but that it must publicly be seen to be prepared to act?

Mr. Hogg: Discussions with the Kuwaiti Government have continued over many months, and will naturally continue. As to Iraq's violations of Kuwait, it is important for us to say that Iraq must comply with the Security Council resolutions and cease its violations of the no-fly zone—otherwise it will be exposed to great risk.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Count some of us out of the so-called all-party, cross-party agreement. Why is it that Al Ahram and the rest of the authoritative Egyptian press are against military action? Was not the Foreign Secretary's candid answer—which the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows very well—to my question on Egyptian and Bahraini support a blunt "No"? They do not support us in military action in the circumstances.

Mr. Hogg: One interesting aspect of the Security Council discussion and of the debate about Iraq generally is the broad consensus in support of the proposition that Saddam Hussein must comply with Security Council resolutions and cease to infringe the no-fly zones. There is very broad agreement for the proposition that, if Iraq does not do those things, it faces serious consequences.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill)—that Saddam Hussein has twice been severely defeated in the battlefield recently, but why do we continue to permit him to turn military defeat into propaganda victory? What steps are the Government taking in the Security Council to obtain its authority to take action to stop once and for all Saddam Hussein's retreat and cheat tactics?

Mr. Hogg: The best thing we can do to deflate Saddam Hussein's reputation is to explain the facts. They point to continued and dramatic failure—loss of the war against Iran, loss of the war in Kuwait, and a total destruction of Iraq's economy. That pattern of failure has seldom been surpassed.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead) rose——

Madam Speaker: Mr. George Gardiner—I mean Mr. George Galloway.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): My hon. Friend is much better looking.

Madam Speaker: My apologies all round.

Mr. Galloway: Notwithstanding the consensus that exists across the Front Benches, I must say—like my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—that, whatever bloody act has been planned, it will not be done in my name, in the name of many people in this country or in the name of many members of the coalition that fought the Gulf war only a couple of years ago. Does not the Minister understand that, in the Islamic world and elsewhere, the new coalition is regarded as a bunch of bloody hypocrites? They are ready to pulverise Iraq for its transgressions against international agreements, yet stand by and watch while Israel—which for nearly 40 years has been breaking every international law in the book—expels, imprisons, tortures and kills people in occupied territories every day of the week; and they do absolutely nothing while Bosnian Muslims are massacred in the centre of Europe. They will be seen as a bunch of hypocrites and will receive the response from the international community that they deserve.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman's threat that he will be unable to support any action that we may have in mind is a threat that can be borne with equanimity.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Given that, sadly, my right hon. Friend has unfinished business still to be accomplished, will he ensure that, rather than concentrating on the no-fly zone over southern Iraq, Her Majesty's Government and their western allies will concentrate on creating an effective no-go zone for Iraqi troops on the ground in neighbouring Kuwait? Will he also ensure that any further incursions into Kuwait by Iraqi forces or civilians will not go unpunished—because, if they do, Saddam Hussein will be further emboldened to defy international opinion and international law and to commit further acts of aggression?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend will have heard me say in answer to the private notice question that the Secretary-General is of the opinion that what has happened in Kuwait constitutes a serious breach of the relevant procedures. In answer to his question, let me make it plain that Iraq must comply with the resolutions of the Security Council and must cease to infringe the no-fly zone. If she does not, she faces very serious consequences.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): As some sort of military response on the part of the Gulf war coalition seems more and more probable, can the Minister comment on reports that, this time round, the use of airfields in Turkey will be denied to the coalition forces?

Mr. Hogg: I do not wish to speculate about matters of that kind.

Points of Order

3.52 pm

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have already given you notice of my intention to raise a point of order concerning a Scottish Office memorandum sent by the parliamentary clerk to the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch). The parliamentary clerk informed the hon. Gentleman that he would be tabling a question for him on transport subsidies of the "good news" type, saying that it should not present him with any difficulties. The answer duly appeared at column 466 of Hansard of 17 December. The parliamentary question's signature was indistinct.

Having referred to earlier instances in Hansard, I know that former Speakers have taken a very serious view of such matters. For example, Hansard of 20 November 1975 refers to a similar incident involving two former Members —George Cunningham and Jeremy Thorpe. On that occasion, the Speaker was unequivocal in his statement that no Member can table a Question for another Member unless he has the agreement of that Member—in other words, unless that second Member wishes the Question to be tabled.

In this case, it was a civil servant who tabled the Question. That is completely against the rules of the House and also against the civil service compromise, being in pursuit of the objectives not of the Government but of political masters. Given that disgraceful state of affairs, I am referring the matter to the Select Committee on Procedure. But, more than anything, I seek your view and your guidance, Madam Speaker, on what should be done to ensure that hon. Members are protected and the integrity of the House is maintained.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Member has raised what is potentially a very serious matter. I should like an opportunity further to examine the circumstances, after which I shall give a considered ruling.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will be aware of the problems we face in Tayside with the weather. You will also be aware that I made an application under Standing Order No. 20. Can you tell me whether I did anything that was out of order? If so, can you tell me how I can go about changing my ways?

Madam Speaker: What the hon. Gentleman did was in order. He also knows that I seriously consider such matters, and I give no reasons for my decision. I know that he will not press me.

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker. There is a serious aspect to the point raised. Has the Secretary of State for Social Security informed you whether he intends to come to the House to make a statement on the very severe weather conditions which have affected Scotland and many other parts of Britain in the past few days, leaving many elderly and infirm people trapped in their homes——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman need not argue the case with me. I can answer him and the whole House: no Minister has informed me that he wishes to make a statement.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As part of the changed ways of the House, brought about by Mr. Speaker Weatherill but not practised by Mr. Speaker Selwyn Lloyd and many of his predecessors, one could make an application under Standing Order No. 20 on the unsatisfactory nature of a statement in answer to a private notice question or questions themselves.

Against that background, I should like to make an application under Standing Order No. 20 on the imminent military action to be taken against Iraq. The House will know that there are deep issues as to whether the Gulf allies, especially Egypt and Bahrain, have in any way——

Madam Speaker: Order. Let me put this to the hon. Gentleman. I recognise him regularly in the House which allows him to put across his opinion. I value that, and I know that he values it. However, he cannot now argue the case with me again. No new facts have arisen whereby he can now make an application under Standing Order No. 20. He made such an application earlier today which I could not hear. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will now accept what I have to say.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Madam Speaker: Is it further to the point of order?

Mr. Dalyell: Yes, and there is also a point of principle. We cannot know whether ministerial answers will be satisfactory or unsatisfactory. In the case of the Foreign Secretary, a number of my hon. Friends gasped at the answer that he gave to a factual question. We could not know that the Secretary of State would not answer the question about Egypt and Bahrain, but evade it.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not argue the policy with me. New factors must arise before I can allow an application to be made under Standing Order No. 20. New factors have not arisen, and the hon. Gentleman cannot argue the matter with me now. He can make an application under Standing Order No. 20 tomorrow or at any other time, but not now.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker——

Madam Speaker: No, there is nothing further to that point of order. I have dealt with the matter.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Further to the point of order on the weather conditions in Scotland, Madam Speaker. I refer to the issue of applications made under Standing Order No. 20 and the allocation of them. You will appreciate that the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) was not the only hon. Member to make an application under Standing Order No. 20 today and to have his application rejected.

When severe weather conditions prevailed in London and the south of England some two years ago, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Social Security gave contradictory statements daily in the House until new regulations were tabled—a minor improvement. Many of us who represent Scottish constituencies now face the position in which many of our pensioners and disabled——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is trying my patience. I have already dealt with that matter. She put in a Standing Order No. 20 application to me earlier. She knows full well that I cannot hear it. She must not pursue the matter with me now.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During the private notice question on Iraq a Conservative Member said that all Members of this House supported military action. You rightly called some Opposition Members to refute that and say that it would not be done in their name. But, of course, that did not give the opportunity to all Members of Parliament who oppose such military action, such as myself, to put it on the record that we oppose——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is trying to prolong the debate. I do my very best to call Members representing a variety of opinion in this House. That is what it is all about.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that President Bush has just authorised an air attack on Iraq. We have just had a statement from the Minister of State but that news was not given to us. I wonder whether exceptionally you could extend for a further period questions to the Minister so that we can find out whether the action is taken in compliance with security——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that I do not have that authority.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether you could give some guidance on Standing Order No. 20. As you know, at one time—certainly when my party was in government—there were six or seven applications a day at least on some occasions. There were few days, if any, when the Conservative Opposition did not have the opportunity—unsuccessfully on most occasions—of submitting three or four applications. You were here at the time in another capacity and you were aware of that practice.

I am also aware that your predecessor made certain changes to the interpretation of the Standing Order, which presumably you also apply. May I bring it to your attention that in 1979 a debate took place on the Floor of the House on a recommendation by the then Procedure Committee that Members should not be in a position to make an application for an emergency debate? Fortunately, that recommendation was defeated. When a Back Bencher makes a Standing Order No. 20 application it usually means that you will hear it and no more. Perhaps unfortunately, it is rare that an application is successful.

May I have your guidance, Madam Speaker? Are you saying that it would be useful, perhaps before one submits an application to your office, to accept that it has become a rare occurrence even to be in a position to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20?

Although my views are diametrically opposite to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who has unsuccessfully made an application, surely the subject that he wished to raise is of great significance. As a Back-Bench Member of Parliament, does he not have a right like the rest of us at least to put a case to you for an emergency debate?

Madam Speaker: So long as the basic requirements of the Standing Order are met, that is perfectly in order. However, Standing Order No. 20 applications are made to me regularly by many Members every day. As Speaker, I have to determine whether the criteria are met so that the application might be heard. I read many applications every day of a working week.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you confirm that if the Government seek to make a statement tonight you will grant permission for a Minister to make a statement about any possible aggressive action by the United States, using the name of the United Nations or any other combination? Will the annunciators give adequate notice to Members that a statement will be made tonight, should the Government make a statement? In the view of many Members, they ought to make a statement.

Madam Speaker: That is somewhat hypothetical at this stage, but as usual I will look extremely carefully at any request that is made to me at any time. We must now proceed.

BILLS PRESENTED

Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland)

Mr. Phil Gallie presented a Bill to amend section 23(2) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 in relation to certain planning certificates: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 29 January, and to be printed. [Bill 110.]

Animal Experimentation (Cosmetics)

Mr. Jimmy Dunnachie, supported by Mr. Don Dixon, Sir Teddy Taylor, Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. Phillip Oppenheim, Mr. Jimmy Wray, Mr. Gordon McMaster, Mr. James Pawsey, Mr. Archy Kirkwood and Mr. Norman Hogg, presented a Bill to prohibit the use of animals in the development and testing of cosmetics: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 29 January, and to be printed. [Bill 111.]

Ban of Imports (Child Labour)

Mr. Jimmy Dunnachie, supported by Mr. Alan Meale, Dr. John Reid, Mr. David Marshall, Mrs. Irene Adams, Mr. Thomas McAvoy, Mr. Michael J. Martin, Mr. Stanley Orme and Mr. Thomas Graham, presented a Bill to prohibit the sale of imported goods, the manufacture of which has involved child labour: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 29 January, and to be printed. [Bill 112.]

Gaming Machines (Prohibitions on use by Persons Under Eighteen)

Mr. Jimmy Dunnachie, supported by Mrs. Irene Adams, Mr. Jimmy Wray, Mr. Jimmy Hood, Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. Frank Cook, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. George Galloway, Mr. Keith Vaz and Mr. Mike Watson, presented a Bill to prohibit the use of gaming machines in cafes, small shops, amusement arcades, snack bars, fairgrounds and other places by persons under the age of eighteen: and the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 29 January, and to be printed. [Bill 113.]

Energy (Fair Competition)

4.4 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to eliminate unfair competition in the import, production and sale of coal, oil, natural gas, nuclear power, electricity and other primary and secondary energy sources.

The aim of this Bill is unashamedly to save the pits and to defend coalfield communities. This is an appropriate day on which to introduce the measure as, 100 years ago today, Keir Hardie, who had been a Scottish miners' leader, met fellow socialists at the inaugural conference of the Independent Labour party. The conference was held in Bradford and at that time Keir Hardie was editor of the paper that he had founded, which was appropriately named "The Miner". By 1893, Hardie was already a Member of Parliament and was fighting the cause of the unemployed. My Bill is directed at preventing further unemployment today, and is, I hope, in the tradition of that great Labour pioneer.

The need for my Bill arises because of the Government's failure even to debate in the House the threatened pit closure programme. All that we have heard from the Government is a statement from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 19 October, almost three months ago. It has been left to the Opposition to raise the issue, through an Opposition day debate, through initiatives by Members at Question Time, and on an earlier ten-minute Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington). Otherwise, the pit closure issue has emerged only through the invaluable work undertaken by the Select Committees on Trade and Industry and on Employment.

Deep-mined coal faces a crazy situation. Mines are breaking productivity records, yet a fixed and fiddled energy market denies British Coal the opening to sell sufficient of its highly efficient production. The Bill will unfix the fix against the coal industry. It is a fix to guarantee sales to uncompetitive producers in the nuclear power industry and gas-fired power stations, while electricity is also being unfairly imported through a French interconnector and dumped imports of foreign coal, and through orimulsion, which has a high sulphur content.

Under the legislation to establish electricity privatisation, regional electricity companies are obliged to purchase a slice of their electricity from non-fossil fuel sources. In practice, such purchases come overwhelmingly from nuclear power. In addition, there is an 11 per cent. levy on electricity supplied to consumers from fossil fuel generation. Under the arrangement, nuclear power generation is subsidised to the tune of £1·3 billion per year and it is set to remain in place until 1998. The subsidy is being used to extend the lives of the obsolete Magnox stations and for the construction of Sizewell B.

The Bill will offer the Government two options: either the nuclear levy will be abolished and assistance be provided only to the nuclear industry for decommissioning projects, which will lead to the closure of the high-cost Magnox power stations and create a market for between 7 and 8 million tonnes a year, or the coal industry will have to receive the same subsidy as the nuclear industry—a move that would lead to a dramatic growth of export revenues for our home production and stimulate growth in the British economy.

Gas-fired stations are being built independently of National Power and PowerGen. Their new capacity would displace 30 million tonnes of coal a year. In the main, the gas-fired stations have important links with the regional electricity companies—often through an equity stake. Those stations have already secured or intend to secure long-term sweetheart contracts with their regional electricity companies. Those contracts will usually last up to 15 years.

The link between the electricity producer and the supplier makes economic sense to the regional electricity companies, but not to the customers. The new gas-fired stations wil be more expensive than the existing coal-fired ones. My Bill would halt that economic madness by suspending long-term contracts for those gas-fired stations and by obliging them to sell their electricity in open competition. As a result, some 20 projects in the pipeline would probably be dropped, and gas burn would be reduced at other stations. That would also preserve United Kingdom reserves which would otherwise be dangerously depleted.

There is a two-way link between the national grid and France, but, in practice, it has become a one-way system for the import of French electricity to Britain. That has occurred in part because of the competitive advantage given to French electricity by the fossil fuel levy in England and Wales. The current contract with the French expires in March 1993, and my Bill is designed to prevent it from being renewed. That would create a market for 7 million tonnes of coal a year.

It would be of little competitive advantage to the deep-mined coal industry of Britain, however, if its potential sales were mainly picked up through further coal imports and the expansion of opencast production. There is evidence that coal imported into the European Community, including the United Kingdom, is being exported at prices below those at which such coal would be sold on its domestic market, and below its production cost.

My Bill would therefore ban the import of coal into Britain unless it could be proven not to be dumped here. Certified and checkable claims would have to be issued for the place of origin of that coal, its home market price and the cost of production. Furthermore, my Bill would require action by Britain, through the European Commission, to seek to extend that practice into other member states. For instance, 95 per cent. of Danish electricity is produced from coal that is currently imported from Colombia, but that contract is shortly to be transferred to South Africa.

The opencast coal potential in Britain is massive. The remaining pits in Derbyshire are threatened with closure, but the area is in danger of being swamped by opencast mining, which would result in massive social and environmental costs. Opencast mining, however, occupies a uniquely privileged position in the United Kingdom planning system. Mining planning guidance note 3—MPG 3—provides presumptions in favour of such planning applications and inhibits the work of local authorities seeking to act on behalf of their communities' interests.

My Bill would abolish MPG 3. Stricter conditions would be laid down for opencast applications, to include the distance of the sites from communities and the need for rail links for the movement of coal from those mines. My Bill would contain a formula to ensure the guaranteed life of all existing pits, which would ensure that commercial practices and delegated legislation are not subsequently introduced to defeat its effects. That formula would be based on an assessment of the size and extraction rate of coal reserves.

I seek leave to bring in the Bill, the exact drafting of which I am still prepared to discuss with the President of the Board of Trade, given that I have now beaten him to the task.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harry Barnes, Mr. Eric Clarke, Mr. Bill Etherington, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe, Mr. Tony Benn, Mr. Ronnie Campbell, Mr. Martin Redmond, Mrs. Helen Jackson, Mr. Alan Meale and Mr. Bob Cryer.

ENERGY (FAIR COMPETITION)

Mr. Harry Barnes accordingly presented a Bill to eliminate unfair competition in the import, production and sale of coal, oil, natural gas, nuclear power, electricity and other primary and secondary energy sources: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 January and to be printed. [Bill 114.]

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 2 December]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Clause 1

TREATY ON EUROPEAN UNION

4.16 pm

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): The first amendment to be selected is No. 40.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You will be aware that when, in Committee, there arises a problem relating to a matter outside the Committee—particularly if it has arisen since the Committee last met—it is within the power of the Chair to accept a motion for the adjournment of debate so that matters may be clarified. I understand that the equivalent procedure on the Floor of the House follows virtually the same criteria, but that a Member moves that the Chairman report progress. I ask you, Sir, to allow me to move that motion.

Since we last met, there have been events that I suggest require clarification and a response from the Government before proper consideration of the Bill can be continued. We are glad to see the Minister of State here, and I emphasise that the prospect of his disappearance is not the reason for my request. Nor is it the failure of the Attorney-General, who owes me a letter, to put in an appearance. The reason for my request is the decision, taken at the Edinburgh summit meeting, in relation to Denmark and the statement about it that the Prime Minister made in the House on 14 December.

There is some doubt about the status of this decision. Some people say that it is a treaty; some say that it is not. Some say that, in practice, it amends the treaty that we are discussing; some say that it does nothing of the sort, that it affects only Denmark. Some say that it can be justiciable in international law—as, indeed, the Prime Minister has claimed; others are presenting papers, which I believe are well known to hon. Members, indicating that it cannot. Some say that it can be binding on the parties; others say that it cannot, as only seven members of the European Communities are actually bound by the rules of the International Court of Justice.

The Chairman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, to whose comments I have been listening attentively. He is seeking clarification on a number of political points, and I understand his desire for such clarification. He keeps using the words "there is some doubt". I am sure that, as he did not manage to catch my eye on either of the previous two days of debate, he will wish to do so today. He may well wish to weave into his speech some of the doubts and points of clarification to which he has been referring.

However, I cannot at this stage accept a debate on political points. In case any hon. Member may have forgotten over the Christmas recess, I must emphasise that this Bill does not ratify the treaty; it makes changes in domestic law consequential upon the treaty. I therefore regret that I am unable to accept the hon. Gentleman's proposition for a dilatory motion.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I wish to seek clarification on two procedural points. First, shall we, during this Committee stage, follow the normal procedure whereby hon. Members are entitled to speak more than once on any amendment? Secondly, bearing in mind the fact that our proceedings are likely to last for many weeks and that we have other duties, which cannot be completely abandoned, will it be acceptable for hon. Members to leave the Chamber during the discussion and return still hoping to catch your eye?

The Chairman: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first point is yes and the answer to the second point is that it depends on how many hon. Members wish to catch my eye and for how long they speak.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. A problem will arise in the debate that we are about to have, which covers titles II to IV. I remind you and the House of the words used to define titles II to IV in the Bill:

"Titles II, III and IV of the Treaty on European Union signed at Maastricht on 7th February 1992, together with the other provisions of the Treaty so far as they relate to those Titles, and the Protocols adopted at Maastricht on that date".

Twice in those words reference is made to the date of 7 February 1992, but, since that date and particularly in December, additional points were made on issues that fall within titles II and IV.

For example, within title II, the issue and definition of citizenship arise. However, at the December summit, Ministers made a further decision on refining, or at least stating and supplementing, the provisions in the treaty on the question of citizenship. It is section A of the citizenship provision in the Danish decision. That is part and parcel of the provisional articles which will fall within the compass of this debate yet will be additional to it.

Reference is also made, in section B of the Danish decision, to economic and monetary union, which again falls within the scope of today's debate, within titles II to IV. They, too, are a supplement to the treaty.

The Chairman: Order. I have the gist of what the hon. Gentleman is trying to say. He must accept that I have done a little preparation for this afternoon's debate. The issues under titles II to IV are very broad, and I expect —although I do not encourage—hon. Members to hold a broad debate. They will want to seek clarification of various issues. I think that allusions to the two points that the hon. Gentleman raised would be in order this afternoon if he can catch my eye.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Various decisions have come about fairly recently in Europe. One has to do with the cohesion or slush fund in terms of the contribution which this country will have to make following the Edinburgh summit. Another is to do with the special provisions made for Denmark. With regard to Denmark, there is a question about whether this is justiciable. A further question relates to how subsidiarity will be incorporated into law.

On all those issues, points will be made during the debate, and we shall no doubt get answers from the Government. They will give their best answers as a result of their best endeavours, but decisions on all those issues are made by bodies outside the House, outside the Government and outside the country. Decisions on the budget will be made by the Commission——

The Chairman: Order. What is the point of order for the Chair? There is none, is there?

Mr. Marlow: Yes, there is.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Marlow: Bunches of people outside the country will tell us what to do. Should we not ask them what they mean before debating the issue?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is a colleague of mine, and I hope that he will recognise that factor. If he has had a good lunch, perhaps he will have a good supper, too.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I wish to know how you intend to proceed with today's business. The treaty that we are debating is about the provisions that we should use to advance European integration. That was all agreed by the member states and put in the treaty document. Title II is at the heart of the treaty and it would not be unreasonable to conclude that amendment No. 40, which is the lead amendment today, is nothing short of a wrecking amendment. My point of order does not challenge——

The Chairman: Order. I would not have selected the amendment had it been a wrecking amendment.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it in order for a representative of the Treasury to comment on the expected date of the Third Reading? The matchless negotiating skills of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss) secured that Third Reading would take place after the Danish referendum. That assumption, I think, has generally held.

It is now quite clear that there is a fragile political situation in Denmark, and no one would like to postulate whether the Prime Minister or the Government will survive. In those circumstances, should the referendum then be postponed owing to the Danish domestic situation, I wonder whether we might have confirmation from the Treasury Bench that the commitment to hold the Third Reading after the referendum date still stands.

The Chairman: That was not actually a point of order to the Chair, was it? There are business questions tomorrow, which might be a more appropriate——

Mr. Biffen rose——

The Chairman: Order. I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, but it is not a matter for the Chair. It will have been heard on the Treasury Bench. It seems to me that business questions tomorrow would be a more appropriate occasion on which to ask that sort of question.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. May I draw to the attention of the House the statements on the tape attributed to Mr. Lawrence Eagleburger, to the effect that American forces may well attack Iraq? May I, through you, Mr. Morris, ask Ministers whether, if British forces are involved in military action and there is any American attack on Iraq, a statement will be made to the House forthwith?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman knows that Madam Speaker has commented on that. I was in the Chamber at the time, as he was.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. With respect to a submission made last time we were sitting and the invitation that we hoped to extend to the Attorney-General to take part in our proceedings, serious questions have been raised about the validity of the decisions arrived at in Edinburgh, and they could have a bearing on the scope and title of this particular Bill.

As the hon. Member for Methyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has just said, the Bill states that the treaty is the treaty signed on 7 February. If there were any serious doubts about whether or not the changes made in Edinburgh were legally binding and had effect within the framework of the treaty, we would not now be considering the same treaty as that which was signed on 7 February. I should therefore be grateful, Mr. Moris, if you could consider whether the Attorney-General might give us a clear indication on that.

The Chairman: Those on the Treasury Bench will have heard the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You said earlier that this Bill was not a Bill to ratify the treaty but was merely to deal with the internal consequences in British domestic law of the treaty. You also suggested that it might be possible in a wide-ranging debate to deal with the decision taken at Edinburgh which was outside the framework of the European Community —taken by Heads of Government quite separately—to do with Denmark. But since the view from the Treasury Bench appears to be that the decision is outdside the treaty, that it is not an amendment of the treaty but something quite separate, do I take it that, if it is in order to refer to that decision in the present debate, it will also be in order to seek to amend the Bill to incorporate that decision?

The Chairman: The right hon. Gentleman well knows from the previous two days of debate that I must ask hon. Members on both sides, if they wish me to consider amendments, to put them in writing. When they are received in writing, I will give the amendments detailed consideration and will hope very much to draw a conclusion on them. I also make it clear to the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) that I did say that the points that were raised could be alluded to and passing references made to them. I think that that is what is appropriate at the present point.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Have you had an opportunity to discuss with the Select Committee on Procedure ways in which we can make as rapid progress with the Bill as possible, in order that it can move swiftly to ratification in this country's interests? There is in general debate in the Chamber an opportunity for the Speaker to apply the 10-minute rule. Is there any way in which we can give as many hon. Members as possible the opportunity to speak in Committee? It is not normally done, I understand, but it would give an opportunity to many hon. Members.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is right—there is no such thing as a ten-minute rule in Committee. I hope that even the idea of it will not be necessary.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Like many other hon. Members, I am worried about the status of the decision taken at Edinburgh and how it will affect Denmark. I think that you described the issue as a political one which could be raised and discussed in the ordinary course of events, but is it a political matter? Is it not a legal and constitutional matter, and therefore one on which, before we can proceed with a Bill that could be profoundly altered by the answer to the question, we should have a statement from the Attorney-General?

4.30 pm

The Chairman: Hon. Members will have their own views on all such matters. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who first raised a point of order, sought clarification on a number of issues. He was perfectly right to do so, but the Chair cannot provide the answer to any of his doubts.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The Bill is about changing United Kingdom domestic law. You will be aware that a unitary Parliament —set up by the Act of Union of 1707 between Scotland and England—was created to devise United Kingdom domestic law. That Act produced, among many other things, the British citizen. I trust that it will be in order to explore the implications of the effect that changes in United Kingdom law will have north of the border. Those changes will affect the original Act of 1707, which has since been amended by agreement.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise that issue. However, I think that he will have a busy time tracking the changes that have taken place between 1707 and 1992. I wish him good luck on his journey.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek to follow up in a different way the issue raised by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). You said that hon. Members could consult widely and seek legal assistance. I am not sure that that is always the case. You, Sir, as the Chairman of the Committee seeking to safeguard the interests of the House—and within the House, of individual Members—have recourse to considerable legal expertise. Have you, in your role as representative of Back Benchers' interests, asked your legal advisers whether the changes that took place in Edinburgh have a major bearing on the Bill?

If so, it will be totally inappropriate for the House to continue to consider a Bill that was signed on 7 February last year, despite the fact that we began discussions in Committee in December—before the Edinburgh summit. As a member of your panel, I believe that we are discussing an important constitutional, not political, issue.

The Chairman: Every point of order that is in order is important. I have made it clear that no hon. Member has precedence over another hon. Member. I do not disclose the source of my advice. As all hon. Members who have spoken so far have said, they seek clarification because they have doubts. They may have their own opinions but, with the greatest respect, the opinion of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) may not be shared by all other hon. Members. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman will seek to catch my eye, raise his questions and see what answer he receives.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: No. I call Mr. Spicer.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. What will the voting procedure be under this interesting cluster arrangement that you have invented? As I understand it——

The Chairman: Order. I have not invented any cluster arrangement. I am here to assist the Committee, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel that I am doing so. I have told every hon. Member that my door is open. The hon. Gentleman did not come to see me during the recess, nor has he done so since I have been back. I hope that he finds nothing to criticise in the organisation of the amendments.

Mr. Spicer: I hastily withdraw any implication of criticism in my use of the word "invention", Sir. I used it in a favourable sense, because I thought that it was an imaginative way to debate these issues. Other hon. Members may not feel the same, but I am left in some confusion about how we are to proceed with the detailed voting.

My question is factual. Am I right in thinking that, typically on each cluster, we shall vote perhaps for the closure, and then for the lead amendment, and vote on the other amendments when we reach the appropriate point in the Bill? If that is right, and as this is a short Bill, how will we know the exact point at which votes on the other amendments will occur?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is up to hon. Members to decide whether to have a vote on each lead amendment. That is not a matter for me, but I imagine that there will be votes on some lead amendments. The hon. Gentleman has been in the House for the same time as I have. He will have to do some homework on when the other votes fall.

Mr. Rowlands rose——

Mr. Shore rose——

Mr. Marlow rose——

The Chairman: Order. The three hon. Members who are on their feet are seeking to catch my eye again, but I suggest that it is now time to make progress on the Bill. We are anxious to hear again the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) speaking to this amendment; perhaps, later, other amendments will be moved.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I shall allow it, because it is the hon. Gentleman's first point of order in this series.

Mr. Skinner: I have been listening carefully. You told the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who is your constituency neighbour, that he had had a heavy lunch, which implied that he had come here semi-drunk or whatever. You have just told a Tory ex-Minister——

The Chairman: Order. I have made no allegation, nor can it be inferred from what I said that any hon. Member has come in here drunk one way or the other. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is an old friend, a good colleague and a close neighbour, and he knows jolly well what I meant. I am sure that he accepted the spirit in which I spoke.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), who is an ex-Minister, is another hon. Friend of yours, and you have just told him to go and do his homework. I am not upset by Tories falling out like Kilkenny cats, and if you want to continue to do that, get on with it. The important issue is that you are in the Chair and have a duty to ensure that the debate is properly conducted. You should not make remarks for which you would pull up a Back Bencher. You are inciting us to say such things on many other occasions. Mind your language. You have told me to mind mine many times.

The Chairman: That is not a point of order, and it is not particularly helpful.

Mr. Rowlands rose——

Mr. Denzil Davies rose——

Mr. Shore rose——

Mr. Marlow rose——

The Chairman: I shall take second points of order from the four hon. Members who are on their feet. I hope that they sense the feeling of hon. Members that we wish to get on with the debate.

Mr. Shore: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As you will be aware, because I wrote to you about the matter, new clause 10 is to be considered in a group of amendments although it is different in style and content from all the amendments in that group. It would be helpful to the Committee and certainly to me if you were able at the appropriate time to call a separate vote on the new clause.

The Chairman: I shall consider the matter when we see how the debate is going.

Mr. Rowlands: I seek clarification of your ruling, Mr. Morris. You said that we could make a passing reference to the Danish decision, because there will be a wide-ranging debate. Does that mean that, when issues of citizenship and monetary union come to be considered in greater detail, we shall not be able to discuss the Danish decision and the decision made at the Edinburgh summit?

The Chairman: No, I did not rule that out at all.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I, too, seek clarification, Mr. Morris. You have said that a passing reference to the Danish decision will be allowed. I put it to you, with respect, that the Chair should decide whether the Danish decision is within the confines of the Bill—strictly, that decision falls outside the Maastricht treaty—or outside them. If the decision is without the confines of the Bill, we know that your natural generosity will allow a passing reference to it, but the matter should be clarified for the sake of speeches that are made at a later stage in our consideration of the Bill and on later amendments. Does the Danish decision fall within or without the Bill?

The Chairman: The Bill does not ratify the treaty.

Mr. Davies: We know that.

The Chairman: Good. It makes changes in domestic law that are consequential upon it. Those are the crunch points. Therefore, it does not fall within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek clarification of what you have just said. I think you said, "Therefore, it does not fall within the scope of the Bill." Is it your ruling that the Danish decision does not fall within the scope of the Bill?

The Chairman: That is right, but that does not mean that allusions to it cannot be made.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Unlike the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), with whom I may make common cause later in the debate, I did not see the implication to which he referred in our previous conversation. To clarify the matter, I had lunch in the Members' Dining Room, and the only beverage that I had was coffee. It was a very good lunch.

Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) with regard to the relevance of the Denmark decision and whether it comes within the Bill, you referred, Mr. Morris, to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench listening, and to their ability to comment. May I suggest that these matters are decided not by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench but by the European Court of Justice, which will make the final interpretations and decisions?

In the interests of the House, knowing what is happening and knowing what we are debating, and knowing what is in store if we pass the Bill, which is the ratification of the treaty, is it not appropriate that the House, yourself, Mr. Morris, somebody, or even the Government, should get in touch with the European Court of Justice and put the matter to them so that we know what the facts are?

The Chairman: With regret, it is certainly not possible for me to do that.

Mr. Cash: On the list of amendments that you have selected, Mr. Morris, there is the grouping which refers to a referendum. I believe——

The Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. Member will move amendment No. 40 and then explain why he has done so.

Clause 1

Treaty on European Union

Mr. Cash: I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'II'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 323, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'II'.

No. 11, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 2 on page 9 of Cm. 1934)'.

No. 17, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 138a on page 41 of Cm. 1934)'.

No. 116, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(other than the following provisions set out under Article G—

Paragraph A (1)

Paragraph B (2)

Paragraph B (3)

Paragraph B (4)

Paragraph B (5)

Paragraph B (7)

Paragraph C

Paragraph D (10), (11), (12), (14), (15), (16), (17), (19), (20), (22), (23), (25), (26), (27), (28), (29), (30), (31), (32), (33), (34), (35), (37), (38—except Articles 130, 130r, 130s and Title XVII), (39), (40), (41—except Article 138e), (45), (47), (48), (49), (50), (56), (57), (60), (61), (62), (63), (67), (69), (70), (71), (79), (80), (81), (83) and (84).'.

No. 124, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(excluding Article G B on page 9 to 11 of Cm 1934.)'.

No. 234, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 138a'.

No. 91, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'III'.

No. 20, in page 1, line 9, after 'III', insert '(except Article H on page 60 of Cm 1934).'.

No. 92, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'IV'.

No. 146, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert 'but not Article 1 in Title IV thereof'.

No. 183, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert 'but not Article Q in Title VII thereof'.

No. 122, in page 1, line 10, leave out from '1992' to 'and' in line 11.

No. 117, in page 1, line 12, after 'Protocols', insert 'other than—'

(a) The Protocol on the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank

(b) The Protocol on the Excessive Deficit Procedure

(c) The Protocol on the Convergence Criteria referred to in Article 109 of the Treaty establishing the European Community

(d) The Protocol amending the Protocol on the Privileges and Immunity of the European Community

(e) The Protocol on the Transition to the Third Stage of Economic and Monetary Union

(f) The Protocol on Certain Provisions relating to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

(g) The Protocol on Social Policy

(h) The Protocol on Economic and Social Cohesion.'.

New Clause 10—Report of European Council—

'.—After the European Council has submitted its report after each of its meetings, Her Majesty's Government shall publish and lay such reports, and those annual reports in writing, as required by Title 1, Article D of the Treaty on European Union before Parliament, together with a statement as to their policy and performance in respect of the activities of the Union and their policies for its future.'.

Mr. Cash: In moving amendment No. 40 on title II, I wish to refer briefly to the implications of having a referendum. We have not had a free vote in the House, nor a White Paper. I wish to put it on the record that this is an historic decision, but not to pursue that matter until we come to the question of a referendum. It is important for people to note that there will be an opportunity for a campaign for a referendum throughout the country, which will begin on Sunday at 11.30 am in Hyde park. Having got that point across——

Mr. Ian Taylor: Will my hon. Friend forgive me if I am not there? Will he bear in mind that many hon. Members believe that it is the job of the House to make difficult decisions on a complex Bill and that that is what the true definition of parliamentary scrutiny should be? That is why we oppose a referendum.

Mr. Cash: I should have more sympathy with what my hon. Friend has said if I did not believe, as many other hon. Members and 75 per cent. of the British population believe, that the issue goes to the heart of the manner in which our parliamentary democracy is to be conducted. That is the crucial issue and that is why we seek a referendum.

I wish to refer to the recent statement of Chancellor Kohl of Germany of Monday 4 January with respect to the Edinburgh summit, which has direct relevance to the questions arising on title II. He said:

"the leaders of the European Community expressed their sympathy for Denmark's special reservations, but decided not to change the Maastricht treaty. Reopening negotiations was not, and is not, on our agenda."

He continued:

"In Edinburgh we therefore could go no further than to clarify the relevant treaty clauses to respond to the main Danish concerns. This purely declaratory 'decision' neither changes nor complements the treaty and therefore does not require ratification by member states."

It was with that in mind that I raised the question whether the Attorney-General could or should come to the House —I believe that he should—to explain to us precisely the nature of the decisions taken in Denmark. Undoubtedly there are seriously conflicting opinions. Eminent Queen's counsel believe that the Danish decision was not binding, and the view has been expressed that the matter is being dealt with by an international legal obligation outside the treaty. Indeed, that is what the Government claim.

A major question arises that turns on the nature of the legal commitment, if it be a commitment at all; I believe that it is not. This will ultimately determine the relevance of the Edinburgh summit and the decision that was taken, with vast consequences for the United Kingdom, the Danish people and Europe as a whole. We do not want the treaty ratification procedure to proceed in a state of obscurity and confusion. We want to get the thing out into the open. Accordingly, I believe that it would be important for the Attorney-General—I have written to him and to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, enclosing a copy of a legal assessment that has been produced by some eminent Queen's counsel, to ask for their opinions—to clarify the matter. I have asked my right hon. and learned Friend and right hon. Friend to give me their opinions in writing.

Mr. Spearing: I think that everyone agrees that this is a constitutional matter of some significance. You may recall, Mr. Morris, that we had some difficulty during a previous debate when the Minister was unable immediately to answer some of the questions that were put to him. I wrote to the Attorney-General on the Edinburgh issue on 15 December and asked him to reply before this debate took place. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) may be interested to know that I heard this morning that the Attorney-General would not be replying. I was told that a reply would come from the Minister of State, but that it was unlikely that I would receive it before this debate. I mention that to help the hon. Gentleman and the entire Committee. There are many matters that should be clarified, and especially the views of the Government, before we proceed, because we do not know how they will affect the law of this country.

Mr. Cash: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention which helps to clarify the position.

Title II——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Marlow: Let my hon. Friend get on.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) for giving way. He has obviously studied these matters in some detail. As an agreement has been reached between the Government and the Danish Government on a let-out clause that meets the Danish position, and if there is to be no change in the proposed Maastricht treaty, what is the point or validity of having a referendum in Denmark when nothing has changed since the first referendum?

Mr. Cash: That is the very matter which should be clarified. Does the present position add up to a row of beans? On one interpretation it appears that it does not. The matter must be resolved as we go forward.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I think that I might be able to shed some light on the matter. In his statement to the House, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

"The solution is binding in international law."—[Official Report, 14 December 1992; Vol. 216, c. 23.]

Any reference to Community law is conspicuous by its absence. Is not that the truth of the matter? It might be an international treaty, but it has no validity in Community law.

Mr. Cash: That is where the problem lies. We are talking about the ratification of a treaty. We are dealing with the future of the European Community. Title II amends the whole of the treaty of Rome over a wide range of matters which are set out from page 9 to page 60 of Cm. 1934. All those matters are affected by the legal status of the decisions that are being taken, provided that they are being taken in a proper constitutional manner that can stand up in relation to the European Community itself.

It is no good Governments and others going round, in the belief that they can cobble together decisions on pieces of paper, picking a little bit from one pigeon hole of international law and a little bit from another, nesting here and nesting there. We must know the precise impact of the treaty. The purpose of my opening with Chancellor Kohl's remarks is to illustrate the point that there is no clear understanding, even among the leaders of Europe, of precisely what was decided at Edinburgh.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my hon. Friend invite the Minister to explain how, if, as we understand it, under the European Communities Act 1972, the general body of international law is excluded from consideration under Community law, the treaty can be binding in international law and binding in Community law?

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend, who is a distinguished lawyer, makes yet another good point. The matter must be cleared up. We need to know the treaty's implications for Britain's domestic law in order to decide whether we have a treaty with which we can live.

Mr. Marlow: As that matter is so fundamental to the further consideration of the great issues that are at stake, will my hon. Friend, before he proceeds with his speech, put a positive, generous and pleasant invitation before the Minister to clarify the issue now so that we know where we stand?

Mr. Cash: I am grateful for that suggestion. The Minister of State, who is attentive to these matters at all times, will no doubt want to respond. I do not know whether he wishes to do so now. I see no sign of great movement to the Dispatch Box, but I hope that at least his advisers will bear in mind that we not only ask for but insist upon an answer to the question. The whole range of government of the United Kingdom is being changed dramatically by the treaty and by the provisions of title II. It is not good enough for us to be left in any uncertainty about the impact of the treaty on our domestic law. The ratification of the treaty means that we will be part of a new Community. Therefore, I invite the Minister to make a representation to us in due course, I hope before the end of the day.

Mr. Dalyell: If the hon. Gentleman is so attentive to all these matters, could we be forgiven for wondering how such a diligent colleague brought himself to vote for the Single European Act?

Mr. Cash: The answer to that is extremely simple. I believe in the European Community, it is extremely important and it should be made to work on a realistic basis. The Single European Act, through co-operation and, primarily, through its development of commercial and trading policies, was a sensible way in which to reduce barriers to trade and to increase free trade throughout Europe. The Single European Act is primarily about trading and commercial matters, but the Maastricht treaty is primarily about government.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones) rose——

Mr. Cash: I shall give way to the Minister. I gather that he intends to resign, but we do not yet know whether he has.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Does my hon. Friend also support the extensions of qualified majority voting brought about by the Single European Act? Does he therefore support the principle of qualified majority voting?

Mr. Cash: I have said repeatedly that I am in favour of the notion of an increase in majority voting for specific purposes relating to co-operation in the commercial field which will enable free trade to develop within Europe and at the same time ensure that we can reduce barriers to trade. The Community originated because of difficulties in reducing protectionism. Therefore, it had a logical reason. There is no logical reason for turning over Britain's government and democracy to majority voting. That is political union. The Single European Act was a move towards greater economic union.

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. Friend agree that one thing that has clearly emerged is that the European Court is a highly political organisation? Was it not a highly political organisation at the time of the Single European Act? Many of us thought that if we voted for any form of qualified majority voting, that procedure would be progressively extended by the political movement of the Commission and the Court. How did my hon. Friend find himself able to support the beginnings of that most disagreeable procedure?

Mr. Cash: I am always delighted to reply to a mischievous remark by my hon. Friend. He may recall that I tabled an amendment to the Single European Act which said that nothing in the Act would derogate from the sovereignty of the United Kingdom. My hon. Friend will be glad to know that Mr. Enoch Powell signed that amendment because he believed that it would be a way of containing the implications of the Single European Act described by my hon. Friend. None the less, for the reasons that I have given, I thought the Act necessary to reduce the degree of protectionism.

The Chairman: Order. I imagine that the former Member for Wolverhampton, South-West, Mr. Powell, will wish to read the argument for amendment No. 40 in tomorrow's Hansard. I hope that we can now get on with amendment No. 40 so that he is not disappointed.

Mr. Cash: What does title II involve? Article G turns an economic community into a European community. That is a fundamental change. It is intended to move from the notion of an economic community to a political union. A subsequent amendment in my name deals with political parties in Europe. It is clear from the treaty—I know that many Conservative Members wish it—that European political parties should operate within a politically integrated Europe. That is what the treaty says and it is clear that the idea is for political parties to operate at a European level with a view to integration—political integration in Europe. That is why I object to the change of the words from European Economic Community to European Community. We are debating the construction of a federal treaty, the primary political impetus of which is to be at the European level, and the political parties at that level are intended to replace the national Parliaments.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that in 1972 we were told that we were joining a European Economic Community and that certain provisions would be permanent? They are no longer there. In 1985-86 we were told that the Single European Act had only certain implications and some former members of the Government believed that and supported it, but they have now changed their position. Experience tells us that things go far further than the Bill and that is why the amendments are essential.

Mr. Cash: That is right. The fact is that the single market has been severely abused. The Select Committee on Trade and Industry is now investigating that, and I hope that that will help to make the market work more effectively.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I think that my hon. Friend has let go the challenge issued from the Front Bench rather too easily. If I am not mistaken, Ministers have challenged my hon. Friend to justify his current position, bearing in mind that he voted for the Single European Act in 1986.

Surely the House is entitled to learn from its mistakes. It is clear that many hon. Members believed what they were told by Ministers at the time about the limited implications of the Single European Act. We now see that the Act goes very much further. Should not the House of Commons, of all places—and, indeed, the Government—learn from their mistakes rather more frequently than they do?

Mr. Cash: I agree that we must all learn from our mistakes, but I will not change the position that I have adopted, and have held consistently.

The single market needs to be cleaned up. It has been abused, and I hope that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry will be able to throw some light on the unfair practices that are causing immense damage to British industry, increasing unemployment in this country and worsening the recession.

5 pm

Mr. Marlow: Had my hon. Friend known in advance that the powers for qualified majority voting in the Single European Act would be as heavily abused by the European institutions as we have discovered them to have been, would he have voted for it?

Mr. Cash: The answer to that can be found in what my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) said about the activities of the European Court of Justice. Abuses should be dealt with in that court. I stand by what I said about the single market.

The provisions of article 2, which replaces the previous article 2, include a reference to "sustainable and non-inflationary growth respecting the environment, a high degree of convergence of economic performance, a high level of employment and of social protection".

One thing can be said for certain about the direction in which the European Community is currently going: we are emphatically not seeing a high degree of economic convergence, non-inflationary growth or a high level of employment.

The real problem is that that is a load of rubbish. The words are in the treaty, but there is absolutely no evidence that the way in which the policies are being implemented is having any effect of the kind that is desired. Unemployment in the Community has risen from about 8 million to 15 million over the past few years, and it is expected to rise further to about 30 million. The policies that are being pursued are emphatically not bringing unemployment down. Indeed, I will go further and say that the Maastricht provisions relating to economic and monetary union and to convergence are likely to impose immense pressure for more unemployment. Moreover, the capping of public spending will prevent people from benefiting from an infrastructure that would generate construction work and thus increase employment.

The provisions of article 2 are completely contradicted by what is now happening, and the position is becoming worse rather than better. That in itself is a reason for leaving out article 2. People's expectations are being raised and then dashed. How can anyone imagine that that can continue without serious disruption in Europe? It is bad for business, because it raises expectations that cannot be fulfilled: it is wrong to deceive the workers of Europe into believing that something will happen simply because of what is written on a piece of paper. That is one of my objections to article 2. It is unfair and unrealistic to mislead people in such a way.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's flow, but I feel that his remarks about the clause referring to political parties must be challenged. Presumably he does not object to the Conservative party's playing its part in a wider Conservative/Christian Democratic coalition. If he does not, what does he consider to be the purpose of such involvement?

Mr. Cash: It is clear that some form of political understanding in Europe is required, but that is perfectly achievable within the framework of the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act as it stands. There is no need to go down this further route. We want to enhance the national Parliaments and improve the scrutiny process, which is now lamentable in many member states. It is for precisely such reasons that I object to the fact that all we have at the back of the Maastricht treaty is a declaration relating to national Parliaments. It is not binding in any sense. We want to improve the quality of political decision making in Europe, but the treaty will do exactly the opposite.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. Gentleman mentioned public spending. Many Opposition Members—perhaps the majority; I do not know—find one aspect of that very difficult to understand. How on earth can someone who argues for further public spending to deal with a high level of unemployment—whether in Britain, where it certainly exists, or elsewhere in the Community—defend or justify the maximum gross national product of 3 per cent. that is laid down in the treaty?

At least a page is devoted to the penalties that will be incurred by member countries that go beyond that limit, but no limit is set in regard to unemployment, apart from the reference mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. If the treaty proceeds and such a limit is applied, it will undoubtedly bring about far more unemployment, deflation and misery throughout the Community. I do not see how any member of the Labour movement could possibly support what is being done.

Mr. Cash: That echoes many of the sentiments that I have expressed. Decisions about the allocation of economic and social priorities are currently made in the ballot box in general elections, on the basis of party manifestos, but all that will be taken away—even, in practice, under stage II, by way of gravitational pull into stage III. Under stage II, the European monetary institute will have important and greatly underestimated functions, which were criticised by a member of the Bundesbank council who wrote to me recently. He said that they had not been properly explained to the German people.

The understanding entered into about stage II will have a profound impact on decisions made by the people who will suffer increasing unemployment. In fact, the power to make those decisions is being taken from them and given to members of the European monetary institute. The Governor of the Bank of England, sitting in the monetary institute—under article 8 of the protocol relating to it—will not be able to take instructions as currently prescribed by section 4 of the Bank of England Act 1946.

The massive change taking place under stage II has been greatly underestimated. It strikes at the heart of the way in which we make decisions. Our voters, who are afflicted by the unemployment that is resulting from decisions that are already effectively being implemented, are losing the power to make their own decisions. Such considerations lead some of us to say, in the absence of a free vote, that we must have a referendum. The people must be consulted.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Will my hon. Friend make available the letter from the Bundesbank official about the monetary institute and European monetary union, so that hon. Members can read it?

Mr. Cash: It is not a letter but an article, which makes it clear——

Mr. Dykes: If I may interrupt my hon. Friend, he told the Committee that he had a letter from, I believe, the vice-chairman of the Bundesbank——

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): No, from a member of its council.

Mr. Dykes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He was presumably writing to explain why he has misgivings about the policy formulations in that particular part of the treaty. Will my hon. Friend help by making that letter —written to him, presumably—available to us all?

Mr. Cash: If any correction is required, it is contained in the document that I have, which is not a letter but which throws considerable doubt on the feeings that there were about the monetary institute and the attitudes adopted by the Bundesbank council.

Mr. Dykes: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's description of an article, but that is not the same as his saying—as he clearly and equivocally did just now—that he had received a letter. Presumably it was addressed to him, perhaps in response to one sent by my hon. Friend to a member of the Bundesbank council or because he had been mentioned in the press. It was clearly described as such.

I know that my hon. Friend has been in difficulties with other kinds of letters recently. I received an interim reply from Madam Speaker about an inquiry that is under way in the Serjeant at Arms office because my hon. Friend has apparently been using official envelopes to write to the constituents of other right hon. and hon. Members to tell them about anti-European meetings——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must address the Chair. I am mystified as to the relationship of that point to amendment No. 40. Also, the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is beginning to repeat the speech that he made before Christmas. I listened attentively then and read it carefully, and I do not really want to hear it again. I should like to hear about amendment No. 40, about which we have heard very little in the nearly half an hour that the hon. Member for Stafford has been on his feet.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. A serious allegation has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) against my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). Surely it is only right and proper, in the best traditions of the House, that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford answers that serious allegation about apparent misuse of House of Commons stationery.

The Chairman: That matter is for Madam Speaker and the Serjeant at Arms and not for the Committee stage of a Bill. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members recognise that.

Mr. Dykes: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. May I point out that if I was addressing the Chair incorrectly when you called me to order, it was because I was anxious to hear an explanation from my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford. If it is in order, perhaps he will respond to my latter comments—but I would particularly like an explanation about my hon. Friend's reference to the letter from a member of the Bundesbank council.

Mr. Cash: If it was misunderstood, I withdraw any suggestion that I received a letter from a member of the Bundesbank council. I make that clear. However, the article in question throws grave doubts on the basis on which the EMI was established.

The Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to relate that matter specifically to amendment No. 40 or to leave it aside.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. If the time comes when a closure motion is moved in resepct of this set of amendments, will you bear in mind——

The Chairman: Order. I am not anticipating any future events. I merely want the Committee to proceed with the debate on amendment No. 40—or I hope that it will do so.

Mr. Cash: Citizenship of the union raises a fundamental question about the relationship of the voter to the Government of this country as elected at a general election. Article 8(2) states:

> "Citizens of the Union shall enjoy the rights conferred by this Treaty and shall be subject to the duties imposed thereby."

No specific, clear indication is given of what those duties will be. That article is therefore in the nature of a blank cheque, which presents a serious problem. If we are expected to ratify that provision without being told the nature of those duties, we are being asked to agree to something that the people of this country will not, without an explanation, be able to understand.

Title VI raises the whole question of economic and monetary policy. Its provisions present a serious difficulty in relation to the manner in which decisions are taken, to which I referred when I dealt with the European monetary institute and its relationship to the establishment of the central bank.

By creating that bank for the whole of Europe, a lethal blow is being struck at the heart of democracy for the people of Europe as a whole. We may have an opt-out, but it must be set against the provision relating to the EMI and to the transitional arrangements to which I referred earlier.

5.15 pm

An amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition seeks to leave out the whole of title III, which deals with the European Coal and Steel Community. I do not know what led to that particular provision, wide ranging though it is. However, its importance in relation to the British pit closure programme and to matters that we debated some months ago—which led to the High Court declaring that closure programme unlawful—raises an important question in respect of the European coal and steel industry and its regulation.

I understand that a 100-year contract on very favourable terms, and backed by subsidies, has just been provided to the German coal industry, which will place a very unfair burden on our electricity users. I understand also that the European Commissioner formerly responsible for competition policy, Sir Leon Brittan, who has just changed his portfolio, approved a £3·3 billion deal between the power generators and the heavily subsidised coal industry.

Under that arrangement, which was entered into under the European coal and steel regulations, Britain is presented with a significant problem in respect of its own coal industry. A significant part of that industry, which includes the Trentham colliery in my constituency, is due for closure. It seems wholly wrong that that should have happened in the first place, and under the aegis of the European coal and steel arrangements.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it in order for my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to address the Committee on the European coal and steel industries covered by title III when right hon. and hon. Members are debating an amendment that seeks to eliminate title II?

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will note that the selection list allows for titles II and IV also to be debated. While I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, in that I would expect the hon. Member for Stafford to concentrate on title II, nevertheless his remarks are just in order.

Mr. Cash: When those negotiations are under way, the opportunity to sort out the problems created by unfair subsidies and unfair competition could and should have been taken.

Amendment No. 183, also in my name, refers to article Q in title VII, which prescribes that the period of the treaty shall be unlimited. The treaty itself contains no power for cessation. If it is to be "for an unlimited period", we ought to be given some indication of why, if things go wrong, we will not have an opportunity to reconsider matters.

The provisions of title II are extremely wide ranging and affect all the amendments relating to the treaty of Rome. They go to the heart of the manner in which we would be governed in Europe as a whole. They deal with questions relating to employment, public health and culture and the establishment of trans-European networks. We have been given no justification for the provisions. There has been no White Paper explaining why they have been brought forward; we have had to rely instead on occasional Select Committee hearings, and so on.

It seems to me that the entire title is unnecessary. The policies that lie behind it have not been borne out by practical experience. Britain has a massive trade deficit with the European Community—at present, about £15 billion a year. I seek an improvement in the quality of free trade within the European Community. The present proposals are unnecessary. We should be improving the European Community rather than becoming involved in the governmental matters referred to in the treaty—a move which will cause a serious loss of faith in our ability to work together and co-operate in Europe as a whole.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): Labour's approach to the amendments, to the important provisions of titles II, III and IV—and, indeed, to the Bill as a whole—is to argue for European co-operation as an important dimension of our party's internationalism. For the people of Britain, as for the people of Europe, we want to see the real benefits of a positive future for the European Community.

Mr. Denzil Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The second amendment in the group was tabled by a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself. You have quite properly called the Front-Bench spokeman. May I suggest, however, that the Opposition Front-bench spokeman cannot have an inalienable right to be called to speak immediately after the mover of an amendment and that consideration should be given to those on the Back Benches who have tabled amendments?

The Chairman: There is no inalienable right, but it seemed appropriate on this occasion that I should call the Opposition Front-Bench spokeman. I was hoping also to call the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) before long—but we shall see how we get on.

Mr. Smith: I, too, am concerned that Back Benchers should have a proper opportunity to contribute to our proceedings. It is not the length of Opposition Members' speeches that have prevented them from doing so.

We tabled amendments Nos. 11, 17 and 20 so that we might have an opportunity to present the case for a positive future for Britain in the European Community. They are probing amendments and will not be pressed to a vote.

The Labour party has made it clear how important we believe it is that the Community pursues the principles set out in article 2 of the treaty, which the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) described as rubbish. So far from being rubbish, they are eminently desirable and important goals for Europe to pursue. The article is a powerful statement of the central objectives of the European Community and it is important to get that message across to the public. It states:

"The Community shall have as its task, by establishing a common market and an economic and monetary union and by implementing the common polices or activities referred to in Articles 3 and 3a, to promote throughout the Community a harmonious and balanced development of economic activities, sustainable and non-inflationary growth respecting the environment, a high degree of convergence of economic performance, a high level of employment and of social protection, the raising of the standard of living and quality of life, and economic and social cohesion and solidarity among Member States."

Those important objectives, set out at the beginning of the treaty as the Community's task, set the context, legally as well as politically, within which its other provisions must be interpreted and applied. Britain would be much better off if the Government acted on the provisions of article 2, not least by giving the lead on proposals for concerted European economic recovery rather than obstructing them and watering them down.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): My hon. Friend has listed the new requirements to be introduced into the treaty of Rome by the Maastricht treaty, which includes a high level of employment and of social protection, the raising of standards of living and quality of life and so on. All those are important objectives to which Opposition Members are strongly attached. But article 3a(2) states that the primary objective of economic policy is "to maintain price stability". That has never been an objective of the Labour party—nor, as far as I know, has it been the objective of any economic management in any country. [HON. MEMBERS:"Oh!"] That is stated as the primary objective.

The article then states that the other objectives are to be realised

"without prejudice to this objective".

In other words, the paramount requirement is price stability—destructive though that is certain to be in terms of employment, jobs and economic growth.

Mr. Smith: I am pleased to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) endorse the objectives of article 2, which seem to me to be good enough reason to support it. My hon. Friend referred to price stability. It would be interesting to hear his arguments in favour of price instability. I have yet to see the benefits of price instability to working people and, in particular, to pensioners. There is no merit in price instability. But I know what my hon. Friend was getting at. He sought to make the important point that we should be pursuing policies which, as a whole, promote full employment, prosperity and social justice, and that the goal of price stability should not be allowed to prejudice that.

Mr. Denzil Davies rose——

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Smith: I must make progress. I shall be happy to take further interventions later and I shall come on to refer to the details of article 3a, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby referred.

As I was saying, Britain would be far better off if the British Government put article 2 into effect and led forward the programme for concerted European recovery rather than obstructing it as they were doing before the Birmingham summit and at Edinburgh.

Many of the problems surrounding the treaty—we acknowledge that there are problems—arise from the way in which the Government have approached the matter. As I have said before, they are like gatecrashers entering a party backwards and assuring all around them that they are just on the way out. Britain will have paid a double price for the opt-out from the social chapter: first, there is the price to British workers, who have been disgracefully deprived of the rights that will apply in all the other member states—something that we shall seek to put right in our debates on the social chapter—and, secondly, there is the price paid in terms of the negotiating capital used by the Government to achieve the opt-out, which could have been used instead to help put Britain into the first division in Europe rather than confining it to the second.

I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will want to devote attention to other fears that have been expressed about the treaty—its problems and how they can be overcome—as well as its benefits. We have never made any secret of the fact that, in a number of respects, the present treaty is not the treaty that we would have sought to negotiate. It is, after all, the product of bargaining between the 12 Governments of the Community. At the time of negotiation, five of those Governments were Christian Democrat or Conservative, four were coalitions, one was Social Democrat identifying with the Liberals and only two were Democratic Socialist. It should therefore come as no surprise to anyone that we have a number of important concerns that we shall wish to express in subsequent debates.

But with all the talk of problems, let us not forget the enormous potential benefits that can be derived both from the provisions already contained in the Bill and from the amendments that we shall seek to introduce. It is little wonder that the public grow sceptical of politicians' approach to the Maastricht treaty when they hear only of problems and wrangling and not of the potential benefits. Those benefits are derived from two important principles which are close to the hearts of Labour Members. First, international co-operation is essential for securing and preserving peace; and, secondly—this is inscribed on many of our trade union banners—unity is strength. By joining together in a union, we can secure social and economic progress which would not be achieved if we all stood apart. Those important principles are reflected in many of the provisions in the titles which are the subject of this debate.

When we examine the history of Europe and the state of the world, the value of such co-operation—rather than destructive nationalism—is more evident, whether through meditation on Remembrance day, by visits to graveyards in northern France or by seeing on television and elsewhere the appalling suffering of modern warfare.

Let none of us doubt the importance of building closer European co-operation. Let none of us forget that at the heart of the European project was the determination of European countries, especially France and Germany, never to go to war again. That is a noble aim and a worthy expression of our common humanity. Whatever the problems of Maastricht and whatever the difficulties and arguments that lie along the road to Europan union, let us not forget for one moment why it was well worth embarking on the journey in the first place.

Mr. Marlow: Government Ministers are saying that the treaty will not happen so we may as well vote for it. The hon. Gentleman is saying that if the treaty goes through we will get socialism in our time. I suggest that they are two fundamental reasons why all of my hon. Friends should vote against the damn thing.

5.30 pm

Mr. Smith: That is a matter for the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and his hon. Friends. We have made no secret of the fact that the provisions of article 2 would stand proud in any Labour manifesto. That is why we are so strongly in favour of the principles.

Mr. Corbyn: I have listened with great care to what my hon. Friend has said about article 2 and its social objectives. Does he concede that the whole basis of the Maastricht treaty is the establishment of a European central bank which is staffed by bankers, independent of national Governments and national economic policies, and whose sole policy is the maintenance of price stability? That will undermine any social objective that any Labour Government in the United Kingdom—or any other Government—would wish to carry out.

Does my hon. Friend recognise that the imposition of a bankers' Europe on the people of this continent will endanger the cause of socialism in the United Kingdom and in any other country?

Mr. Smith: It is a task of the Labour party, and Labour in government, to ensure that the process does not result in a bankers' Europe—that the concerns of bankers are not allowed to dominate the goals for social progress to which we all subscribe. Time and time again we have made it clear that we believe that decisions on such matters must be taken within a politically determined context. That presents a strong case for strengthening the role of ECOFIN in the Community.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): Does my hon. Friend accept that article 107 makes it absolutely clear that the European central bank will not take instructions from ECOFIN or any similar body?

On the point that article 2 would fit well in a Labour manifesto, article 2 explicitly says that it is subordinate to article 3. I wonder why my hon. Friend is focusing on article 2 rather than article 3. Article 3 makes it clear that the fundamental objective of economic policy is the control of inflation.

It was not fair for the hon. Gentleman to say, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), that everybody wants the control of inflation. Of course, we want the control of inflation. However, it has never been the primary objective of Labour's policy that the control of inflation should be the first objective of economic policy. Therefore, articles 2 and

Mr. Smith: The reason why I am placing such stress on article 2 is precisely that the preamble of the treaty sets as the task of the Community the provision of "a high level of employment and of social protection, a raising of the standard of living and quality of life".

Through Government and European institutions, in common with our sister parties in the rest of the European Community, it is our task to ensure that the implementation of those goals takes precedence. For democratic socialists and for all of those whom we aspire to represent, there are important reasons for engaging positively in the Maastricht process.

In an increasingly international economy which has powerful transnational forces, intervention to ensure employment, better living standards, enhanced quality of life and fairness and a sustainable environment must be undertaken at the international level as well as closer to home. Participation in the European Community cannot be an add-on extra or an opt-out deduction, as the Government maintain. It is a necessary condition for economic and social progress.

With the advent of the single market and the growing integration of the European economy, the European level of economic management is essential if workers, communities and whole regions are not simply to be left at the mercy of unregulated market forces. As Labour has consistently stressed, the advent of the single market and the integration of the European Community must be accompanied by corresponding action at national and global levels. Britain will be better placed to achieve both if we work in co-operation with our European partners instead of seeking to do so in isolation.

Mr. Rowlands: An absolute condition in the process towards monetary union under the treaty is to introduce legislation to make independent our national bank. Does my hon. Friend support that principle?

Mr. Smith: If the treaty is carried, it is clear that such matters will have to be examined. We have already made it clear that there is a case for examining the separation of the regulatory functions of the Bank of England from the responsibility for monetary policy. Of course, if a European central bank is established, every member state will need to examine the relationships between their central bank and the European bank and between the central bank and their Governments. The Labour party has tabled a further amendment about the accountability of the Bank of England.

It is crucial that a central bank remain in public ownership. It must not pass into any form of private ownership, as some have suggested. The constitution and governing council of a central bank must fully represent industrial, regional and social needs and the policies which it pursues must be carried into effect in a politically accountable context and in ways for which the institution must be held to account.

Mr. Dalyell: I am mindful that the Lothian region, the Edinburgh area and the Linlithgow constituency have greatly benefited from the sensitive understanding given by the European Community to their regional issues. Linlithgow constituency Labour party unanimously passed a resolution on Sunday which urged me to do everything possible to get the Maastricht treaty through. There are two views and there should not be the misleading impression that all the arguments are just on one side as far as Back Benchers are concerned.

Mr. Smith: Many regions, especially the region to which my hon. Friend referred, have had cause to benefit from the way in which the European Community and some of its activities have given attention to the social and economic problems in the United Kingdom. The Government have not sought to address those social and economic problems. Indeed, their policies have aggravated the problems. My hon. Friend is also right about Labour party policy, which is that the Maastricht treaty is the best available vehicle before us for securing the closer political and economic co-operation in Europe to which the Labour party is committed.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman's position seems to be partial. I accept the sincerely held views of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), but is the Opposition spokesman saying that if the United Kingdom Government were disposed to do so, they could not do exactly what Europe has apparently done for Edinburgh and the Lothian and Linlithgow areas of Scotland? Is not the hon. Gentleman aware that Britain is a net contributor to the European budget and that we give far more money than we get back? If we had kept that money, some of it might well have been passed to not only the constituency of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, whose views I respect but disagree with, but perhaps to my constituency.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman effectively makes the point that the Government, of whose party he is a member, lack the political will to address the fundamental economic and social problems of Britain. That comes as no surprise. But is it not welcome that the European Community has at least been able to provide some assistance, as my hon. Friend said?

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No. I must make some progress.

Mr. Winnick: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Smith: If my hon. Friend will allow me, I should like to make some progress. I trust that that will open up more time for Back Benchers who want to speak.

Some argue that much that I have advocated, such as the value of closer economic and political co-operation and gaining control of otherwise unregulated market forces, is good. They say that we need European co-operation and even European union, but that the titles in the Maastricht Bill offer no vehicle for achieving those goals. I do not dispute that those arguments are advanced with sincerity and integrity and deserve to be listened to with respect. However, I do not find them realistic, just as the Labour party conference did not find them realistic.

I do not see how we could build some theoretical European co-operation in the future by rejecting out of hand the practical European co-operation which is available now. When I hear arguments such as those of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who said in the debate on 1 December that he favoured political co-operation within Europe and even that he had no difficulty with European union, it puts me in mind of those people—I am sure that my hon. Friends have encountered them—who say, "I am all in favour of trade unions in principle and would join the appropriate one if it was one that I liked, but I will not join the trade union my workmates are in because I do not like the rule book, the shop steward does things with which I disagree and I am not prepared to take collective action if I am outvoted."

Our position stands in stark contrast with that of the hon. Member for Stafford. He believes that the provisions of the Bill to give effect to the titles in the Maastrict treaty unreasonably limit the operation of the free market. We believe that they offer a framework which is essential if the single market is to be the servant, not the master, of workers throughout the Community. He and his friends believe that a free market in currencies is best for the economy. We believe in the principle of planned management of exchange rates.

The hon. Member for Stafford believes that common funds which seek to redistribute resources to weaker regions of the Community damage the economy. We believe that they are desperately needed for economic regeneration, social justice and common welfare. He believes that it is centralist for the Community to agree standards for terms and conditions of employment. We believe that there will be exploitation if it does not do so.

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend will appreciate that some of the arguments that he has just advanced about economic co-operation were the basis for the clamour for us to join the exchange rate mechanism. We know what happened. I do not for one moment question my hon. Friend's genuine sincerity. I mean that. Obviously, there is a genuine difference of opinion. Why not on such an important issue?

My hon. Friend talks about steps to reduce unemployment and all the rest. How on earth can that be justified bearing in mind article 104c, which places a strict limit of 3 per cent. of gross national product on public spending? Moreover, it sets out in considerable detail the penalties that will be inflicted on member countries if they go beyond that limit. Surely that will simply mean that public spending will be reduced, and further reduced in many cases.

Even under the Conservative Government public spending is, fortunately, higher than 3 per cent., at least at the moment. Surely an outright reactionary right-wing Government would use the 3 per cent. rule to justify further cutting public spending. They would turn round and say, "It is all in the treaty. We have no alternative." How could unemployment be reduced in those circumstances?

5.45 pm

Mr. Smith: I believe, and it was the view taken in the resolutions and documents passed by the Labour party conference, that within the framework provided by the treaty, it is precisely possible for us to take common action to tackle unemployment and the rundown of depressed regions as well as social inequality. But it is our task—I agree with my hon. Friend in this—to ensure that the Europe that we shape becomes an engine for economic growth, not an instrument for deflation.

My hon. Friend referred to the convergence criteria. I shall have more to say about those criteria towards the end of my speech. I hope that he will bear with me and allow me to make progress to that point.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Smith: No. I should like to make progress.

I was contrasting our position with that of the hon. Member for Stafford. However, I agree with him about one thing. The debate about Maastricht and the level of public knowledge about what is involved has been distorted by the Government attempting to face both ways. They do one thing while pretending to do another. They claim that Maastricht is all about reaffirming the power of nation states when the treaty seeks to pool a measure of sovereignty.

The Government claim that subsidiarity applies to all Community activities when it is plain from the text of the treaty that it does not. They claim that the Prime Minister has won great victories in bringing Europe round to his view when all that he has succeeded in doing is to achieve opt-outs which would consign Britain to the second division.

We remember the Government's other claims. They said that the ERM was the cornerstone of Government economic policy. According to the Prime Minister, at least this year Britain will never have to take part in the ERM again. The Government said that the pound would replace the deutschmark as the strongest currency of Europe. They claimed that other European countries envied our economic miracle.

With such a litany of contradiction, U-turns and doublespeak, no wonder that so many people are unsure of the treaty's purpose. Worst of all, at a time of devastating unemployment across the Community, the utter failure of the British presidency to place at the top of Europe's agenda the crying need for a co-ordinated programme for economic recovery was a dereliction of responsibility which not only failed to meet the economic and social needs of the people of Europe but was bound to make many doubt the relevance of the Community to their everyday lives.

Our key goals in discussing the amendments and issues before us are to improve the Bill; to make it clear how Labour would want the treaty to operate in practice in the interest of the people of Britain and the people of Europe; and to win the case for the inclusion of the social chapter so that Britain will benefit from the provisions for employment rights and partnership which other Community countries realise are essential for economic success in the single market, as well as for employees' well-being.

We seek to win genuine regional representation on the Committee of the Regions, recognising that subsidiarity should start at home; to place economic policy within a framework of political accountability so that Community institutions and policy are the servant, not the master, of the people of Europe; and to make European co-operation a vehicle for sustainable growth. We shall return to all those important matters in the debates on subsequent specific groups of amendments.

I should like to make a brief reference to article 138a and then make some general comments about the convergence criteria, to which I referred when my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) intervened.

Article 138a, raised in our probing amendment No. 20 —which we shall not press to a vote—refers to political parties at the European level. Labour has consistently stressed the need for closer European integration being accompanied by measures to strengthen democracy and political accountability in the Community. That must mean an enhanced role for the European Parliament, as well as a more powerful role for bodies such as ECOFIN, to which I have referred. Also, it means that campaigning organisations, trade unions and business groups will build further on the considerable progress that they have already made to establish working European associations, making an invaluable contribution to the democratic process at the European level, as well as extending their formal involvement in Community decision-taking, for example, as partners in the social dialogue.

All that is to be welcomed and encouraged, but as article 138a recognises, political parties have an important role at European level to extend awareness of and participation in the European dimension of politics. I am pleased to be able to say that the Labour party has played a full role in that process, previously through the Confederation of European Socialist Parties and, since the Hague congress and declaration of 9 November last year, in the party of European Socialists which will be a force for stronger political co-operation in Europe.

Given the Government's support for article 138a in the treaty, I challenge the Minister to make clear whether the British Conservative party will carry that into effect by becoming a full member of the so-called European People's party, which supports the social chapter, or is there to be another cop-out and opt-out? I shall give way to the Minister if he wants to intervene.

Mr. Smith: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

Mr. Spearing: By and large, my hon. Friend has made a factual statement. Article 138a is an addition to the existing treaties. Why is it necessary? Surely the operation of parties, even on a European level through the confederation and in this country, is an established fact of democracy. Why does it have to be put in a treaty, which is a legal document relating to powers and finances?

Mr. Smith: Perhaps it is all about applying the Short principle on the European level—I do not know. I was referring to the fact that it is of value to reaffirm in the treaty the importance of political parties at a European level.

An important part of the co-operation and democratic accountability that we want to establish is the arrangements for ensuring that the House is fully involved in the consideration of European policy. We have tabled amendments to that end, in later groups.

In addition, as part of the group of amendments before us, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) may seek to move new clause 10, standing in his name and that of other hon. Friends. The proposal to submit the reports to which it refers to this Parliament has much to commend it. Unless I hear compelling arguments to the contrary, I shall be inclined to support it.

It is important that we consider convergence criteria in this general debate, not least because they have been interpreted in different ways in the wider public discussion. Some of those interpretations do not properly reflect the wording of the treaty and some of the political implications that have been imputed to the criteria would not serve the cause of co-ordinated economic recovery, which the Labour party believes should be top priority.

I am sure that the Minister will point out that Britain is not committed by the treaty to the third stage of economic and monetary union, but that begs as many questions as it answers. The key arguments on the criteria for convergence are, first, that the criteria are not blanket requirements. They are some aspects of economic performance which must be evaluated in determining how far the economies of various member states have converged before the establishment of economic and monetary union and one set of considerations to evaluate comparative economic performance after such a union. The criteria are not cast in stone, which is just as well, given what has happened recently with the ERM.

Secondly, the articles that apply the criteria explicitly and rightly require them to take account of wider economic considerations. For example, the article on Government deficits, to which some of my hon. Friends have referred, requires the Commission to take account of the extent of Government investment and expenditure and the medium-term economic and budgetary position of member states.

Thirdly, the protocol on convergence criteria requires the Council of Ministers to adopt appropriate provisions to lay down the details of those convergence criteria, which will then replace those set out in the protocol. Therefore, Governments would have the opportunity to make it clear —as we urge the British Government to make clear now —that the criteria should not be defined or deployed so as to implement monetarist policies, or to inhibit economic recovery in member states. What Labour has long said —and what the Government should be saying and should have said when they occupied the presidency—is that convergence should encompass the employment, industrial, investment and environmental measures essential for European economic recovery.

What is more, the Government have a strong obligation to do just that. Article 102a of the treaty states:

"Member states shall conduct their economic policies with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the Community, as defined in Article 2."

To fulfil that requirement, and in the light of the extent of the recession, the consequences of rebuilding the economy of eastern Germany and the recent experience of the ERM, under the provisions in the treaty for redefining the convergence criteria, as well as under articles 102a and 103 on economic co-ordination, the Community will need to agree the most effective way to put progress towards economic and monetary union back on course. That should be accompanied by co-ordinated policies for jobs, investment, training and growth. Nothing in the treaty is a barrier to Britain adopting those policies; it is the lack of political will on the part of the Conservative Government.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Smith: What is more, if Britain's voice is to be heard, it needs to be clear to our Community partners as well as in the House that our goal is to make European co-operation work in the interests of the people of Britain and of Europe, and not to sabotage it nor to wreck the treaty, which is the principal means to hand to give effect to that co-operation.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Essentially my hon. Friend is saying that the treaty does not quite mean what it says and that under a Labour Government it will be interpreted differently, although I would prefer—to paraphrase Aneurin Bevan—not to look at his crystal balls, but to read the text of the treaty. Can he answer this question? In the view of the Opposition Front Bench, does title II require us to go back into the ERM as a precondition of doing any of those things? What is the position on that?

Mr. Smith: I have already made that clear. I was talking about the way in which the convergence criteria will need to be redefined. The treaty places obligations on member states and on the Community to implement economic policies that will realise the objectives in article 2.

On the exchange rate mechanism, we have never made any secret of the fact that our party is committed to the principle of managed exchange rates. We have also set out the way in which the management of exchange rates needs to be changed to combat speculators.

6 pm

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Smith: I shall not give way as I am about to conclude.

Within the framework provided by the treaty—I emphasise that it must include the social chapter—the Committee should make clear our commitment to work for the full application of the provisions in article 2. That would give expression to the policies agreed at the founding conference of the party of European Socialists at the Hague, when we declared:

"We maintain the ideal of a democratic Europe that is both open to its citizens and to the world; a Europe that brings economic and social prosperity for all; a Europe where solidarity between and within nations as well as between generations is a guiding principle."

It would also put into practice, for the benefit of the people of Europe, as of Britain, the policy passed overwhelmingly at the Labour party conference, which

"reaffirms Labour's vision of Europe with Britain's future at the heart of a European Community which is economically prosperous and which has high standards of social and environmental protection and citizens' rights . . . believes that the Maastricht Treaty, while not perfect, is the best agreement that can currently be achieved."

As we debate this group of general amendments and more specific amendments later we shall make clear our commitment to closer economic and political co-operation in Europe and how we believe that the Maastricht treaty should be implemented with the social chapter. That must happen if the treaty is to be a decisive step towards the economic and social progress that Europe needs and the Labour party wants to see.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse, have you yet heard from the Government whether there will be a statement later tonight concerning the American attack on Iraq?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse):No. I call Mr. Garel-Jones.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash)——

Sir Russell Johnston: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Is it not the normal convention in Committee, particularly when that stage is taken in the Chamber, for spokesmen on both Front Benches to give way freely? Otherwise, how can we have a proper dialogue?

The First Deputy Chairman: The hon. Gentleman has been here for a long time, and he knows that it is a matter for those speaking to decide whether to give way.

Mr. Rowlands: Further to that point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I should like to refer to another convention that I thought was part and parcel of the Committee stage. I thought that Ministers did not reply to a debate in Committee before those who have tabled amendments selected with the main amendment have had an opportunity to speak. The second amendment, No. 323, in this group appears in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and other hon. Friends, but we have not had an opportunity to speak to it. It now appears, however, that the Minister is about to speak. I ask the right hon. Gentleman through you, Mr. Lofthouse, to obey the normal conventions in Committee and to allow us to speak to our amendment

The First Deputy Chairman: I know that the Chairman dealt with a similar point of order earlier when he called the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) to speak on behalf of the Labour Front Bench.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. You will recall that, in the Committee sittings before Christmas, a great deal of anxiety was expressed because about 20 hon. Members who had hoped to catch the Chair's eye could not do so. That group included hon. Members from Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland. It seemed that a gentlemen's convention had been violated.

Fundamental questions were asked during those sittings. Normally, in Committee we follow an iterative process and such questions are answered. However, the closure was moved when a number of those fundamental questions had not been answered. I beg you, Mr. Lofthouse, to ensure that we now have a Committee debate in the truest sense of the word, so that we can proceed in good order and good-naturedly.

The First Deputy Chairman: I note the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I should just like to note that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) raised his point of order about those on the Front Benches failing to give way after I had spoken only about five words of my speech. I am sure that the Committee will concede that the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) was generous in giving way to hon. Members on both sides of the Committee. I will certainly seek to do the same.

Equally, I shall try not to detain the Committee for too long, so that I may follow the example of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, who managed to reduce his speech to a quarter of that which he made at our last sitting. That may mean that more hon. Members on both sides of the Committee—in particular, my two countrymen, the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) who sat through all our last sitting and did not manage to intervene—can speak.

For the benefit of the Committee, I should say that the Financial Secretary will seek at some point to catch your eye, Mr. Lofthouse, to pick up points made by right hon. and hon. Members about economic and monetary union, convergence criteria, economic policy and so on.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way at this early stage. He has announced that, once he has seen the Bill through, he will retire from the Cabinet and leave the job. I am sorry to hear that, because I have always found him an accommodating Minister. His departure, however, poses the question whether someone who is, to coin the phrase, a "here today, gone tomorrow" Minister should shepherd through such a momentous Bill, which has such enormous constitutional and economic repercussions. His departure will call into question the nature of the answers that he will give to the difficult problems that will be raised in our proceedings. Surely such assurances could be cast aside by his successor as the responsibility of his predecessor.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I thank the hon. Gentleman for promoting me in a premature way to the Cabinet, of which I am not a member. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] I agree. I must tell the hon. Gentleman and the Committee that we are all here today, gone tomorrow. I assure my hon. Friend from the Whips Office who is sitting behind me that, when I return to the Back Benches, I intend to continue to take the same line as I have done in government.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. It has just gone up on the tapes that there has been American military action against Iraq. In view of what was said this afternoon in the Committee, I once again ask for a Government statement as soon as possible, particularly if British forces are involved.

The First Deputy Chairman: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that that is a matter for the Government, but no doubt those on the Treasury Bench will have noted what he said.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I raised this matter with Madam Speaker when she was in the Chair before the House went into Committee, and she assured me that she would give careful consideration to any request by the Government to make a statement about this latest savage attack.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): It might be helpful, Mr. Lofthouse, if I said at once that we have arranged for the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement at 10 o'clock.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. What will happen at 10 o'clock? What is the possible scenario? If the Government want to make a statement after 10 o'clock, will they have to suspend the 10 o'clock business motion first?

The First Deputy Chairman: We shall have to wait and see. Statements at 10 o'clock take precedence.

Mr. Marlow: My question is fairly straightforward.

The First Deputy Chairman: I gave a fairly straightforward answer—we shall have to wait and see.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The amendment that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford has moved is the same as one of the other amendments in the group tabled by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). It would delete from the scope of the Bill all amendments to the treaty of Rome.

It will not have escaped the notice of the Committee that this is a fairly sweeping amendment and that it is utterly at odds with the purpose of the Bill. The European Communities Act 1972 created a framework within our domestic law for recognising Community rights and obligations arising from the treaty of Rome. The Maastricht treaty amends the treaty of Rome, and, as has been pointed out from the Chair, we need to amend our legislation to take account of that fact. This amendment would prevent us from making that necessary change and would make it impossible for us to ratify the Maastricht treaty. It is, of course, in order, as it has been selected by the Chair, but it is clearly a wrecking amendment, which cannot be portrayed as anything else, and I shall ask the Committee to reject it.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. The Chair has already ruled that a wrecking amendment would not have been selected. How, therefore, can the Minister say that this is a wrecking amendment?

The First Deputy Chairman: I can support what the Chair has said: that at no time would a wrecking amendment have been accepted. I hope that the Minister will reconsider the word that he has just used.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Like my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), I was present in the Committee when that ruling was given from the Chair. That is why I have taken care to say that the amendment is, of course, in order. You, Mr. Lofthouse, have asked me to withdraw the word "wrecking". Naturally I do so.

[Mr. Garel-Jones]

The point that I am trying to make is that, if this amendment is approved, Her Majesty's Government will be rendered unable to ratify the treaty. If the amendment is pressed to a Division, I shall therefore ask the Committee to reject it.

Sir Russell Johnston: Surely there is a difference between wrecking in a technical sense, and wrecking in a rhetorical sense.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Indeed.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The hon. Gentleman has said that this amendment would make the treaty unratifiable. Does he not agree that any amendment resulting in the deletion of any part of the Maastricht treaty would make the treaty unratifiable?

Mr. Garel-Jones: That is the case, but there are on the Order Paper other amendments—the right hon. Gentleman must be well aware of them—which, if carried, would not make the treaty unratifiable. There is a distinction.

I turn to the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). I am sure that, like me, the Committee is grateful for the hon. Gentleman's indication that these are probing amendments designed to provoke debate and discussion. I should like to treat and respond to them in that spirit.

Amendment No. 11, in the name of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), seeks to delete from the scope of the Bill the revised article 2 of the treaty of Rome, which describes the tasks of the Community. This article replaces the existing article 2 of the treaty of Rome—revising it for the first time since the formation of the Community, and expanding its original terms. Thus, it will include references to sustainable and non-inflationary growth respecting the environment, to convergence—a reference to economic and monetary union—to cohesion, and to the raising of the standard of living and the quality of life throughout the Community.

As the hon. Member for Oxford, East has said, these are all worthy aims for states members of the Community to pursue. They are certainly the aims of Her Majesty's Government. Of course, from time to time—this is a matter for debate between the two sides of the Committee—the ways in which we seek to pursue them will differ according to our respective political philosophies.

Article 2 of the treaty sets out in general terms the goals of the European Community. As amended, the article would make it clear that these aims are to be achieved through implementation of the common policies and activities detailed in the rest of the treaty. The article should therefore be read with articles 3 and 3a, which set out the detailed activities of the Community.

The goal of article 2 should be seen as being to guide the Community as a whole. It is inevitable that, from time to time within the Community, there will be different views on how to attain this, but there will be no lack of agreement on the means set out in the body of the treaty.

Also in the name of the Leader of the Opposition is another probing amendment to delete article 138a from the scope of the Bill. As the Committee has been told, this amendment too is intended to stimulate debate on article 138a, which, in itself, is simply declaratory and recognises the importance of political parties at European level. I am glad to have an opportunity to debate the importance of European political parties, and I am relieved that the Opposition have no intention of pressing the amendment to a Division.

We have been told about Labour's commitment to the European socialist group in the European Parliament. I can confirm that the Conservative party, like the Christian Democrats, is an allied member of the European Parliament group of the European People's party. I myself cannot envisage the Conservative party's becoming a Christian Democratic party. Indeed, one of the interesting things about the enlargement of the Community—I think that I am right in saying this—is that, assuming, as we expect, that the four applicants will become members, those that are on the centre right and do not have a Christian Democratic tradition in their countries will be in the majority in the European Parliament.

The centre right in countries such as the United Kingdom, France and Spain—to mention just three of the larger countries in the Community that do not have a Christian Democratic tradition—is finding it easy to work alongside its Christian Democratic partners. However, each of us puts a unique spin on the ball of centre-right policies in Europe, and we, with our Christian Democratic allies, will seek to ensure that what we see as the free-market principles on which the European Community is based are upheld, not just in our national and domestic politics but also at a European level.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Surely the Minister's reservations about Christian democracy do not make it impossible for the Conservatives to move from being allied members to being full members. Surely what really prevents them from moving to full membership is that the group supports the common social policy, that its Governments have been prepared to sign the social chapter and, indeed, have criticised the British Conservative party for not going along with a positive social policy.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No. It goes much deeper. The European Community countries that do not have a Christian Democratic tradition—the United Kingdom is one of them—feel, for example, that Christian democracy has a slightly corporatist approach to life that other centre-right parties do not have. I do not say that in any critical sense. For example, in the main Christian Democratic countries in western Europe, there are, as it were, client trade unions. The Conservatives have no such thing. The only client trade unions that exist in this country are on the left of British politics.

There are some fundamental historical differences between Christian democracy and other centre-right parties, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we have no difficulty in working with our Christian Democratic friends in Europe. Indeed, even though we are a minority in the European Parliament, we managed to defeat an absurd amendment from the European socialists, prompted by the European Labour party in the European Parliament—thanks to the skilful whipping of Mr. Tindemans and other members of the Conservative group.

Sir Russell Johnston: I thank the Minister for giving way so that I may provide some information for his benefit, but also for the benefit of the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who was significantly less willing to give way. We were told that the Labour party had consistently been in favour of strengthening the European Parliament. My recollection is that the socialist manifesto issued before the last European election did indeed say that, but the Labour party had a derogation from it.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman is very unkind. Thanks to the Conservative party's consistent stand as a pro-European party over the past 20 years, and the number of defeats that have been inflicted on the Labour party, not least because of its absurd commitment to withdraw from the European Economic Community, as it was then called, the Labour party has finally seen the light and become a pro-European party, albeit in socialist terms. The Liberal Democrat party and the Conservative party, which have consistently stood on that platform, must be grateful for small mercies. It is unkind of the hon. Gentleman to remind the Labour party of its past in that matter.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): Does the Minister recall the advertisement by the Conservative party at the European elections in 1989, which complained about the diet of Brussels? Did he endorse that campaign, which was aimed directly at opposing the European Community?

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is unfair to say that it was aimed in opposition to the European Community, because the Conservative party not only negotiated Britain's entry into the Community but has stood up against the onslaughts of the Labour party in the past 20 years and negotiated the Single European Act and the Maastricht treaty. I agree that that was not the most successful advertisement or campaign that the Conservative party has ever run, and I assure him that next time there is a European campaign, we shall run a much more successful and aggressive one.

As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber has permitted himself an unkindness to the socialists, may I say that the political party in Britain that faces the greatest difficulty in European integration is the Liberal party. European Liberals remain Liberals in the sense that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) would understand the term. Our Liberals, with one or two distinguished exceptions, of whom the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber is one, are really European Social Democrats. The difficulty that British Liberals have in signing up to any European Liberal principles is notorious in Europe. Most European Liberals regard them as watered-down Social Democrats.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am left virtually speechless. The Minister has well outbidded me in unkindness and inaccuracy.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The last of the probing amendments tabled by the Opposition seeks to delete article H from the Bill—that is, all the amendments to the European Coal and Steel Community included in title III. As the hon. Member for Oxford, East did not refer to that, am I right in assuming that the amendment was tabled early in the day, and that he is not asking me to reply to it?

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton) indicated assent.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Before the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) speaks, may I refer to new clause 10, which is important and which the hon. Member for Oxford, East said that the Labour party might support. He was not firm about it, but said that he would be prepared to listen to arguments about it.

If accepted, new clause 10 would require the Government by law to publish and lay before Parliament reports produced by the European Council under article D of the union treaty and to publish at the same time a policy statement. The Committee will agree that the amendment is surprising. Drawing up procedures for parliamentary scrutiny should be a matter for this House alone. We should be going down a dangerous route if our practices were to be regulated by an international treaty or legislation tabled by the Executive. It would be quite a change if the working practices of the House were settled through the statute book, by a Bill introduced by the Executive.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I said that the new clause had a great deal to commend it and that, unless I heard compelling arguments to the contrary, I would be inclined to support it. I have heard no compelling arguments so far. The new clause amends legislation before the Committee and does not amend a treaty. It would extend to the House the same opportunity to scrutinise the reports of the European Council's work as would be available to the European Parliament. That would be a good thing.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am in the middle of making my argument. I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Oxford, East said, and that is why I am dealing carefully with new clause 10. I took it that the hon. Gentleman had an open mind on it and wanted to debate it.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall give way in a moment.

I hope that hon. Members will express their opinions on the new clause during the debate because it is a House of Commons matter, which is why we should listen to each other's arguments.

Apart from the principle that we should legislate on Standing Orders, Parliament already has full scope for detailed scrutiny of the Government's approach to the European Community. For example, the Prime Minister always reports the outcome of each European Council to the House and is questioned on that report. The conclusions produced at each European Council meeting are deposited in Parliament.

Parliament is also closely associated with the timetable of European Council meetings. At the House's request, a six-monthly debate takes place in the House before every European Council meeting and also looks ahead to future work and priorities. The Council also provides an annual report to the European Parliament on the Community's work, which is made available in the Library.

The debate is important because the Opposition have an open mind on it. The Committee should bear in mind the fact that, when these debates take place, which is quite often, some of my hon. Friends find it difficult to get enough Members to keep the debate going.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: May I finish my argument? Then I shall be pleased to give way to hon. Members.

On new clause 10, I contend that there will be no shortage of opportunities to examine the Government's policy on the activities and progress of the union, or to keep the House fully informed of the European Council's activities, both before and after each of those meetings. The procedures seem to be adequate in any case but, if the Committee felt that they were inadequate and wanted the Government to make further demarches through a Select Committee, it should decide about the matter, and it should not be subject to legislation introduced by the Executive.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney will no doubt wish to convince the Committee that the new clause is worthy of support. That is a matter for him, but the device is both cumbersome and unnecessary. If you, Mr. Lofthouse, were to allow a Division on it, unless arguments convince me otherwise, I will ask the Committee to reject it.

Mrs. Gorman: On the matter of my right hon. Friend's preamble on the subject of European parties and similarities between us, the Christian Democrats, the Liberals and God knows who else, is that not almost irrelevant? After all, the European Parliament, to which all these people and their parties are elected, has virtually no powers at all over the Commission except in the matter of approving the budget. Is it not true that the Council of Ministers makes the decisions and that it only reacts to what the bureaucracy has prepared for it? Its members simply do not have the time to consider and debate the ideas which we should be putting forward, so the whole

Mr. Garel-Jones: I do not think that I agree with my hon. Friend. It is true that, in some areas, the Commission has the exclusive right of initiative where member states have agreed they should have it. But my hon. Friend is right: the key body is the Council of Ministers. Decisions are taken by the Council of Ministers, who are accountable to their national Parliaments, but we have, I think rightly, given additional powers to the European Parliament in the Maastricht treaty—mainly powers of supervision over the Commission and its activities, but also as a body to which the citizen can go to complain about injustices or maladministration by the Community. I think that that is a good thing. We have given it the power of negative assent, or rejection, at the end of the process in some carefully defined areas.

6.30 pm

Mr. George Robertson: Reverting to new clause 10 and to the Minister's case as to why we should not consider it sympathetically, he has given a number of examples of where the Government choose to consult the House to inform it of European Community business.

In that respect, it is largely correct, except that a lot of it is by custom and practice—custom and practice that the Government choose to deploy in that way. The six-monthly debate on the report of the European Community used to take place at the whim of the Government at various times during the six months; it was only brought to a point where it related to the European Council meeting because of the House's decision to try to anchor it at a specific point.

The Minister is right to say that the Prime Minister reports to the House after every full European Council meeting, but there was a time—it is within my parliamentary life—when it was an obligation on the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to report to the House after every Foreign Affairs Council meeting. We have not had such a report for many years now; it fell into disuse because the Foreign Office decided that it simply would not do it.

Surely, therefore, there is something to be said here, in such an important area, where there will be a statutory responsibility for the European Parliament to receive a report on the work of the union, for the British Parliament having a similarly anchored commitment to receive exactly the same information.

Mr. Garel-Jones: One of the differences between our Parliament and most others in Europe is that we do things by custom and practice. Having, as I do, some knowledge of Parliaments in other parts of Europe, I find that the way in which we organise our lives here is rather more efficient than people would expect.

I think that the statements from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office fell into desuetude because the demand for them was not there at the time. That is my understanding. The hon. Member is, however, well aware that, when the House wishes something to happen, and when something has become an established practice in the House, under the non-written constitutional arrangements that we have in this country, it is a pretty tight bet.

Here we are in Committee. It is true, Mr. Lofthouse, that I have no obligation to give way to any hon. Member, but if I were to stand up and read out my speech without giving way to hon. Members on both sides, it would be regarded as pretty outrageous. But it is not written down anywhere.

The Committee will decide when we come to a Division, and the hon. Member will talk to those in his party who are Whips, but I can remember in a former capacity rushing round the House on many occasions, trying to find hon. Members to come in so that a particular debate should not collapse before 10 o'clock.

I just warn the House against putting into statute what ought to be done through Standing Orders and by custom and practice. If the House genuinely believes that the present provisions for debate and discussion on these matters are inadequate, that is something that should be discussed through the usual channels and in the Select Committee on Procedure, in the way we normally do these things.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. He is suggesting almost that this is a matter of principle. There is a great deal of scrutiny of European legislation by the House at present, as my right hon. Friend knows, and I presume that this was established through legislation. All that is suggested——

Sir Russell Johnston: Through procedure.

Mr. Marlow: Through procedure? Not through legislation? Well, is there any damage or harm done by enshrining it in legislation? An increasing amount of information is made available to the House at the moment. My right hon. Friend, along with many others, agrees that there is a democratic deficit in the Community at present. Would it not be helpful in overcoming that democratic deficit to agree to this amendment?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am aware of my hon. Friend's views and temperament about the Community as a whole, but, in considering new clause 10, I urge him to look at it in a different light, as a House of Commons matter. For example, the two new Standing Committees that we have for scrutinising European Community legislation have in some respects been extremely successful, but the Committee will know that, after a year or so, discussions go on, through the usual channels and through the Select Committee on Procedure, and if the House feels that those arrangements are inadequate and have not met the House's ambitions in the matter, it is possible to change them.

I urge my hon. Friend, because he is anxious, as I think all hon. Members are, to ensure, as I see it, our enthusiastic co-operation in a European union, that we keep the traditions of the House about the way it organises its business, and that it should be done on a custom and practice basis that enables hon. Members, through the usual channels, to discuss these matters. On that basis, I would respectfully suggest to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney that his new clause is unnecessary.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, as I am a signatory of the new clause. I have no doubt tha t my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney will give a substantive reply to this mini-debate, but I am rather surprised at the Minister's statement. Declaration 13 on page 127 of the treaty states:

"The Conference considers that it is important to encourage greater involvement of national Parliaments in the activities of the European Union."

The new clause does not call for a debate; it has nothing to do with the usual channels or time in this Chamber. The second and very important part of it is that, after the report has been made—the same one that goes to the European Parliament, so we are acting in parallel, as many hon. Members wish—says that the Government shall lay a statement

"as to their policy and performance in respect of the activities of the Union and their policies for its future."

Surely this is accountability of the Government to the House and to the country, written into a Bill or an Act, which is common in many Acts. It is a matter of democratic accountability and not of the procedures of debate in this House.

Mr. Garel-Jones: That is a matter that the Committee must decide. I believe tha t it would be inappropriate and inconsistent with the traditions of the House for its Standing Orders or for the way in which it chooses to scrutinise the Executive to be written into an Act of Parliament. That is my view.

Furthermore, as the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) is probably more aware than any other hon. Member, over the next three or four years, the House will have to decide how it intends to scrutinise the activities in the intergovernmental pillars of the union. The common foreign and security policy will not present the House with a great many problems, because, as a general rule, foreign policy does not produce legislation; but the interior and justice pillar may—I very much hope that it will—produce legislation on matters of law and order, immigration, frontiers and so on on a European basis, and the House will need to decide how it is to inform itself in this matter. It is an area where, it seems to me, the House will come up with some ideas and will adjust them, and the beauty of operating by custom and practice in the House is precisely the ability to do so.

As for the declaration on the role of national Parliaments, the British Government insisted that it should be a declaration, not a protocol, because it was a matter for the House. How the House chooses to attend, represent itself and make its input in the discussions on the role of national Parliaments is a matter initiated by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, in consultation with his opposite number, through to the minority parties.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way again, but in doing so he can clarify matters now and obviate the need for later contributions. The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said that statements on Foreign Affairs Councils had fallen into desuetude. Presumably, according to what the Minister has just said, that was because no issues were raised through the usual channels.

In his introductory remarks when he called on us to reject new clause 10, the Minister said that such changes should not be introduced as part of a Bill presented by the Executive, but should be decided by Parliament. If Parliament decides to introduce the new clause tonight, that will constitute a decision of Parliament against the Executive.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Of course I accept that the new clause is not a wrecking clause—I do not use the word "wrecking" in the aggressive sense. If the new clause is carried, it will not mean that the Government are unable to ratify the Maastricht Bill. I want to make that clear to the Committee, which is why I am inviting my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), as well as other of my hon. Friends and some Opposition Members, to regard the subject as a House of Commons matter.

From my knowledge of other European Parliaments, I can assure the Committee—I am not necessarily speaking as a member of the Government—that the House carries out its business much more efficiently than people imagine. To pick up the issue raised by the hon. Member for Hamilton, at present, at the end of each European Council meeting we state what was discussed at the Council in reply to a parliamentary written question. If the House felt that it wanted a verbal statement, that desire would be raised through the usual channels and discussed and, if necessary, the Select Committee on Procedure could become involved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford was much exercised by the fact that the Maastricht treaty describes the European Community as the European Community, not the European Economic Community. The Maastricht treaty simply formalises what has been a general practice for many years. My hon. Friend seemed to be worried about that on the ground that he and some of my other hon. Friends have always regarded the European Community as a common market, so the removal of the word "economic" implied something broader to him.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford is not present. When he supported the Single European Act—he again confirmed today that he does not renege on that—that Act introduced an article on social policy. Therefore, it must have been clear to him then that we were engaged in something slightly more than casual encounters in the market place. The term "European Community" has long been used in the House by many people, including my right hon. Friend the Baroness Thatcher, as long ago as 1981. I hope that my hon. Friend will not regard the use of the term in the treaty as of special significance.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister made an understandable distinction and said that the Government had sought to ensure that there was a declaration, not a protocol, in relation to national Parliaments. Will he confirm what I assume to be true, which is that none of the declarations in the treaty falls within the scope of the Bill?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I think that they fall within the scope of the Bill but, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, a declaration is not legally binding on any member state. The declarations fall within the scope of the Bill, but they are not legally binding and are not, I am told, imported into domestic law. I shall take advice on that matter and reply to the hon. Gentleman later.

Mr. Jenkin: It is ironic that we are changing the name of the European Economic Community to the European Community at the same time as Her Majesty's Government are insisting that the Community is an economic pillar in a union of separate pillars that relate to issues other than economics. As originally formulated in the Single European Act and the existing treaty of Rome, the Community is principally an economic community. However, the new article 2 mentions objectives such as social cohesion and solidarity. We know that the pillars are associated with the Community through various articles in the Maastricht treaty.

Therefore, in the European Economic Community, we are creating something much more than an economic pillar. That is the reason for the desire to change the name. We are the only country at odds with the objectives of the other 11 member Governments, who want to create a Community that includes the pillars in the fullest sense. That is why the Commission has just appointed new Commissioners to have responsibility for matters that we regard as outside their control—such as justice and home and foreign affairs.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The European Community is a developing and living institution. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) is being a little unfair to himself and others if he believes that the European Community has always been conceived as nothing more than a market. One only has to read the preamble to the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act to see that the Community was always more than that.

If we are successful in persuading many of our partners that there should be intergovernmentalism within the union, as I hope and believe we will be—that will be the debate for 1996 and beyond—I would not be surprised if, over the years, the term "European union" became more common than the term "European Community". I would not regard such a development as sinister. In essence, the treaty merely recognises what has become custom and practice. Almost everyone refers to the European Community as the European Community.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Is not the change of terminology much more significant than my right hon. Friend is making out? The word "union" is much more significant to Europeans than the word "Community". I accept the sincerity of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues when they say that they are opposed to the Community being developed as a federal state. However, is it not a fact that all the other leaders —with the possible exception of the Danish Prime Minister—see Maastricht as a move towards a federal state? Is it not dangerous to sign a treaty that we think means one thing and the other 11 member states think means something else?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I do not want to deceive my hon. Friend. It is true that, during the past 30 years, a number of our partners have moved towards a single structure—I would almost go as far as to say that the whole thrust of the Community has been towards a single structure. In many ways, our reticence was due to the fact that we joined the Community late.

The beauty of the Maastricht treaty is that, for the first time, we have emerged from a set of negotiations not merely saying that we made the best of a bad job and managed to hold things back. I see that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) is in his place—he played a significant part in the development. There was pressure to push all the Home Office business into a single structure. The crucial moment occurred at the time of the Dutch text, when the federalists fought what I hope will be their last battle in the development of the European Community. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) wishes to see a single structure. That is not a sin. It is almost the majority view in Europe, and it is the view of the Liberals.

We cannot be certain of anything, but the treaty gives us a chance to make intergovernmentalism work. Some countries in the Community now support that approach, but when the Dutch text was produced, only two countries were prepared to support it.

Part of my task is to persuade hon. Members who have perfectly understandable doubts about the matter that, if the Conservative party enthusiastically supports intergovernmentalism, considers law and order on a European scale and successfully presses ahead on common foreign and security policies, we can enter the 1996 intergovernmental conference with the enlarged membership increasingly beginning to shape the Europe that Conservatives have always wanted to see.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Perhaps my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not. It would be wrong if hon. Members who have sat here throughout the debate did not have time to speak.

The Danish decision has been mentioned, and the Committee has a right to hear the Government's view on it. The Government do not intend to amend the Bill to incorporate the decision on Denmark. That decision does not amend the Maastricht treaty or Community treaties; nor does it create any rights or obligations in EC law that require to be given effect in United Kingdom law. Therefore, it does not require to be incorporated in the Bill.

Mr. Marlow: To some extent my right hon. Friend is being a little less than frank with the Committee. He says that this great juggernaut has been turned around by the Government's heroic efforts, and that things are now moving our way. The reality is that, in areas where the Community already has competence, it is being given more, as well as more majority voting. We are dealing with new areas of policy where it does not have quite the competence that it had before, but they are new areas, and the Community now has new competences. In all those areas, the Commission will be present and will have rights of initiation.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The European Community, the European union, is a developing institution. The Government, or at any rate British Conservatives, have rightly been uneasy over the past 30 years about the centripetal force driving the Community. At the very least, the Maastricht treaty can be said to have arrested that centripetalism.

The intergovernmentalism that has emerged, and the way in which the treaty is structured, gives British Conservatives for the first time an opportunity to gain morer allies for our vision of Europe. A British Prime Minister at that 1996 intergovernmental conference will, if we back the treaty enthusiastically, not be batting alone against the rest of the Community and picking up allies where he can. He will find that a substantial bloc, which I hope will contain some of the new members who have acceded—I am sure that it will also contain Denmark—will join us in shaping the Community in that way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North spoke about extended competences. As we debate the detailed articles, he will find that education, which he would no doubt describe as a new competence, is covered. The new article on education defines and limits the extent to which the Community can operate in education, and does it in a much stronger way than was allowed for in the Single European Act.

Under that Act, the Community attempted, under what we often saw as a false treaty basis, to move into education. Now, the specific areas are defined, and the article states that there shall be no harmonising measures. As we debate the Bill, I hope that my hon. Friend will find significant improvements compared with the Single European Act. I confirm that declarations are outside the Bill's scope.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister spoke about the Danish decision. The Government line, described by the Prime Minister, is that the Danish decision is binding in international law. Does that mean that the International Court of Justice at the Hague has jurisdiction and could enforce that decision if necessary?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Any binding international decision that is in dispute would go to the International Court of Justice at the Hague.

I have taken up enough of the Committee's time. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will deal with economic and monetary union.

Mr. Spearing: I had hoped to speak to the amendment, but, because of the Chairman's choice in relation to the Edinburgh matter, I now have two tasks. I shall deal later with the Edinburgh issues. I am glad to pick up immediately the Minister's point about what he says has been a change in the centripetal authoritarian tendency in the Community. He and the Prime Minister claim not only to have halted but to have reversed that tendency. Many times the Minister has said that for the first time we have this or that. He nods in agreement. I shall try to prove what I said during the recommittal debate—if I can call it that. That is not true. If anything, the reverse is correct.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I hope that I have never said that Britain has won, because in the development of the Community there are never final victories or final defeats. Most objective observers and certainly everyone in Europe believe that the shape envisaged by the treaty is a substantial advance for those who take a nation state view of Europe rather than for those who seek to be integrationists in a single structure. The debate is continuing and we need the enthusiasm and dedication of all political parties in the United Kingdom if we are to punch our weight and win more points.

Mr. Spearing: I agree that the Minister has never spoken about victories, but he has said that there has been a change of attitude and a change of mood. He nods in agreement. I dissent from that view. I am sorry that the Minister was not able to reply to my letter of 15 December on some of these matters. Perhaps if he cannot reply to my questions in the debate he will write to me. I hope that he will deliver a winding-up speech, because he has not yet heard all the contributions.

The Minister will remember Maastricht mark I or, rather, the Dutch treaty which was hurriedly removed from the public eye when the Dutch presidency started. It was chucked away. Everybody said that it was going too far too fast and that it was too ambitious. A few days ago I asked the Minister which of the matters in the treaty that disappeared were not within the scope of the present treaty. We are debating what the Minister called the trunk of the treaty—titles II, III and IV—and the supporting

I suggest that that is not the right analogy. Instead, we have a single building with a few partitions inside it. It is all pretty flimsy, and some of the partitions might be paper rather than the real thing. I asked the Minister—he replied only the other day—to tell me what matters that were to be found in the treaty that was suddenly removed are not within the treaty that is before us. The Minister could not refer to any. In other words, the so-called treaty of Maastricht—the treaty of union that we have before us—is of similar scope to the treaty that was introduced during the Dutch presidency in September 1991, and was then hurriedly withdrawn.

The difference between the two treaties, as the Minister correctly says, is in the scope of specific Community competence, as envisaged in the titles that we are discussing, and that which he claims to be entirely intergovernmental that surrounds it. Incidentally, this is of importance in respect of the Edinburgh decision, because the Edinburgh European Council was not the intergovernmental body which made the decision. There is a fine but important distinction to be made.

Why do I say that the union edifice is very different from the structure that the Minister wishes to project to us? The elements of the trunk and of the European Community that are to be found within the so-called pillars are manifold. I would like to go through them in detail, but I shall not do so because I know that others wish to contribute to the debate. In title I, however, we find no fewer than eight references to institutions of the Community. They are not intergovernmental, because they are part of the trunk. There is one reference to the Council, four references to the Commission, two to the Parliament and one to the European Court of Justice. The elements within titles II, III and IV get into title I as well, and that was supposed to be entirely intergovernmental.

We were told that there would not be penetration into the other parts of the treaty. Article J deals with foreign and security matters. Within it there are 17 references to the Council and six to the Commission—23 in all. I am sorry that the Minister of State is not in his place to hear what I have to say because this is proveable stuff.

I move on to article K, which deals with judicial and home affairs. We cannot get more national than that. In the series of articles—it starts with K1—there are three references to the Council, four to the Commission, two to the Parliament and one provision for the European Court. If we take up cross-references—I shall not do so in detail—there are no fewer than 40 references to the Community's institutions as they are at present in the so-called pillars. Surprise, surprise, many of them refer to the ubiquitous Commission.

The Commission is there all the time, and that is because it is charged with making the whole outfit coherent. That is made clear in the early articles of the treaty. The Commission has the right to understand what the pie is doing, if it is not a finger steering the pie, as it were. This means that titles II and III are much expanded. I suggest that the union is the entire temple and not the single trunk with supporting pillars, and that the claims of the Prime Minister and the Minister of State are not correct. I shall prove that—I hope to be able to do so entirely within the terms of the debate—in relation to the powers of the European Court, which are established and are of the Community.

Migration and home affairs are covered in article K. Article K3.2 (c) reads:

"without prejudice to article 220 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, draw up conventions"—

this is a reference to the Council—

"which it shall recommend to the Member States for adoption in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements.

Unless otherwise provided by such conventions, measures implementing them shall be adopted within the Council by a majority of two-thirds of the High Contracting Parties."

That is the Council. There it is. It is working within the so-called intergovernmental area. The article continues:

"Such conventions may stipulate that the Court of Justice shall have jurisdiction to interpret their provisions and to rule on any disputes regarding their application, in accordance with such arrangements as they may lay down."

Denmark is rather sensitive when it comes to matters relating to citizenship, for example, which one would think would be well outside the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice. I suggest, however, with the support of quotations, that they certainly are not. Hon. Members may say that there is no compulsion on member states to be parties to the conventions. Tell that to those who were present at the Trevi discussions. Tell that to the Select Committee on Home Affairs. We all know that if we are to have effective laws relating to policing and drugs, for example—something which we all wish to see inside the possible union—we must have a certain amount of co-operation. The only way in which that can be achieved practically is by some sort of agreement. The pressure to adopt the conventions, subject to the European Court, will, I suggest, be politically impossible to resist.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The hon. Gentleman has almost given the game away. I think that he is jumping at shadows in terms of the fears that he has expressed. Article K3.2 distinguishes the intergovernmental co-operation therein described from the procedures under the European Community by giving the initiative to member states as well as to the Commission. It makes it clear that agreement to any convention must be unanimous. There is no question of majority or qualified majority voting. It makes it clear that conventions can be referred to the European Court of Justice only where there is agreement by the states that happen to be parties to the convention. It is——

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Member is beginning to make a speech. I think that he knows that in my book interventions should be short.

Mr. Evans rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: That is it.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). I was saying that there is a channel of competence. It is true that agreement is required, but Ministers who have been to Brussels will know only too well that a ratchet applies to matters relating to European Community. Unanimity sounds fine; it sounds as though there is a veto once and for all. We know that it is difficult to withstand that procedure and that once there is agreement there is no going back. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that there is sufficient inducement to agree to competence, to agree to an agreement within the ambit of the European Court. I use that as a trenchant illustration, I believe, of the degree to which the separation of the pillars and the trunk will not, in practice, be as people think.

The hon. Gentleman knows what happens when Ministers fly into Brussels having been briefed by civil servants at the last minute after a constituency meeting, worrying about this, that and the other. That is irrespective of party. The hon. Gentleman knows the Commission, the Council and the central institutions of the Community, with their staffing, knowledge and the Committee of Permanent Representatives, and all the things that go on. That is the effective centripetal drawing in of effective power which, I fear, will be given a boost by the treaty.

The process may have been even faster under the Dutch mark I treaty. The Government have probably slowed down the rate of acceleration that would otherwise have taken place, but there is still that progression to centrality.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): What concerns me about what the hon. Gentleman is saying, along with so many of his colleagues on both sides of the Committee who are against the Community, is that they lack flair and imagination in seeing what the Community could do. For the Community to draw power to the centre for certain purposes is not necessarily a bad thing. After all, in the past two weeks we have seen that we have no control over the merchant shipping fleets which pass through our waters and may come to grief on the rocks creating great disasters. A European market into which the world has to sell is a much more powerful entity than a merely British one, is it not?

Mr. Spearing: I am surprised to be accused of not having much imagination. My trouble is that I have rather too much. However, I think that I am realistic. I do not see hobgoblins.

What is there to prevent every European nation, whether a member of the Community or not, acting separately by intergovernmental action, saying that they will not accept any tanker discharging in any of their ports unless, unless, unless, unless? We do not need a European Community to be able to do that. That could be done fairly soon. It could be done if the Ministers responsible to the House took action. Why do they not? It does not require a centralised Community bureaucracy.

I was not going to make this point because I wanted to be brief, but I shall do so in answer to the hon. Gentleman. British farmers find themselves having to demonstrate against the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Do not the poor farmers realise that the power to decide what we do with our soil in agricultural terms went from the House in 1973 by majority vote? Apparently they do not.

During the enormously important worldwide negotiation on the economy under GATT, the Minister, then the President of the Agriculture Council, had to book into a hotel under an assumed name and bite his nails while an unnamed, virtually unaccountable EC official negotiated on behalf of all the members of the Community. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that that is right, let him get up and say so.

Mr. Devlin: He thinks that it is right. It is far better for the Community to negotiate GATT as a whole than to spin out the whole arrangement by perhaps another 10 or 15 years on each round simply because there are that many more parties to the agreement. Of course it is better that we negotiate as a single market.

On the hon. Gentleman's earlier point about shipping, he simply described the position as it is now. The disaster that we are faced with at the moment occurred because a ship going from Norway, which is not in the Community, to Canada, which is not in the Community, did not have to meet the standards required in a British port because it was not going to a British port.

Mr. Spearing: There is nothing to prevent the Norwegians, if they so wish—I should have thought that they might, being a maritime power—agreeing to anything whether inside or outside the EC. I shall take up the matter with the Canadian High Commission because Canada is worried about the environment.

On the other point, the hon. Gentleman mistook what I was saying. If there is a single market by law and there is a negotiation under GATT, of course we must—unfortunately, from my point of view—negotiate as a Community. But we do not have to send in an unnamed official while the President of the Council of Ministers concerned has almost the status of an office boy on the edge, or so it looked. Is that what the hon. Gentleman wants? I do not think so. That separates the elected person responsible to the people in this Parliament and in other Parliaments, accountable in some way or another, from the officials of the Commission who have far too much power.

Mr. Devlin rose——

Mr. Spearing: I said that I would not give way again and, in order to assist other colleagues, I must move on to the second part of my remarks relating to the so-called decision at Edinburgh.

I was at Edinburgh during the summit. I spent one evening in the company of the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and 200 other people. We were both making our views known about the succession of treaties. One member of the multinational audience asked me what the hon. Lady was like. I said that she was Baroness Thatcher times two. That was met with disbelief, but I was believed when she made her speech. She was not in favour of these matters. Everyone knows my views. She said that we needed to get rid of the Community because it was a socialist plot. I said that the hon. Lady was wrong because I thought that it was a capitalist plot. I had the words of the treaty on my side. It requires

"the free movement of capital and labour unless authorised to the contrary."

However, I said that we should compromise because we both agreed that it was a plot. We must remember the old succession, "I plan, you scheme and they plot". I suppose that that is what we all say about each other.

The decision at Edinburgh was surely about political power, because that is what the treaties are about. They are a map of political power; a proto-constitution taken as a library of treaties, including the Single European Act, bits of which are also lying around.

What does the Edinburgh decision do? Does it modify political union? I should have thought that it must; otherwise Mr. Schluter would not have been able to go back to Copenhagen satisfied that he had enough to be able to recommend a second round in Denmark. It must make some change. On the other hand, we are told that the decision does not change the wording of the treaty. If that is so, how can it have a different effect? I should like the Minister to explain that conundrum when he replies.

Many people say that the decision makes no difference. Earlier in the debate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) quoted the German Chancellor and I shall do so again. In the Financial Times on 4 January 1993 the Chancellor is quoted as saying:

"the European Community expressed their sympathy for Denmark's special reservations, but decided not to change the Maastricht treaty. Reopening negotiations was not, and is not, on our agenda."

I do not know who "our" is. Presumably it does not include Denmark. He continued:

"In Edinburgh we therefore could go no further than to clarify the relevant treaty clauses to respond to the main Danish concerns. This purely declaratory 'decision' neither changes nor complements the treaty, and therefore does not require ratification by member states."

I think that everyone who is present now was present when, in reply to a point made by one of my hon. Friends, the Minister—having received some information—confirmed that declarations were not legally binding. There may be a problem in the translation, but it is clear that Chancellor Kohl does not want the declaratory decision that we are discussing to be legally binding in the sense that we have been told it is.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The hon. Gentleman quoted my right hon. Friend as having said that declarations were not legally binding. That is not quite what my right hon. Friend said. He was asked specifically whether the declarations attached to the treaty came within the ambit of the Bill, and the answer to that very precise question is an equally precise no.

Mr. Spearing: Well, we shall consult Hansard. I believe, however—although I am subject to correction—that, while protocols are legally binding, declarations in a treaty are not. That is laid down in the Vienna convention. Declarations of hope or intent, for example, cannot be legally binding, because people can change their minds—and that is quite right. None the less, some of us expected a protocol at least: I think that the Danes expected that. Such a protocol could have been added, and it need not have been very long.

Following what may have been skilful negotiation by our Prime Minister, we have secured certain clauses and derogations. Some people object to them, and I understand why. The Danes, however, want much more; they suggested, for instance, that changes applying to Denmark could also be applied to applicant states of the Nordic union, if they wished it. I understand that the decision concerned extends to no country other than Denmark, so one of its requirements has already gone out of the window.

Having asked questions about the declaration, I discovered that it did not need ratification. I was told by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office—a junior Minister—

"The decision does not require ratification".

He went on to say that the decision had been made not by the European Council, but by "Heads of State and Government meeting within the European Council."—[Official Report, 17 December 1992; Vol. 216, c. 356.]

As recently as 11 January, I asked the Prime Minister who had signed the decision, on behalf of all the nations involved. The Prime Minister replied:

"The decision relating to Denmark was not signed."—[Official Report, 11 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 554.]

I am not suggesting that every international treaty should be signed, but if I take a guest into the Strangers Cafeteria, I sign for it. We all sign for things all the time, do we not? We have to sign even for small transactions. Why did no one sign that decision? One would have thought that, if it is to be effective and applicable in international law—as the Prime Minister told us several times that it would be on 14 December—all possible steps would have been taken to ensure that.

According to information that we received recently, a ruling of the European Court of Justice—to which the Prime Minister referred repeatedly on 14 December; it sounds good, does it not?—currently binds only seven of the 12 members of the Community. Somone might ask, "How far are titles II, III and IV exclusively the Community's provenance, and how far are the other titles exclusively within the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice?" What if there are conflicting judgments about the interpretation of this so-called decision? Who will win?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) asked a pertinent question: whether the decision was registered with the United Nations as an international treaty. According to the most recent information that I have received, my right hon. Friend asked the Foreign Office that question before Christmas, in which case it has had plenty of time to find the answer.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I can confirm that. I asked whether the decision, or treaty, was registerable, and whether it had been registered. I have not yet received even a holding answer, although I believe that it will arrive by van today, three days late. I do not know when the substantive answer will arrive.

Mr. Spearing: I do not see a Foreign Office Minister in the Chamber. I am sorry that the great Foreign Office, with all its Ministers, cannot provide someone to listen to what we are saying; but I am not surprised that, in a rather strange speech, the Minister made it clear that he did not want the matter to be reported to Parliament.

Mr. Shore: On a point of order, Dame Janet. Is it not extraordinary that no Foreign Office Minister is present? My hon. Friend is raising points that are clearly not within the competence of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who is here to deal with European monetary union. These are serious matters, and it is outrageous that no Foreign Office Minister is listening.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The question of whom the Government put up to listen, or to speak on their behalf, is not a point of order for the Chair. No doubt Ministers will have noted the right hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Spearing: Thank you, Dame Janet—and I also thank my right hon. Friend for reinforcing my point. On an earlier occasion, I raised a point of order asking for a separate debate on these important matters; we are having that debate now. I pointed out then that I had written to the Attorney-General on 15 December, seeking information about the Edinburgh summit. I also asked him about the failure of the Foreign Office Minister to reply to points made in the previous debate. Many hon. Members will recall that famous occasion, when the Minister was apparently unable to reply to questions about justiciability. No wonder the poor chap could not answer; I did not think that there was an answer.

I took it on myself to write to the Attorney-General because I thought that he would know the answers to my questions. I requested a reply in time for today's debate, but so far it has not arrived. I believe that it will come tomorrow, but I am told that it will come not from the Attorney-General but from a Minister of State at the Foreign Office. It looks as though I shall have to write another letter. Not only have I had to write to the Attorney-General, who was not present for the previous debate, but no Foreign Office Minister is present today.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman referred to the status of the declarations relating to Denmark. Many of us are concerned about what is happening in Denmark, and interested in the outcome of the next referendum. We do not know when that will take place; it will depend on what Government Denmark has after its current difficulties.

Is the hon. Gentleman implying that the Danish people may be faced with a false prospectus? They may well be given certain assurances which have no validity in law. If the matters concerned come before the European Court in the first instance, the declarations may well be set aside and the Danish people may find that they have participated in a referendum on the basis of various assurances given to them by the Government of the moment which have no legal validity and could be dismissed by the European Court with the stroke of a pen.

7.30 pm

Mr. Spearing: I am not sure that it would necessarily be for the European Court or even for the International Court of Justice at the Hague. That matter has yet to be decided—we do not know. If the House of Commons does not know, I fail to understand how the Folketing can know either. The House is surely entitled, as a provisional signatory to the treaty, to the same information as the people of Denmark. We have yet to decide whether we will have the same opportunities in the future—that comes in a different part of the Bill—to put the same question that was put to the people of Denmark. We may yet do that.

If Denmark is treated in that way—at least by a possible con; I put it in colloquial language—we, as members of the European Community concerned with the quality of democracy in the Community, have just as much right to know whether the decision taken at Edinburgh was genuine.

On the evidence before us, the chances are that it was not genuine. My evidence is the words of the Prime Minister himself. On 14 December, I asked him how the nature of the European union could not be affected if the declaration at Edinburgh was to be legally and justiciably effective. If it is not to have an effect on the treaty, what has it to be effective and justiciable about? There cannot be one without the other. The Prime Minister replied:

"The hon. Gentleman began with a fallacy . . . What was agreed was an intergovernmental binding decision, not a treaty. There is a clear distinction between the two."—[Official Report, 14 December 1992; Vol. 216, c. 37.]

I do not see a clear distinction between an intergovernmental, binding decision and what we know as an international treaty. Perhaps I had better ask the Prime Minister about that. It seems that we are in dangerous waters.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Is not the most distressing part of much of this debate that we, as the tribunes of the people, are unable to decide such matters for ourselves? At every twist and turn, one is looking to the legal profession to tell us what it is that we think that we have decided in the name of the people. It seems that we have effectively copped out of making decisions on behalf of the people that we represent.

Mr. Spearing: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, but I will try to be a little imaginative and optimistic. In Britain, other than by treaty, the highest court is this House and another place. Is it not suspicious that, despite the hon. Gentleman's assertion about asking lawyers—I like to ask them things and obtain full explanations—no representative of the Lord Chancellor's Department is in his place? We can tell the people of this country that the fact of that absence should cause them to think very hard.

It may be that the Attorney-General's office would say, "This isn't really for us. We only deal with domestic law. International law is a job for the Foreign Office." That may be true, but where are the representatives of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office? Is it not the height of ministerial arrogance that, during 10 or 15 minutes of debate, the people of this country did not have a Foreign Office Minister present on the Government Front Bench to hear our remarks about international law?

Mr. Gill: Is it not almost irrelevant whether Ministers are present, because in the final analysis neither my right hon. Friend the Minister of State nor my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will be the final arbiter? A court beyond our shores will decide such matters.

Mr. Spearing: That may be terrible at the moment, but if the House does not pass the Bill, that is not entirely a matter for the Executive in Whitehall—the princes of politics. It is a matter for right hon. and hon. Members. If we say no to any important part of the Bill, there is nothing to prevent an improved treaty coming before us next time. That has already happened in the case of Denmark—or is it an improved treaty? The very fact that we do not know about the change that the people of Denmark managed to effect, if it is a change, is itself important. That the whole thing was not dropped straightaway because there was no unanimity is also a tell-tale sign.

One major constitutional matter has so far eluded the House, the media, and most of the public. It is of such stratospheric constitutional significance that is is not visible from the Floor of the Committee. The treaty was discussed for 18 months or two years at intergovernmental conferences, summits, conclaves and other meetings. The mind boggles at the man hours that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office must have put in. We had one version of the treaty, and then another. Then we had the treaty on European union, and a modification or not from the Danes. It went on and on.

That treaty of 134 pages was subject to ratification by the due constitutional procedures of each member state under article 236, but then one member said no. A few gentlemen and perhaps one or two ladies—I am not sure whether there are any lady Ministers—met for two days in Edinburgh and reached an overnight decision, without signature. They said, "We are going to change the treaty in respect of the obligations placed on one of our members."

If the Prime Minister is to be believed, they effectively changed the nature of the treaty, which is not to be ratified by the House or any other assembly of the people of the member states. If the Prime Minister is right and the nature of the change is justiciable, the treaty was changed—changed overnight by a group of people sitting in Edinburgh and deciding the way that the treaty should be changed.

It is not just a question of legislation. They do that in the Council, probably every week. It is not just the justiciability of the European Court or tax—they have those already. It is a matter of changing the effective constitution of the union. If that can be done virtually overnight by people sitting in Edinburgh, doing a deal, and changing the constitution of the total union that may be, surely that strikes more of the philosophy of ancient Rome than of the revolutionary and forward-looking philosophy that drove the people of Philadelphia into a different sort of constitution—had it been otherwise, I might not be speaking like this today.

Mr. Michael Spicer: First, let me say in response to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) that I, too, recollect the Minister of State saying that declarations were not legally binding. I listened rather carefully to that assertion. The hon. Member for Newham, South may have heard it before, but it was the first time that I had heard it said, certainly from the Dispatch Box. Perhaps the Minister of State made a mistake. I am sure that he will not wish to change the record, but he may wish to correct himself. I agree with the hon. Member for Newham, South: the Minister of State certainly said that in my hearing.

I support amendment No. 40 because title II is the instrument by which the jump is made irrevocably—which means for ever—towards a federal state of Europe. Hon. Members asked my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) what was the fundamental difference between the passage through the House of the Single European Act —and of earlier legislation in connection with that treaty —and the passage of the Maastricht Bill. The answer is precisely the word "irrevocable". We are to pass legislation that will bind future Parliaments. If there is a central element to our unwritten constitution, it is that one Parliament should not bind another. That is the new step that we are taking and it is the fundamental difference between the present Bill and everything that has happened before. That is the answer that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford should have given in response to those who teased him by asking why he had voted in favour of previous legislation but proposed to vote against the Bill. It is a perfectly logical position to adopt.

For the most part, those in Britain who defend the treaty avoid conceding that to accept Maastricht is inevitably and irrevocably to accept the formation of a united states of Europe. As has been said already, others in Europe have no such reservations about accepting the essential federalist nature of the treaty. Indeed, to them, the federalist intent of Maastricht is its chief attraction. That was clearly stated by Chancellor Kohl in a speech made at the Bertelsmann forum on 3 April last:

> "In Maastricht we laid the foundation-stone for the completion of the European union. The European union treaty introduces a new and decisive stage in the process of European union which within a few years will lead to the creation of what founder fathers of modern Europe dreamed of following the last war: the united states of Europe."

The Chancellor of Germany is in no doubt about the intent of the Maastricht treaty and his interpretation of the treaty must readily be accepted as the correct one: article 8 of title II establishes the rights and duties of union citizenship. To be a citizen, one has to be a citizen of something; there must exist a state to which one belongs.

The path by which the federal state is to be established under Maastricht is clearly laid out—it is through the formation of a single currency.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend has rightly referred to a statement made by Chancellor Helmut Kohl, in which he stated that it was his clear intention that there should be a united states of Europe. What Chancellor Kohl did not add—although it was certainly mentioned by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing)—is that the process will be irreversible. That is surely the fundamental point for the Committee to remember: what happens under Maastricht will be irrevocable and future Parliaments will not be able to overturn or change it. That is why this debate is so fundamental and why it is critical that the people of Britain should have a say, by way of a referendum, in that decision.

Mr. Spicer: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Maastricht is different from everything that has come before it because it is irreversible and irrevocable.

7.45 pm

Mr. Dorrell: I am listening carefully to what my hon. Friend is saying. I understood him to say that the obligations that we are to take on under the Maastricht treaty are fundamentally different from the obligations that we took on under earlier treaties because they were irrevocable. Perhaps he would like to turn his attention to article 240 of the treaty of Rome, which says:

> "This treaty"—

the treaty of Rome—

> "is concluded for an unlimited period".

Mr. Spicer: The fundamental difference is clearly related to the single currency. Until now, it has always been open to Parliament—because it has not been bound by any previous Parliament—to pass legislation that has the effect of revoking earlier decisions made here. There are at least three qualities attached to the single currency which make its creation the fundamental step towards a federalist state.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): My hon. Friend appears to have left the point that he was making earlier. So far, we have had about six or eight "crucial steps". My hon. Friend places far too much emphasis on what Chancellor Kohl said back in April; anyone can produce lots of speeches and high-falutin' rhetoric, but they do not necessarily signify. Moreover, the word "irrevocable" means little. Every piece of legislation that the House passes is irrevocable until it is changed. We do not have to start again with all the legislation on the first day of each Parliament. Finally, one does not need to have a state of which to be a citizen. The citizenship referred to in the treaty gives us certain additional rights on top of our British citizenship—in particular, the right to vote in local and European elections wherever one lives in Europe.

Mr. Spicer: I shall try to deal with my hon. Friend's points in sequence. She spoke of rhetoric. I sought to stress that people in Britain on the whole tried to avoid references to the federalist objective of the treaty—for obvious reasons, because, if the federalist objective were clearly pointed out, it would make the treaty extremely unattractive to most people in the country and, I suspect, to most in the House. I was merely saying that no such coyness exists in other countries or among their leaders —including, in the example that I picked, Chancellor Kohl of Germany.

I accept that if we were merely playing with words, my hon. Friend's point about the word "irrevocable" might have some validity. But the word is attached to the concept of a single currency and that is what will make the great difference, for the following reasons. Under most definitions of sovereignty, when a country passes over control of its coinage, all other forms of money or credit and its banking system, it has taken the essential step towards giving away sovereignty and the control of its economy. Moreover, in this case, it does so irrevocably. The establishment of a single currency is a meaningless concept unless it is for ever—for eternity. That has profound implications for the sovereignty, rights and history of this Parliament.

Mrs. Currie: The word "irrevocable" needs to be challenged. We regularly sign treaties containing such words. The most significant treaty that we ever signed was that by which we acceded to NATO. That really changed a lot and constituents of mine have died doing what they could, as members of the armed forces, for NATO. That sort of thing was done without thorough debate in the House. I put it to my hon. Friend that nothing is irrevocable. It is often a good idea to get stuck into something, join in and be part of alliances, and do our utmost to make them work in our interests.

Mr. Spicer: I am in favour of alliances, but there is all the difference in the world. If my hon. Friend is basing her case on that particular argument, she has totally misunderstood the whole thrust of this treaty and the treaty of Rome. We are talking about a change in the law, which is a fundamentally different concept from an alliance such as NATO. We are talking about something which is totally and generically different.

It is extraordinary that my hon. Friend, who is intelligent and coherent on such matters, should raise the matter of NATO, which is an example of how we have created circumstances in the past which were open to change. This is different. We are about to determine the law of the land in a context in which we will be bound for ever.

Mr. Bill Walker: When the people of England and Scotland previously signed a similar treaty for a union they knew what union meant, and we meant it. That is exactly what union means today. Anyone who doubts the meaning of union should remember the reassurances that were given during discussions on the 1972 Act and the Single European Act in 1985. We were given assurances that union did not mean union. We now know that union does mean union because we are creating it.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spicer: I shall continue, but I will give way in a moment.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is enjoying himself.

Mr. Spicer: I am certainly enjoying myself, although I am not sure whether others will let me go on protractedly for too long.

One implication of the irrevocable nature of what is involved in the treaty, and the fact that the sovereignty of Parliament will be removed, especially one Parliament's ability not to bind another, is to make spurious the argument that has been used against a referendum.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spicer: I will give way in a moment. The argument against a referendum which has been used is that we should do everything through the House. I would certainly prefer that. However, part of the objective of the treaty is to destroy the sovereignty of the House by removing the convention and history by which no Parliament binds its successor——

Mrs. Currie: That is nonsense.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend may say that it is nonsense. However, I give my views to the House and that is precisely what I think.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope that we will maintain the tradition of the House that each hon. Member has the freedom to say what he or she likes, even if it is not popular with others.

Mr. Spicer: That particular freedom will be maintained. As I said, the freedom of the House to be totally sovereign within itself will be removed if we set up something irrevocably and for ever. That is the simple point that I am making. Therefore, to argue against a referendum on the grounds that the sovereignty of Parliament must continue is spurious.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I am surprised by the argument that my hon. Friend has adopted because I know him well and I know that he has considerable constitutional experience. Does he not realise that it is a fundamental part of our constitution that no Parliament can bind its successor? Even if we sought to use this treaty or any other instrument passed through the House to try to bind our successors, we would not be able to do so. Therefore, it does not matter whether any treaty or any other obligation that we accept may or may not be without any time limit. By definition, it is impossible in practice and in theory to overturn the principle of the British constitution that no Parliament can bind its successor.

Mr. Spicer: I do not think that the European Court will accept what my hon. Friend has said. Once the European Court is faced with the law as defined under the Maastricht treaty, it will apply that law. Indeed, the Commission will also apply the law in so far as it has the legislative power to do so.

There is no question but that we are creating a law which will exist unless we build in some new powers of secession. If new powers of secession are not built in, we will have to comply with the law for ever because that is what the treaty and the single currency mean. That would be the case unless the law was changed by unanimous vote and a new treaty negotiated.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful that my hon. Friend has reinforced the point made by my hon. Friends the Members for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) and for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies). Perhaps my hon. Friend could tell the Committee what he thought would be the legal effect, as interpreted by the English courts, of the repeal of the European Community Act 1972.

While my hon. Friend is addressing that question, can he come back to what I asked him earlier? He argued that the Maastricht treaty imported a new principle in that it was irrevocable. My point was that exactly the same principle is contained in the treaty of Rome. There is no new precedent in the Maastricht treaty on the point that he is developing.

Mr. Spicer: I know that some lawyers take the view that we have already gone beyond the point at which we remain a sovereign country. The Minister has just said that he is one of them. I think that most lawyers still take the view that the process of refining, withdrawing and revising parts of legislation which have been passed by the House remains open to us. Other lawyers dispute that. I simply believe that we have not yet passed the point at which we lose sovereignty.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Will my hon. Friend give way?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Can I be clear to whom the hon. Gentleman is giving way?

Mr. Spicer: I give way to the Minister and then to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is difficult to understand the new precendents which my hon. Friend seems to be reading into the Maastricht treaty. He has just referred to one of them. He will recall that in the Single European Act, which he and I supported, we approved the objective of the progressive realisation of economic and monetary union. What did my hon. Friend think he was voting for at that time?

Mr. Spicer: If my hon. Friend is saying——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. Gentleman continues, could I make the point that hon. Members must address the Chair? I have been treated to a succession of ministerial backs.

Mr. Spicer: If my hon. Friend the Minister is saying that, in effect, the single currency commitment already exists as a result of previous legislation, why did he make such a play on the opt-out clause which he achieved? I certainly do not accept it.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spicer: No.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Perhaps the Minister should take note of article 5 of the Maastricht treaty. This will assist my hon. Friend. It says:

"Member states shall take all appropriate measures to ensure fulfilment of the obligations arising out of this treaty or resulting from action taken by the institutions of the Community. They shall facilitate the achievement of the Community's tasks. They shall abstain from any action which could jeopardise the attainment of the objectives in this treaty."

Of course, if we are bound by the Maastricht treaty, we are bound.

Mr. Spicer: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is a further point in the context of a single currency and its effect on the federal objective. If there is a single currency, there is, by implication, a single pricing system throughout the new federal state which is being established. There will be a single pricing system and a single currency, but not single wage levels. Indeed, there will be different wage levels and different economic states of development.

There will be misery and political disruption throughout the new state unless a single central compensatory authority with taxation and expenditure powers is established in association with a single currency. It is as logical as night follows day that the establishment of a single currency should involve the establishment of a single taxation authority and a single economic authority. If that is not the foundation, the makings and the essence of a new sovereign state, I do not know what is.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Spicer: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, but after that I will not give way to anyone else for the time being.

8 pm

Mr. Garel-Jones: I wish to clarify the point that I sought to make to my hon. Friend and to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet). When my hon. Friend and I voted for the Single European Act, we approved the objective of the progressive realisation of economic and monetary union. The route to that economic and monetary union was not defined. Therefore, we were at risk that under article 235 progress would be made towards EMU. The advantage of Maastricht is that it defines what EMU is. Furthermore—this is the point that I wish to make to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North—every time that EMU or a single currency is referred to either in the preamble or in the treaty itself, it is followed by eight magic words:

"in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty".

That is a direct reference to our ability to opt out of that union. So we are in a stronger position now than when we voted for the Single European Act.

Mr. Spicer: I shall deal with the matter of opt-outs in a few moments. My hon. Friend answered his own point about whether everything was set in concrete. It was not. Some general objectives were set down in previous treaties and legislation. However, in the Maastricht treaty we are presented with the objective of a single currency.

The only point that I am making at the moment is that clear qualities are associated with the objective of a single currency which add up to a new federal state of Europe. That seems absolutely clear to me, especially on my last point about the essential addition to the single currency of a single economic authority with single taxation and expenditure powers. If that is not the essence of a single state, I do not know what is.

The question in my mind is therefore not whether Maastricht leads towards a federal state of Europe, but whether such a state and such a loss of national sovereignty is a good thing. I certainly recognise that the nation state is a relatively recent invention and that there is no eternal quality about the nation state. I suppose that in Britain it goes back to Henry VIII under certain interpretations. When Henry VIII said, "This realm of England is an empire", it was an act of rebellion. That was the formation of the nation state. I do not base my case on the eternity of the nation state.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spicer: If my hon. Friend will allow me to finish this point, I shall certainly give way. The question which I shall address after I have allowed my hon. Friend to intervene is whether now is the right point at which to abolish the nation state and move across to some other formation.

Mr. Marlow: I wonder whether we can knock a little issue on the head early on in the debate. The Government have a little list of those who supported the Single European Act who now take a different view because they have learnt from experience that things are not as they were said to be at the time. If I could take my hon. Friend back to that time, when he was safely enmeshed in Government, those of us who opposed the Single European Act were told not to worry. The Government said, "It is only about a single market. There is a certain amount of qualified majority voting, but let us have a single market, which is greatly to the benefit of the United Kingdom. We have a veto on everything else. Do not worry, boys. There is nothing in it."

Now the Government are saying about the Maastricht treaty, "We have won all the arguments. We are going there. It is going our way." But look at the details, the text and the small print, because in two years the Government will come back and say, "You agreed to it at the time of the Maastricht debate."

Mr. Spicer: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. It is a variant of the Lord Denning argument. A tidal wave of legislation is about to swamp us. Some people take the view—I do not know whether the Minister of State is one of them, but he seemed to imply it at one point—that we have already crossed the point at which we retain any real sovereignty. Indeed, there are legal precedents for suggesting that, when this Parliament passes legislation, it is inferior to legislation which comes out of the legal institutions of the European Community.

So I agree with my hon. Friend entirely that because we are dealing with law—this is the difference between treaties and alliances—the words matter. That is particularly so because we are dealing with an alien form of law—Roman law. As it is codified law, the words matter. That is the essence of the argument that we deploy. It so happens that the proposed new law sets up certain patterns which undermine the sovereignty of this Parliament. It sets up a new federal state of Europe. However, few Members of Parliament are prepared to accept publicly that that is what the Bill does, even though they support the treaty.

The question is whether the nation state still has a role. At a practical level, the idea of converging our economies —for example, by means of fixed exchange rates—must now have been discredited. Events surrounding the ERM and throughout the history of this century have proved that. The attempts to follow the gold standard were completely disastrous. One way of considering the single currency must be to consider it as an ERM in perpetuity.

As the concept of managing one's economy according to the objectives of someone else's economy has singularly failed, the idea that at this stage we can merge our economies through a single currency is foolish on the basis of historical precedent and practicality. However, there is surely a much more fundamental point. It is that we must ask what benefit we gain from the transfer to a new federal organisation.

Let us take the issue of democracy, which above all must concern Members of Parliament. Transferring the sovereignty and undermining the position of this Parliament in favour of an unelected central bank, an unelected Commission and an unelected court of law under Maastricht cannot be done lightly under any circumstances without some massive trade-off.

We know that the economic trade-offs of our arrangements with Europe are dubious. At present we have a £10 billion trade deficit with Europe. I cannot see what benefits we shall achieve out of political union and the transfer of sovereignty

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend talks about the transfer of sovereignty, but perhaps as important in the short term is the transfer of resources. Is my hon. Friend aware that, for example, our membership of the ERM cost Britain 1 million jobs, with all the poverty and problems that that creates? Under the convergence and other proposals in the Maastricht treaty, we shall transfer further resources to Portugal, Spain and Greece—countries which are already depriving us of jobs and part of our manufacturing base. Does my hon. Friend consider that that is a sensible way to represent the interests of the people of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Spicer: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that the costs are enormous. It is not just the £10 billion trading deficit with Europe. It is the £2 billion that we pay under various budgetary arrangements. My hon. Friend is correct that enormous costs were associated with the ERM. Some people have estimated that the most recent attempts to bolster the ERM cost more than £20 billion. So my hon. Friend has a good point.

Mr. Devlin: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spicer: No. I shall make some progress and give way later if my hon. Friend still wishes to intervene.

It is sometimes said that the process laid down by Maastricht is so unrealistic and premature that it will fall apart under the weight of its own absurdity. It is said that the Germans in particular ultimately will not wear it, so we do not need to bother too much about what is going on.

The fallacy in that argument is simple; we have been debating it for the past 10 minutes. Once Maastricht is signed its provisions become the law of the land. The Commission and the European Court will take over from the politicians to ensure that the rules are applied. There seems to be much misunderstanding on that point both in Britain and in other countries. Let us take the example of the decision by the German Bundestag to ratify, subject to further consideration, the terms of the monetary union.

Germany's position would not be legal after ratification of the treaty. Unlike Britain and Denmark, Germany has no opt-out clause and it will be bound, for instance, by paragraph 4 of article 109j, which states clearly:

"If by the end of 1997 the date for the beginning of the third stage has not been set, the third stage shall start on 1 January 1999."

There are no ifs and buts and no clauses built in to allow the Bundestag to have its say. That will become the law in Germany as well as here, which brings me to the question of the British opt-out. It is unimaginable to me that if Britain accepts Maastricht it will be able to opt out of the single currency. Other hon. Friends may develop a more legalistic argument on the matter, but it is common sense that it will be unimaginable for us to opt out.

If we ratify the Maastricht treaty, one of the tragic consequences will be that Britain will face the choice of sacrificing control over its economy, in the way that I have tried to describe, or of leaving the European Community. I cannot see how we could remain within the EC as the only country—other than Denmark, perhaps—committed to staying outside the single currency. In any event, it would be meaningless to do so because article 109m of title

[Mr. Spicer]

II forces us to comply with EC monetary policy as if we were within the single currency. That is my answer to people who say that we will not have to go back into the ERM.

Mr. Dalyell: If all this is so imaginable, how are we to imagine that the hon. Gentleman remained a Minister in Mrs. Thatcher's Government for so long?

Mr. Spicer: I have been trying to answer precisely that question. In my view—and it is only one person's view—the treaty is fundamentally different from any other legislation that we have passed. Other people take a different view and even the lawyers argue about it. I am with the lawyers who say that we are about to take a step which, because of its irrevocable nature, will mean that we will lose our sovereignty. Ministers keep popping up and down and have said that some of the provisions go back a long way, but I take a different view. The treaty is a fundamentally different step.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Does not Lady Thatcher take exactly that view—that the Single European Act, which she passed as Prime Minister, was entirely different because it was devoted to economics, whereas the treaty is intended to make us part of a federal political union? If Lady Thatcher takes that view, her Ministers of the day are also entitled to do so.

Mr. Spicer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention.

On the question of whether we will have to re-enter the ERM, one aspect of the Maastricht treaty which worries me is that it will force us to rejoin. Some hon. Members have said that that is not true, but article 109m clearly states:

"Until the beginning of the third stage, each Member State shall treat its exchange rate policy as a matter of common interest . . . From the beginning of the third stage and for as long as a Member State has derogation, paragraph 1 shall apply by analogy to the exchange rate policy of that Member State."

The opt-out in the appropriate protocol makes us fall within the category of member states who have derogations, so there seems to be little doubt that we will have to re-enter the ERM if we sign the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Dorrell: I should like to hear my hon. Friend develop that argument. He seems to interpret meaning in the words of article 109m that is not there. He says that it is accepted that if the United Kingdom exercises its right under the protocol and does not join monetary union, the provisions of article 109m would apply: that "exchange rate policy" is "a matter of common interest."

That does not mean that, merely because exchange rate policy is a matter of common interest, member states are obliged to join the ERM, nor does it state that anywhere in the treaty.

Secondly, paragraph 4 of the protocol governing the United Kingdom's position states, totally unambiguously, that if we choose not to join monetary union

"the United Kingdom shall retain its powers in the field of monetary policy according to national law."

Our national law makes no provision for an obligation to join the ERM.

8.15 pm

Mr. Spicer: I am gratified at the way in which Ministers are popping up and down like yo-yos to join in the debate because they have been rather reluctant to debate these matters in public. That at least is a good development.

In answer to my hon. Friend the Minister on the question of the protocol, in paragraph 6 he will find that article 109m

"shall apply to the United Kingdom as if it had a derogation."

Mr. Dorrell indicated assent.

Mr. Spicer: Precisely. That means that from the beginning of the third stage, and for as long as a member state has a derogation, paragraph 1 shall apply by analogy to the exchange rate policy of that member state. Paragraph 1 talks about the common interest.

My hon. Friend the Minister may give us his opinion that the common interest does not mean that we will have to re-enter the ERM, but after we ratify the treaty his views will not matter. That is one of the problems. The views of the judges and of those people to whom the matter is appealed are what will count.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend invite the Government to get some independent advice? It is all very well for us to act as though we were well-qualified amateur lawyers. Most of us are doing so out of ignorance and prejudice. A definitive statement of how the Commission and the European Court interpret the matter is required. Mr. Martin Howe argues forcefully that we shall be obliged to join the ERM—after all, he comes from a family which has some prejudices on the issue. However, the Minister says that there is no chance of the United Kingdom being forced into the ERM. Definitive and objective advice is required, either from the Commission's legal department or from the European Court, so that we know what will happen.

Mr. Spicer: The one thing that cannot be said of my hon. Friend is that he is an amateur lawyer—he is extremely knowledgeable on the matter. After we have analysed the question, it will be handed to the European Court and to the Commission to determine. It will be for lawyers to figure out how to determine it, but it seems to me that the "common interest" could be interpreted by the court to mean that we would have to rejoin the ERM as other countries are doing so. My views are no more worth while than the Minister's, because ultimately the matter will be determined by the court.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I am sure that the question of whether there is a legal requirement for us to rejoin the ERM is an interesting argument, but, in practical political terms, does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the Maastricht treaty were ratified and the Bill were to become law, the Government would rejoin the ERM around the turn of the year because there would be no logic in their being part of the exercise without doing so?

Mr. Spicer: Yes, I agree that that would be part of the logic and part of the new Maastricht philosophy which would have been accepted.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): My hon. Friend is being very generous in allowing interventions. I invite him to return to the phrase that is causing him so much serious concern—article 109m. Is he saying that he foresees a court or an amateur or professional lawyer interpreting the phrase,

"each Member State shall treat its exchange rate policy as a matter of common interest" as the same as saying that each member state shall enter the ERM?

Mr. Spicer: That is one interpretation. I did not want to bore the Committee by reading out all of article 109m, but the next sentence states:

"In so doing, Members States shall take account of the experience acquired in co-operation within the framework of the European Monetary System and in developing the ECU, and shall respect existing powers in this field."

In that context I could understand why lawyers might decide that that was tantamount to an instruction to go back into the ERM.

Mr. Marlow: The problem with all these treaties is that the same point is addressed in several different places within them. Article 102a, under the title "Economic Policy", states:

"Member States shall conduct their economic policies with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the Community, as defined in Article 2".

If we ratify the treaty we will commit ourselves to that. Article 2 states:

"The Community shall have as its task, by establishing a common market and an economic and monetary union".

How are we to have such an economic and monetary union without passing through the ERM first? Whatever the other opt-outs and bits in the treaty, if we agreed and ratified that part of the treaty it would be used against us by European institutions that want us to come along with them more quickly than we would want. They would say that we would have to get back into the ERM.

Mr. Spicer: That is why it is unimaginable that, having signed up to the treaty and become part of it all, we would then be able to exert opt-outs. We would have signed up to the objectives and philosophy set out in the treaty and to those institutions.

Mr. John Townend: Does my hon. Friend agree that something in the way in which the Government are putting over their case does not ring true? On the one hand, they have said that they intend that Britain shall be at the centre of Europe, but, on the other, they say, "Haven't we done well? We have got an opt-out from the single currency." If we exercise that opt-out and there is a single currency or even a joint currency of member countries and we are neither in that currency nor part of the ERM, we will not be able to claim that we are in the centre of Europe. We will be on the edge of Europe, as we always have been and always will be.

Mr. Spicer: One of the paradoxes of the entire debate on this matter and one of my major criticisms of it is that the full logic of what has been done has never been spelt out. Despite everything that I have said and the strong arguments held by many of my hon. Friends and by others, the question remains as to whether, politically, matters are now so sewn up in this country as to make further resistance and debate a waste of time.

In the weeks that lie ahead some people may wonder why those of us who oppose ratification of the Maastricht treaty will continue to argue our position hard and in great detail. We have powerful arguments to place on record. One of the features of the entire debate—acknowledged by most dispassionate observers—is the fact that those of us who do not support Maastricht have made most of the running with the arguments in the past months. That has not necessarily happened because we are more assiduous than the treaty's defenders, but because that defence has been flawed in one crucial respect. Its defenders have not been prepared to argue for it in the only terms possible —on the basis that its avowed objective is a new, federalist state of Europe. There has not been so much coyness in other countries. I can respect the federalist position, but I do not accept it for the reasons that I have already given. I cannot accept or respect, however, the position of those who say that we can have Maastricht while at the same time retaining the sovereignty and independence of our democratic institutions.

People may still ask what is the point of resisting the united determination of those occupying the Front Benches to plough ahead with this treaty. It is a fact that the leaders of the three major parties are working together, either explicitly or implicitly, as they did, some might say to disastrous effect, over the ERM, and as they did in years gone by, with even more disastrous consequences, over the gold standard. I am beginning to wonder whether a new law of politics is about to emerge which dictates that when those on the Front Benches agree they are almost invariably wrong.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his generosity in giving way. Earlier my hon. Friend sought to explain what the common concern concept meant in the context of exchange rate policy. He said that under article 109m the exchange rate would remain a matter of common concern even if we exercised our right to stay outside monetary union. He said that he feared that lawyers might interpret that as a commitment to rejoin the ERM against our will. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) also suggested that we should take legal advice on that point.

I can tell the Committee that we have, today, published legal advice on precisely that subject in the form of a memorandum to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. My hon. Friend may also like to consider that the commitment by member states to regard their exchange rate as a matter of common concern is not a recent invention, but was contained in article 107 of the treaty of Rome, which was signed more than 20 years before the ERM was invented. Therefore, it would be rather difficult to interpret that commitment, which dates back to 1958, as a commitment to join the ERM.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend may make that interpretation——

Sir Russell Johnston: On a point of order, Dame Janet. May I respectfully say that your instructions to Ministers to face you has also had the consequence of their turning their backs on the microphone. While it may, for reasons of your own, be an advantage for you, Dame Janet, to see Ministers, it is also desirable that we should be able to hear them.

The Second Deputy Chairman: When I made my request I was thinking in terms of a back clearly shown to me. I have not the slightest objection if Ministers face what I call the normal way. Perhaps, for the purposes of the microphone, that would be better.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: On a point of order, Dame Janet. The Financial Secretary has drawn the attention of the Committee to a memorandum that the Treasury has apparently published. Is that document available to the Committee, which is currently debating this rather important matter? I should be very pleased to hear that it is, but could I have your confirmation as to whether you are aware that that document is available not just to members of the Select Committee, but to this Committee?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I have no knowledge of that and, if I heard aright, I am not sure that that is entirely a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I believe that I can help you, Dame Janet. The first report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee was published today and the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) will be able to obtain a copy of it from the Vote Office if he goes there now.

The Second Deputy Chairman: That seems to have settled the matter satisfactorily. Is the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) still speaking to the amendment?

Mr. Spicer: I am trying to draw my remarks to a close, but I have been intervened upon many times by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench—obviously they are trying to filibuster.

Given the collusion, or at least the firm agreement, that seems to exist on broad matters of policy, particularly the issue now under debate, among those on the three Front Benches, one must ask why we do not recognise reality and accept that the best way in which to keep a secret is to make a speech in the House on Europe. One may ask why we do not shut up and get on with Third Reading. I venture to suggest that, were we to do so, no one would be more embarrassed than members of the Government who are committed to not having that Third Reading before the Danish referendum.

8.30 pm

Of course, the Danish referendum will now largely determine whether the treaty is ratified. The Danish Government are hard at work trying to persuade their countrymen of two things. The first is that at Edinburgh they achieved some sort of victory for Denmark. However, no less a person than Chancellor Helmut Kohl recently knocked that idea on the head in the article that was quoted earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). Today the Minister of State confirmed that there was absolutely no change in the treaty as a result of Edinburgh. Therefore, the question to be put to the Danish people will be precisely the same one and it will be about precisely the treaty to which they earlier said no.

Perhaps recognising the paucity of what was achieved at Edinburgh from their own point of view, the Danish Government have a fallback position—to persuade the Danish people of the dangers of standing alone against the rest of Europe. Fortunately, in this context, the British Government have already said very clearly that if Denmark rejects Maastricht, they, too, will reject it. In the meantime, the Danish people need to know that the debate goes on in Britain and in its Parliament—that in the run-up to their referendum they are not on their own. The candle of democracy still burns in the British Parliament. That will be the message that will go out in the next few weeks. It is a very sorry state of affairs that it has come to this—that we shall now, in large measure, be playing the role of cheerleaders, depending for our future on the will of the electorate of another country. This choice has not been of my making or that of my colleagues. We must, however, work with events—whether they be the Danish referendum, the crumbling facade of the ERM, the growing unwillingness of the Germans to sacrifice control of the deutschmark, or the increasingly anxious expressions of the British people.

Time is required for these events to unfold and, in this country, for the details of the Maastricht treaty to be better understood. That is what the forthcoming debates will be all about. Let me state my position and what I take to be the position of my colleagues. Far from being a "little Englander", I am concerned, above all, to set the relationships between Britain and the other countries of Europe in the context of the high seas, of well-established international alliances and of a commitment to free trade and democracy.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): I hope that the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) will not mind if I do not follow on directly from his very lengthy and interesting tirade against the Maastricht treaty. No doubt, however, I shall pick up some of the points that he has made.

I want to begin by addressing those articles of the treaty that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends and I consider to be at the heart of what Britain stands to gain from the treaty and from what has come to be known as the Maastricht process—notably the aims expressed in title II of the treaty. Amid the seemingly never-ending torrent of prejudiced and selective information on this subject, people can be forgiven for overlooking—they may never even have been told—the content of this vital provision. I regard it as so important and so admirable that I shall quote it in full:

"to promote throughout the Community a harmonious and balanced development of economic activities, sustainable and non-inflationary growth respecting the environment, a high degree of convergence of economic performance, a high level of employment and social protection, the raising of the standard of living and quality of life, and economic and social cohesion and solidarity among Member States."

That is an absolutely superb set of aims at the heart of the treaty. From Labour's point of view, it must be the most important part of the treaty. Indeed, as has already been said, it could have come straight from a Labour party manifesto. Any of my right hon. or hon. Friends could have written it. In fact, some probably have done when composing manifestos in the past. It is no surprise that this has caused such problems for Conservative Members.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who moved amendment No. 40 a very long time ago and whom I regard as the authentic voice of Conservative Members who oppose all matters Maastricht and European, rubbished these aims. He did so in the most eloquent, albeit disagreeable, terms. The heart of his argument was that article 2 seeks to fetter free markets and to prevent proper and responsible Government intervention in order to secure these very important objectives.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman has talked, quite rightly, about the attraction of article 2. Surely he is aware that one of the weapons to be used to achieve these desirable objectives is the ERM. But the ERM has created poverty, unemployment and industrial collapse in many parts of the European Community—not least in the United Kingdom. Perhaps as a result of the ERM the United Kingdom has lost 1 million jobs.

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to his opinion, but many Labour Members take the view that poverty and unemployment in the United Kingdom has more to do with the policies of the Government and the Conservative party than with our membership of the ERM.

Mr. Shore: I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that there is a mixture of factors here. Undoubtedly one of these is the failure of Government policies over a long period, but another is the obligations of the treaties that we have entered into. The failure of Government policies, the appalling weakness of the British economy and the consequent total inability of Britain to stay in a fixed exchange rate system without sustaining massively high and unnecessary unemployment is a peculiar and lethal mixture. My hon. Friend's declaration about article 2 is fine—nobody objects to that—but the trouble about the mention of high employment as an objective is that nowhere else in the 130-odd pages are those words repeated. All the rest is about particular policies of economic and monetary union that would work absolutely in the opposite direction.

Mr. Mandelson: I respect the views of my right hon. Friend—indeed, he is a genuine and long-standing friend. However, others take the view that the economic problems that he describes are due equally to the failure of Ministers to use the opportunities that are available through greater European integration and co-operation between Governments, which is precisely what the Maastricht treaty seeks to expand and strengthen.

Mr. Butcher: If Ministers fail, if the electorate does not like what they do, they can be sacked at a general election. But after this treaty has added to the rolling progress of Europe we shall not be able to sack the Ministers responsible for ruining the economy. The point is that our being one twentieth of a democracy will eliminate a major part of our power to control our own rate of employment or unemployment, our own interest rates and our own dynamic activity in the economy. The Labour party, the Conservative party and the Liberal party will lose that right for ever.

Mr. Mandelson: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's view. I do not believe that we are simply victims of economic circumstances. I do not think that we are offering ourselves as corks to bob along the surface of the stormy Maastricht treaty, unable to formulate policies within the framework offered by the treaty to overcome precisely the economic and employment difficulties that the hon. Gentleman has identified. Political hands are indeed very important, and I believe that political hands other than those currently in power in this country, resting on a ratified Maastricht treaty, would create very many more opportunities for economic and social progress. For that we must wait for the next election.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) implied that nowhere else in the document on Maastricht is there a reference to the goal of lasting high employment. However, there is an agreement on social policy which has that precise aim, which the Government have opted out of but which a future Labour Government can opt into. Article 1 of the agreement on social policy says:

> "The Community and the Member States shall have as their objectives the promotion of employment, improved living and working conditions, proper social protection, dialogue between management and labour, the development of human resources with a view to lasting high employment."

Mr. Mandelson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend who, characteristically, has his finger and eye on all the provisions of the treaty, not just those which some other hon. Members would selectively pick out to serve their jaundiced points of view.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I make a little progress.

If the points which my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) has brought out so successfully from the treaty were at the front of Ministers' minds at recent European Council meetings, we would have had a different outcome from those meetings. It is shameful that Ministers, both at Birmingham and subsequently at Edinburgh, did not have those provisions at the forefront of their minds when addressing the appalling mass unemployment that exists throughout Europe. Instead of following that course, at the Birmingham summit our Government and the President of the Council refused even to place the need for European recovery on the agenda. At Edinburgh, the self-same President relegated discussions on unemployment and the need for economic recovery to talks over lunch and then forced the Council to agree a diluted set of measures and a diluted European recovery programme, which the Commission had originally sought to put before the Council for agreement. That is a shameful record and a tragic indictment of the Government's economic policies. Moreover, it is a disagreeable and disgraceful indictment of their record throughout their presidency of the European Council and how they seek to lead policy and debate on European matters in this country.

Possibly to an extent against their better judgment and will, the Government have been forced to sign up to first-rate articles at the head of that treaty which Opposition Members should applaud. We should not jeopardise that very important gain but should do everything in our power to strengthen and further it. However, it is only a start. The treaty provides us with a framework for further progress. I do not regard the treaty as an end in itself. I do not put out the flags and celebrate with beer and sandwiches the fact that we have arrived at last and have full employment and social progress now and for ever more simply because we have signed on the dotted line. The treaty is a framework—a start.

Articles 2 and 3, which some hon. Members have subjected to so much textual and literal analysis, are not a set of policies. They must now be hammered out on the basis of the articles and titles that have been agreed. They depend in turn on the policies that stem from the treaty—the policies that allow national Governments to develop and implement them within the framework of the treaty. They must now be hammered out within national Parliaments and Governments and between national Governments. The fight for the full implementation of the treaty following its ratification will only begin once ratification has taken place. The way in which national Governments take those decisions and seek to implement the treaty will shape economic policy making post-Maastricht, and so much depends on that if we are to realise the treaty's aims.

The treaty is permissive and sets a direction. It encourages and directs us to hammer out policies of a particular nature, with goals to which we strongly subscribe, but the proof of Maastricht will be in its implementation.

8.45 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies: My hon. Friend says that the treaty is permissive. Does he agree that, on economic and monetary union, leaving aside the opt-out negotiated by the Government, it is certainly not permissive? It means irrevocable progress towards economic and monetary union.

Mr. Mandelson: Yes, which I strongly support.

Mr. Davies: But it is not permissive.

Mr. Mandelson: The framework permits the hammering out of economic policies, guidelines and decisions which have yet to be discussed. My right hon. Friend must allow me to continue to make the case as I wish—[Interruption.] I believe that the attainment of economic and monetary union is desirable and necessary. I remind my right hon. Friend that that view is shared by the overwhelming majority of those who attended and were represented at the Labour party conference last autumn —[Interruption.] I shall not be disrupted by points about how we arrive at our votes. Some people like to trumpet votes in favour of matters with which they agree but when they disagree with the vote, they prefer to hide it under the nearest seat. I am at least consistent in those matters. It has been my privilege for a long time to adhere to and trumpet party policy in the series of roles that I have had within my party.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about the mandatory obligations under the second article, but if he refers back to the treaty of Rome he will find similar mandatory obligations there. That treaty was ratified 36 years ago and there has been ample time to hammer it out, but what has been achieved?

Mr. Mandelson: I am not sure what point the hon. Gentleman is making. However, I shall take from it a reinforcement of my view, which is that those matters are in political hands and depend on political judgments and decisions. If the politicians are lacking, so will be the implementation of agreements forged between Governments.

The priority to be given to growth, employment and closing the gap between rich and poor regions is important to the Labour party.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mandelson: I am sorry, but I must carry on. I shall give way later.

The means of achieving those priorities must be fought for in the implementation of the Maastricht treaty. All is to play for, but one makes a decision, one forms a judgment, about a treaty like this: will the treaty and its implementation help or hinder in the attainment of those goals? The judgment that I and my party have reached is that the treaty will help us in pursuit of those goals—growth, employment and closing the gap between the rich and poor regions. That, I believe, is and will remain a settled policy for my party.

Therefore, the platform upon which the Labour party stands is not simply the treaty's articles or titles alone. They are the skeleton of the treaty. The platform on which we stand is what I could describe as "Maastricht-plus", the flesh which must be added to the skeleton of the treaty —the economic policies that are required in Britain and throughout Europe to enable our country to compete and to grow without being blown off course, as we have so often been before, by recurrent currency speculation, by inflation risks and by deflationary pressures, and in the process to rid the continent and, above all, our own country of the scourge of mass unemployment.

For the goals of economic and monetary union to be fully realised, there must be a strategy—I fully accept this and believe it to be the case—to build on the treaty's strengths as well as to combat its weaknesses. What is the key to this? What is the Maastricht-plus that we need to put in place, round which core we can construct a strategy to attain those economic and employment goals which are the end of the creation of economic and monetary union? The answer lies, in my view, in the economic as opposed to the monetary wing of the provisions of economic and monetary union, economic provisions and proposals which for some reason are frequently and conveniently ignored by some of the treaty's opponents in making their rather prejudiced case against the treaty.

The key is the requirement of member states, set out in the treaty, its provisions and protocols, to co-ordinate their economic policies within a framework called the economic policy guidelines which national Governments are obliged to draw up in the framework provided for in the treaty, drawn up by the Commission and adopted by qualified majority vote in the Council. These guidelines will be set in accordance with the treaty, with a view to advancing those economic objectives of the treaty which are set out in article 2, which is certainly not monetarist or Thatcherite or rightist in any shape or form and one which could have come from the lips of any of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Moreover, the treaty provides for a regular evaluation of the extent to which these policies, which have been hammered out and put together within the economic policy guidelines that are a feature of the Maastricht process, and the economic developments throughout the Community are consistent with these guidelines. In other words, they will keep under permanent review—the Commission working together with the Parliament and the Council—how these goals are being realised, whether we are making progress towards them, how well we are performing in attaining the objectives set out in article 2, and whether we need to make any adjustments to our policy in order to boost that performance and realise those objectives.

Furthermore, there will be crucial opportunities for political pressure—because this is what it is all about—to be exerted to achieve economic policy making, both by national Governments and Governments working in concert throughout the Community, not only in the interests of individual countries but in the interests of the Community as a whole. It is not hard, for example, to see how this kind of economic policy making, based on a commitment to policy co-ordination and conducted within the framework of common objectives set out in the treaty, would have produced a very different course for German fiscal policy and interest rates from the damaging one followed in recent months.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath) rose——

Mr. Mandelson: I will give way in a moment. If we had had that framework in place, if we had secured that co-ordination and that altogether saner way of conducting our policies, we would not have the economic problems that have been generated by German policies. We would, on the contrary, have had a Europeanising of German policy which would certainly have served us and Europe very much better and also, in the medium and long term, the German people themselves.

Mr. Hain: The comments of my hon. Friend about the Europeanisation of Germany's economic policy are welcome and I agree with them, but he is quoting selectively from the treaty. He has referred to article 2, what I call the "sunny weather and cold ice cream" clause, the kind of clause that no one can disagree with because its general sentiments are admirable. Let us look at the implementation of the economic policy to which he refers, and particularly paragraph 2 of Article 3a. It refers to an economic policy based on "the irrevocable fixing of exchange rates leading to the introduction of a single currency, the ECU, and the definition and conduct of a single monetary policy and exchange rate policy the primary objective of both of which shall be to maintain price stability"——

The Chairman: Order. The whole point of interventions is that they are brief, succinct and certainly not repetitious.

Mr. Hain: I take your guidance, Mr. Morris, but——

The Chairman: Order. Mr. Mandelson.

Mr. Mandelson: Thank you, Mr. Morris. I am sure that this is an argument that my hon. Friend and I can pursue at greater length, possibly over a cup of tea, later.

The point that I would like to stress now is that in the macro-economic sphere, in macro-economic policy-making, Maastricht offers us clear gains for sane and enlightened conduct of policy. The extent to which we are successful in cobbling together sane and enlightened policies depends on the actions, decisions and judgments of politicians; everyone is fallible, we are only human. But what we are talking about is a framework and whether we have in place a framework that allows us to behave in a sane, rational and enlightened way. I believe that the treaty gives us that framework.

Mr. Denzil Davies: My hon. Friend talks about economic policy. Does he not agree that the problem with the Maastricht treaty, as with Germany, is that monetary policy is not in the hands of politicians, but economic policy is? That policy is codified in the Maastricht treaty, which will present the problem.

Mr. Mandelson: Whatever the advertised strengths and independence of the Bundesbank, I think that politicians in Germany would be surprised to hear that they have absolutely no influence in German monetary policies.

Mr. Radice: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. German politicians fixed the terms of the German monetary union, which has been so disastrous, not the Bundesbank, which had a sensible policy.

9 pm

Mr. Mandelson: I recognise that some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have fears about the monetary policy. Anxieties about the possible deflationary effect of the treaty have been expressed in the debate, as they have been before and will no doubt be on many occasions in future.

I understand those fears, which are real, but are hugely exaggerated to serve a political argument. They represent a highly partisan and coloured view of the treaty and the Maastricht process. Those fears exist, although we should separate them in our minds from the parody of objections contrived by those who are not just anti-Maastricht, but fundamentally anti-Europe and are refighting a battle over our entry in the European Community that was won 20 years ago.

Many such fears focus on convergence and the terms under which we move towards economic and monetary union. I do not wish to speak at great length on the convergence criteria as that issue was addressed in detail and with considerable eloquence by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) when he spoke from the Front Bench. However, I shall reinforce his views. I strongly believe that member states' readiness for EMU must be tested, not only by the narrow, financial criteria based on interest and inflation rates, and the fiscal deficit —which are constantly mentioned by the treaty's opponents—but on the readiness and convergence of the real economy.

Two important additional criteria must be considered and must lie at the heart of the convergence process and our approach to it. Those criteria relate to the performance of our economy, notably the levels of unemployment and investment. I strongly echo the repeated calls from Opposition Members for precisely those economic, industrial, training and skill-raising policies of investment in the infrastructure and human resources throughout our economy, which will improve the performance and strength of our economy. That will enable convergence to take place expeditiously and smoothly.

Fulfilling those crucial additional criteria relating to employment and investment is central to the Maastricht-plus programme advocated by Opposition Members. We must ensure the full implementation of the Delors 2 proposals for financing regional development and social cohesion—factors which are so important for the regions of our country, such as the northern district which contains my Hartlepool constituency. We must raise the level of investment and employment throughout the country if we are to secure convergence and succeed in meeting the criteria that will be applied as we move towards economic and monetary union. I hope that Conservative Members and, certainly, Opposition Members will share my view and support the crucial initiatives required to strengthen the competitiveness, performance and investment of the real economy in this country.

In addition to the views and fears expressed about the convergence criteria, two other types of fears and principal objections to the treaty are made, particularly by some of my right hon. and hon. Friends. The first is that EMU would mean a Europe dominated by unaccountable bankers and the second is that, under the treaty's provisions, member states would have to cut public expenditure.

First, I shall address the issue of the so-called bankers' Europe. It is said that the proposed central bank system would have the primary objective of maintaining price stability and counter-inflation policies which, in the view of those who advance that argument, would be deflationary. The system's independence would ensure that it followed policies that could not be influenced. The arguments are presented in a way that leads one to assume that the policies would be uninfluenced by any other economic goal or consideration. Therefore, the entire central banking system would be biased against growth and employment and in favour of tight and rigidly applied monetary policies whose sole aim was deflation. Finally, the relevant national central banks, rather than the European system of central banks, would have to mirror those provisions and be equally independent.

To the best of my ability, I have looked into the matter with care. I have read the treaty and all the comment on it. The argument that I have outlined is based on a selective and misleading reading of the treaty. The proponents of the argument speak about the primary objective of the European central bank system and some have said that that is its only objective. It is easy to slip from one word to the other, from primary to only, transforming the meaning and intent of the treaty.

Article 105 sets out the price stability objective. It also states that the European system of central banks

"shall support the general economic policies".

It does not mention only the narrow monetary aim of attaining price stability but refers to "the general economic policies in the Community . . . as laid down in Article 2."

I quoted that at the beginning of my speech.

Mr. Shore: The important words are the connecting ones to "the objective of price stability" and the other aims of the Community. Those important words are "without prejudice to the objective of price stability".

That is not to say that that is the only aim, but it clearly establishes that it is the major aim, the primary aim, of the European bank.

Mr. Mandelson: I quoted the article properly. It refers to "The primary objective".

I hope that my right hon. Friend will not argue, as was argued earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), that price instability is almost desirable. It has never been my party's approach to policy making to regard price instability as going hand in hand with fast growth and high employment. In my experience, precisely the opposite is the case. Price instability goes hand in hand with unemployment and subsequent deflation.

Mr. Shore: That experience is an inevitable consequence of my hon. Friend's age. The only period of price stability that I can remember was during the 1930s when there was mass unemployment. We have not had price stability under any post-war Government and, as we all know, all periods of price stability have been brought about by massive deflation.

Mr. Mandelson: Not for the first time, my right hon. Friend has outclassed or upstaged me in terms of his years. I cannot compete with him on that basis.

Mr. Radice: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Mandelson: Of course.

Mr. Radice: I remind my hon. Friend of the experience of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) when he was a Minister in the 1960s. At that time inflation was low, as was unemployment. There can be a relatively stable price system at the same time as relatively low unemployment. That is the experience of our respected right hon. Friend.

Mr. Mandelson: I readily——

The Chairman: Order. I hope that we shall not explore the 1960s. We are on amendment No. 40.

Mr. Mandelson: Speaking on behalf of the forward-looking and modernising——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): In advance of the 1960s, in the days of Selwyn Lloyd, we had precisely the same phenomenon of stable prices and a prosperous country.

Mr. Mandelson: Bring back Selwyn Lloyd, in whatever guise.

Dr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): What policies would my hon. Friend pursue to achieve price stability or zero inflation, and what would be the effect on employment and economic growth of those policies?

Mr. Mandelson: I think that that would——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member should not be tempted down that route.

Mr. Mandelson: I shall not be tempted to follow that course, Mr. Morris. I merely refer my hon. Friend to the latest policy documents that have been issued by the Labour party and the policies that will be revealed next week as we prepare our ground for our pre-Budget campaign. I am sure that enlightenment will follow.

Mr. Andrew Smith rose——

Mr. Mandelson: I give way to my hon. Friend on the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Smith: I return to the 1930s, as it were, and to the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). Is it not the case that in the 1930s prices were falling? A central bank operating under the injunction to sustain price stability would have had to adopt an expansionary monetary policy, which would have regenerated the economy, stopped prices falling and been good for employment.

Mr. Mandelson: With respect for you, Mr. Morris, I shall not pursue the matter any further. I merely say that the points that have been made in interventions are absolutely right and apposite.

I shall move on to make two final points——

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Mandelson: I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Corbyn: It is an apposite point——

Mr. Mandelson: I am sure that it is.

Mr. Corbyn: Will my hon. Friend tell us how he proposes to influence a European central bank that is composed of bankers who are appointed for eight years, who are answerable and accountable to nobody and whose policy objective has been set down? How does he propose to influence them when there is no mechanism to allow that to happen?

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend's intervention was genuinely apposite. It can be dealt with now and not over a cup of tea later.

First, decisions and jugments will be taken and made within the framework of a politically determined economic strategy within economic policy guidelines in a way that I have already described. I do not know whether my hon. Friend was present for the earlier part of my speech. These matters would be considered politically within the economic policy guidelines that are a feature of the treaty.

Secondly, such matters would be co-ordinated through the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers. Thirdly, important decisions, such as the control of the exchange rate, would remain with those Ministers, and would be politically controllable to a large extent, albeit in a different way. At the end of the day, decisions would be determined politically and would be in the hands of Ministers. The question is which Ministers, and that is a wider and separate issue which we have dealt with during the debate.

My next point concerns not the system of European central banks but our national central bank. I can imagine no circumstances, and certainly no reading of the treaty, that yields the conclusion or inference that our own national central bank, however independent, would go entirely unconstrained by some element of political control under any Government of any party, just as the German Bundesbank does not go entirely unconstrained by political influence exercised by duly and properly elected Ministers.

9.15 pm

Mr. Marlow: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He is being very patient and decent. I draw his attention to article 107 which says:

> "When exercising the powers and carrying out the tasks and duties conferred upon them by this Treaty . . . neither the ECB, nor a national central bank, nor any member of their decision-making bodies shall seek or take instructions from Community institutions or bodies, from any government of a Member State or from any other body."

So how accountable are they?

Mr. Mandelson: The truth is that they are somewhat accountable and should be more accountable. It is precisely the aim of the Opposition's policies and proposed amendments to the Bill to increase and enhance that political accountability and to strengthen that political framework within which decisions and the operation of the national central bank, as well as the system, take place.

Just as the German Bundesbank has, by law, to take account of the views of duly elected Ministers and politicians, so would our own independent national central bank, and so, too, would the European system of central banks as a whole.

Mr. Budgen: I hope that the hon. Gentleman realises that if that part of the treaty to which my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) referred was amended by the House and the matter was taken back to the German people, they, in their legitimate pride in the independence of the Bundesbank, would without doubt reject the treaty. It is no good pretending and fuzzing this over. Is it not the case that the Bundesbank has an obligation to take account of political views, but it is an independent bank? If the hon. Gentleman and the Labour party seek to alter that independence in the European central bank that will be the end of the treaty.

Mr. Mandelson: I do not accept the premise of what the hon. Gentleman says. It is a myth that the Bundesbank is totally independent and entirely uninfluenced by Ministers and by political considerations. I understand why the hon. Gentleman wishes to create that view. He wishes to present the treaty and the Maastricht process as some sort of appalling monster that will devour Economic and Employment Ministers and lay bare the continent of Europe so that the outcome of the implementation of the treaty and the Maastricht process is the exact reverse of what we want to achieve, and what I firmly believe we will achieve if we move towards economic and monetary union and the full and proper implementation of the treaty.

Mr. Macdonald: I do not expect my hon. Friend necessarily to agree with my view here, but sometimes the whole question of independence of the central bank is rather exaggerated and overrated. My hon. Friend has already given the example of the German Bundesbank and the way in which it undoubtedly takes some guidance from the German Government. The independence of the American Federal Reserve did not impede the pursuit of a new deal programme in the 1930s by the Democratic party. The Swedish central bank has been independent since, I think, the 16th or the 17th century and that has not impeded the pursuit of socialism in that country. Therefore, the question of independence is sometimes rather exaggerated.

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. There is nothing automatic in the creation of a set of institutions which means, as sure as day follows night, that the policy prescriptions will be negative, deflationary or whatever. The fact is that institutions do not automatically or inevitably lead to any development; the political decisions that are made within the economic and monetary framework that is clearly established in the treaty will determine how those institutions perform, and whether they help or hinder the process of employment creation and growth that Opposition Members want.

The first principal objection to the treaty related to the establishment of a "bankers' Europe"—not an attractive term, but one with which we have effectively dealt. [Interruption.] It may not have been dealt with to the satisfaction of all my right hon. and hon. Friends, but it has certainly been dealt with to the satisfaction of my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), whom I regard as a bit of a pushover. The second principal objection relates to the argument that the implementation of the treaty would result in a cut in public spending.

That, too, does not strike me as an automatic or inevitable consequence of the treaty. It is our job to ensure that it is not. The argument is based on article 104c, which establishes restrictions on Government borrowing under economic and monetary union and sets a target for the deficit: it should not exceed 3 per cent. of gross domestic product. Overall Government debt should not exceed 60 per cent. of GDP.

It is clear, however, from any reasonable reading of the treaty, and from any reasonable interpretation of the way in which politicians—separately, jointly and severally—might seek to implement its provisions, that the rules are very flexible. The main requirement in relation to the deficit is for progress to be made towards the target.

Mr. Rowlands: IMF!

Mr. Mandelson: I must say that I would rather have the economic policy guidelines of the European Community and the framework of joint policy making prescribed by the Maastricht treaty than the IMF on my back again.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Denzil Davies rose——

Mr. Mandelson: I give way.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must pay attention, and make it clear to whom he is giving way. He sat down without making it clear whom he wished to take the Floor.

The hon. Gentleman has been speaking for nearly an hour. I must ask him to concentrate—but I now understand that he wishes to give way to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Mr. Winnick: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It should be said, in all fairness, that he has been subjected to many interventions.

The treaty prescribes a 3 per cent. limit, along with the penalties that would be incurred by Governments who exceeded that limit. The employment position is spelt out in very general terms, but the same does not apply to the 3 per cent. limit. In recent months, a socialist Government in Spain decided to cut public spending substantially, using the 3 per cent. limit although the treaty is not yet in force. They say that they want to implement economic convergence as quickly as possible. If a socialist Government are willing to do that, what would a Government such as ours do if the treaty were in force?

Mr. Mandelson: It is an illustration of what the politicians and Ministers in the Spanish Government chose to do. The operative word is "may"—they chose to do it for whatever reason that was relevant either to the circumstances of their domestic economy or to any other consideration. If they pray in aid the treaty's terms, provisions and convergence criteria to justify their actions, that is up to them. The crucial point is that those are political decisions—judgments formed by Ministers.

Such decisions should not be taken under the treaty in isolation from any other consideration of the economic policy, guidelines, and framework prescribed by the treaty, and it is up to national Governments to make it clear that they see the 3 per cent. deficit target as something at which they will aim and make progress towards, but which will not be rigidly applied—as is their right. It would only be operable over the time of an economic cycle.

Mr. Denzil Davies rose——

Mr. Mandelson: I am sorry, but it is 25 minutes past nine—and although you, Mr. Morris, were not fair when you said that I had been speaking for one hour——

The Chairman: Order. I said that the hon. Gentleman had been speaking for nearly one hour.

Mr. Mandelson: Nearly right, Mr. Morris. Before I use up any more of your patience, I will conclude—if you do not mind.—[Laughter.] I said "if you do not mind" because I have received some encouragement to speak considerably longer, with what ulterior motive I do not know and can only guess at.

I will make three points in conclusion. First, our overriding aim is to make the treaty and the whole Maastricht process into what most of its authors wanted —an engine for sustainable growth, not an instrument of deflation in this country or any other member state. Taking the requirement of economic policy co-ordination, a medium length of time, and the properly defined nature of the convergence criteria described gives us the scope to pursue policies that will achieve that objective in practice.

Secondly, the treaty is not a set of commands. It is not immutable. Its terms are not set in tablets of stone. The treaty specifically provides for the further development of its provisions—for example, the replacement of the protocol of convergence by appropriate measures to govern the operation of convergence in practice. The treaty is capable of change, of evolving, and of being turned into an instrument of our need and desire to serve our national purposes and those of the Community.

Above all—and I make no apology for concluding on this point—it is the political nature of national Governments and the political balance of forces within Europe that will determine the success or otherwise of the Maastricht project. It is not the dots, commas, and every letter of the treaty's articles and titles that will determine whether the project is a success. That will depend on politicians taking political decisions, having formed political judgments.

Maastricht is an instrument to be used, honed, developed and bent to the economic needs of the Community. On that basis, I regard it not only as a wholly necessary and desirable further stage in the evolution of the Community of which I want this country to be at the heart but an absolutely necessary and important condition for the economic progress within this country that I and members of my party want to achieve.

Mr. Whitney: I am happy to join the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) in welcoming the Maastricht agreement and to endorse the emphasis that he placed throughout on the need to fight unemployment. But that objective—which all Conservative Members share—is in direct conflict with the support of the hon. Gentleman and his party for the provisions of the social chapter: whatever the extent of its impact, that chapter will undoubtedly have a negative impact on employment.

I agree that the Committee should reject the amendments in the group, which are of a broad and sweeping nature and which, in effect, amount to a rejection of the Bill. I find that surprising, given that not so long ago, on Second Reading, the House voted by a majority of 244 for the principle of the Bill. Moreover, all three major parties fought the general election on a campaign programme that endorsed the Maastricht treaty.

Both today and in our debates before Christmas we have heard hon. Members—and some right hon. Members—on both sides of the House attempt not only to stop the clock but actually to move it back. Some hon. Members have a long tradition of being wrong about Britain's role in Europe. I am more concerned about the position of hon. Members who, over the years, have voted to support Britain's adherence to the treaty of Rome, the Single European Act, qualified majority voting and the rest—which we have already discussed at length this evening and on which I shall not therefore dwell—but who are now finding excuses to move away from the position that they endorsed.

9.30 pm

Mr. Bill Walker: I do not rise to defend myself, because I am not one whose position has changed. I should have thought, however, that the essential ingredient of parliamentary democracy is that when hon. Members think that something is wrong, they should admit to it and say, "Perhaps I made a mistake." If we do not do that, what is the point of our debates?

Mr. Whitney: I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker). But most of us find those hon. Members' position odd because at the time when they voted to support Britain's involvement, the arguments for our playing a positive role in Europe were somewhat weaker than they are now. As the years go by and as views in Europe develop, the argument for Britain's playing the part in Europe that the Government advocate for it grows stronger.

Of course we understand concerns about "federalism", which I would call centralisation—there is a translation problem because the word "federal" means different things to different nationalities. But there is and always will be an unashamed battle between those who envisage a centralist western Europe and those of us who do not. We should remember the lessons of the past 12 months—the success of Maastricht and the achievement of turning it away from the direction in which the original Dutch draft was headed and into the agreement that finally emerged. Public opinion has been demonstrated not only in the Danish referendum and the French vote but in Germany and in many other parts of Europe and there is clearly a strong feeling that people do not wish their national identities to be submerged. That should encourage my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North and any other doubter who believes that the Maastricht process is a remorseless juggernaut moving in one direction alone.

Some of my hon. Friends give the impression that they are living in a cloud of their own making. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) spoke of the abolition of the nation state. I wonder where he has been for the past 10 or 12 months. Let him go to France and tell any Frenchman that he voted for Maastricht, albeit narrowly. We understand that the French referendum involved many other issues and was certainly not on the Maastricht treaty. If my hon. Friends suggested to any Frenchman that he was moving towards the evolution of the nation state, my hon. Friends know the sort of answer that they would get. The achievements must not be underrated.

The concept of subsidiarity was an easy concept to mock. Subsidiarity is a difficult word. No one could find a satisfactory substitute for it. Gradually, as a result of the steps that were taken and the efforts led by my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench, the concept of subsidiarity has been accepted as part of the European scene, and increasingly will be so. We should take account of that and take pleasure in it. No one can deny that there will be difficulties in converging the existing 12 member states and in enlarging the Community in the future, but the objective is worth while and important.

It is important that the House considers carefully this Bill, which, although it is short, is undoubtedly crucial. The procedural difficulties in the Bill are not great, and the impact of unnecessary delays in the passage of the Bill is sometimes overlooked by some hon. Members.

Mr. Spearing: I agree that the Bill is short. Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the analogy that it is nothing but a pipeline which connects us legally to the obligations in the treaty? Does that not mean that we need to examine carefully the complex legal obligations, especially those contained in the titles which we are now debating? Ideally, we should re-examine the treaty line by line and find out what it is about. Without such an examination, we do not know what the treaty is about.

Mr. Whitney: We all know that too much logic leads to serious trouble. If the hon. Gentleman pursued his argument to the logical conclusion, we would not stop at the 130 pages in the Maastricht treaty. Almost every paragraph in the treaty takes us back to the treaty of Rome, so this treaty must be limited. We want to amend the appropriate parts of the British law. Although that fundamental is important, no one argues with it. The fundamentals are finite and manageable in parliamentary terms within a reasonable number of hours. They do not extend the time unnecessarily. We have been extremely generous in the progress that we have already made.

It is important for those hon. and right hon. Members on both sides who are inclined to delay such events to take into account the national interests of Britain. In a letter to The Times on 2 November 1992, the president of the Confederation of British Industry and 27 top leaders of British industry asked for an early passage of the Bill. In the letter they pointed out:

> "Continuing uncertainty over the Maastricht treaty and our future in Europe is already having a damaging effect. Without a clear message soon from Parliament, political uncertainty will translate into more lost output and unemployment."

I beseech my hon. Friends to take account of that message. Sir Michael Angus and his friends speak from the business and commercial point of view. While I dwell on the letter, I point out that Sir Michael Angus and his friends also emphasise:

> "The single market is more than a free trade area: it requires regulation and enforcement to ensure that barriers to competition are removed. The ratification of Maastricht will assist the development of that regulatory framework and will help to ensure that the single market continues to move forward."

Since then we have passed the date at which the single market is, at least theoretically, in operation. Yet we have still to make significant progress in the ratification of the treaty.

That plea from the leaders of British industry about the economy and tackling unemployment should not go unheard by any of us in the House. Some of the comments that we have heard today and in earlier debates from those who are doubtful about and hostile to Maastricht betray a lack of confidence in our country. I know that they wish to stand up for British interests, but they display a lack of faith in our ability to do so.

For example, I reject the idea that for years to come we shall never put the economy of Britain into a state in which we can look in the eye the economies of continental Europe and, therefore, in due course rejoin the ERM and adopt a single currency. But that is for the future. Certainly, today we must ensure that we do not retreat and say that we cannot compete with our partners in the European Community. We most definitely can.

It is an odd arrangement that some of my hon. Friends say, "This is going too far; all that we would like is a free trade area", when our erstwhile partners in the European Free Trade Association are passing us coming the other way. Just as we seem to want to move into the outer corridors of the European Community, we meet the Swedes and all the rest coming in. They have understood the benefits of the European Community as it now is. It would be odd if we moved in the opposite direction.

The concept that the European Community has only ever involved trade and economic affairs is false. The treaty of Rome, for accession to which virtually all my hon. Friends who now object to Maastricht voted, referred to an ever closer union. That was the original concept of the treaty of Rome in 1958.

I refer the Committee to a far-sighted statement made by a Head of Government some eight or nine years ago which said:

"It must be our objective to aim beyond the Common Commercial Policy through Political Cooperation towards a common approach to external affairs . . . This means giving greater depth to the Community both in its internal and external activities."

The message concluded that we should

"take the necessary steps to strengthen the voice of the Community and make its influence felt in the world; heighten the consciousness among our citizens of what united us".

The current word is vision. That was a statement of vision. That statement was made on 25 June 1984 by Baroness Thatcher. She was right then. Those aims should certainly remain our objective. I hope that from time to time Lady Thatcher will take down from her archives that memorandum and remind herself of the foresight and vision that she demonstrated to the other Heads of Government eight and a half years ago.

In the interests of furthering the debate, I do not wish to prolong my speech. I merely wish to say that the single market that we have put into operation has underlined even more the need to make progress on ratification of the Maastricht treaty. It underlines the dangers that unnecessary delay would cause to Britain's national interests.

Finally, we must concentrate on Britain's national interests and not on those of Denmark—they are the responsibility of the Danish legislators and their people. We have our own interests and we should have our own timetable, which should be a steady, but relatively rapid, approval of this excellent treaty.

9.45 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies: Because of the nature of the amendments, the debate has ranged over practically all of title II. Someone like myself, who has been in the House for 20 years and has sat through many such debates, may be surprised at the transformation in the attitude of so many hon. Members on both sides of the House to the European Economic Community, or the Common Market as it used to be called when I came to the House.

I remember 1972, when a demoralised Conservative party, frightened of the unions at Upper Clyde and having ditched Selsdon Man in the first two years of the Administration, was persuaded by the then Prime Minister and a few of the zealots around him that the treaty of Rome was only about trade and economics. They believed him for some time.

We moved on to the Single European Act—as it is rather oddly called—and again a Conservative Prime Minister was able to convince himself, perhaps, and the rest of the Conservative party that the Single European Act was only about free trade. Somewhere between that Act and the Maastricht treaty, a large section of the Conservative party has realised that it is all about union. The treaty may be about economics and about trade, but it is far more than that—it is about union.

I remember saying that the Celts recognise unions—they can sniff them out and they know them when they see them. The English do not know much about unions, but a large section of the Conservative party has now realised that the Maastricht treaty is about union, as was the Single European Act and the original treaty of Rome.

The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), who is not in the Chamber, tried to justify—as other Conservative Members who were in the House in 1972 have—his support for the treaty of Rome and for the Single European Act and his opposition to the Maastricht treaty. I understand his attempts at justification.

The treaty is a substantial step on the road to union, but it is not basically very different from what went on before. Perhaps I shall be in the House for the single European final act—the final solution. There will be another Act—there has to be, because the structure that is being set up is neither fish nor fowl.

We have spent a long time arguing whether the treaty is federal. What is it? No one quite knows, except that we know that it will mean the transfer of a substantial amount of democracy. We do not have to use the old-fashioned word sovereignty if we do not want to. The treaty will transfer a substantial amount of democracy from the Parliaments and elected Governments of all 12 countries to non-democratic institutions. That is a fact and it may or may not be a good thing for some people. There will be a significant transfer of power to the European central bank and to the Commission to the detriment of democratic accountability.

Matters have been mapped out in a brilliant fashion. Those who are behind the policy know that pressure is bound to increase to relieve the democratic deficit, as it is called. They will attempt to do that by increasing the powers of the European Parliament and by setting up some kind of executive. All that will reduce still further the powers of national Parliaments. That will lie behind the final Act and I may still be in the House when it is introduced. If we still have a Conservative Government then, no doubt the Prime Minister will make speeches at Tory party conferences to assure people that, although our sovereignty may go, our national identity will be retained. I remember the little old lady from the Scilly Isles who asked the present Prime Minister not to lose our national identity in a federal Europe; he was happy to reassure her about that.

The Scots will still be able to wear funny skirts and Welsh ladies will still be able to wear their top hats. All the trappings of national identity will remain, but the object of the exercise will be the transfer of sovereignty.

We have seen a transformation in attitudes in the Conservative party and we have seen a similar transformation within the Labour party, as was evident from excellent speeches tonight. That transformation has come about because of the demoralisation of our party. Apparently, somehow, salvation now lies in economic and monetary union.

The amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) relate to article 2, which has come as manna from heaven for some of our pro-marketeers. We have all seen the briefings —they were not very good—that have been distributed about it. Article 2 is the one on to which the pro-marketeers have decided to latch and to speak. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) made a fair fist of it, as did a number of my other hon. Friends. In fact, considering how bad the case is for that article, my hon. Friends did remarkably well.

Perhaps my hon. Friends should take a close look at the language of that article because they will discover that it does not help them very much. They may think that it does, but let us consider the three phrases that deal with economic matters. First, we are told that everyone agrees with a great degree of convergence, but convergence is defined only later in the treaty. There is no convergence on unemployment—[Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I ask hon. Members to recognise that the Committee has grown somewhat in size. They should have the courtesy to listen to the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

Mr. Davies: I am grateful for that protection and assistance, Mr. Morris.

The only convergence with which the treaty deals is the convergence of inflation and budget deficits. I do not believe that there can be any other "meaningful" convergence, because if the intention is to arrive, finally, at a single currency—basically that is what economic and monetary union is about—those are the only convergence indicators that we can have.

My hon. Friends who are in favour of article 2 are attempting to write another treaty. They have attempted to convince themselves that if the Labour party had negotiated this treaty, it would have included different convergence indicators. However, we would never have come to a common or single currency with any other convergence indicators, because that would have made no sense. We would never have reached the goal that some of my hon. Friends and many in the Conservative party now, apparently, wish to achieve.

Only two basic convergence indicators are relevant to a single currency—practically abolishing inflation in all member states, and locking the currencies together, thus reducing the budget deficits so that we can move towards a single currency. On the question of a high degree of convergence, we on this side of the argument are whistling in the wind. Some of my hon. Friends believe that, somehow, we can slide out of the convergence indicators.

Much has been made of the term "price stability". Indeed, one or two of my hon. Friends said, "Surely you are not in favour of price instability." Of course we are not in favour of price instability. The whole section of this treaty dealing with economic and monetary union is lifted from the treaty of the German Bundesbank. The words are exactly the same. The term "price stability" is to be found there, and there is nothing wrong in that. Price stability is what we are going to have here. But it will take effort and pain to achieve the goal of economic and monetary union. Price stability is essential and it means no inflation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. The right hon. Gentleman who is addressing the Committee has been a distinguished Labour party spokesman on Treasury matters and hon. Members are entitled to hear him. He is making a very valuable contribution to the debate and I hope that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Committee will behave in a more seemly manner.

The Chairman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Davies: Price stability is obviously essential to the treaty. I submit that the words "high degree of convergence" do not assist my hon. Friends who have mounted this exercise of pretending that, somehow, the Maastricht treaty is something that the Labour party can support.

The next part of article 2 refers to "non-inflationary growth". We are all in favour of non-inflationary growth. It is marvellous. I am sure that this is not the right time for a philosophical discussion of inflation and growth, but I see that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is present. People in the Treasury read and talk about these things all the time. It is very doubtful whether Essex man or woman or western society is really prepared to accept non-inflationary growth. Indeed, is it possible to have non-inflationary growth in consumer-based, service-based economies such as we have today?

I am glad to see that the Prime Minister has arrived. He does not believe in non-inflationary growth. He did at one time, but he became frightened. He realised that, as inflation came down, growth stopped and unemployment increased. The southern England constituency—not northern England or middle England or south Wales or Scotland, but the whole great service industry, consumer constituency of the south of England—suddenly realised that it wanted inflation. Essex man and Essex woman cannot live without inflation. They need to see house prices going up. The service industries for which they work cannot increase productivity, so if is they are to have more money they must have inflation. So the Prime Minister does not believe in non-inflationary growth. But apparently the Labour party does. Apparently, many of my hon. Friends now believe in non-inflationary growth. The choice in the treaty is not between inflationary and non-inflationary growth but between low inflation and no growth. That is what is really behind the words of the treaty. If we cannot have growth without inflation, we shall have no growth. Some people believe that, provided that inflation can be reduced to zero, jobs will magically be created.

Mr. Dorrell indicated assent.

Mr. Davies: The Financial Secretary nods again. The Treasury has obviously been holding seminars and has been converted. The Prime Minister does not agree with any of it, but the present Financial Secretary apparently does. We cannot have non-inflationary growth in today's western capitalist economies. In the 1930s, it was possible to have some growth and deflation.

Mr. Dorrell indicated assent.

Mr. Davies: The Financial Secretary nods again. The lessons have been going well. Perhaps the same people have been briefing us.

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Iraq (Military Action)

10 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, I should like to make a statement on allied military action against Iraq.

At 18.15 hours GMT tonight, four RAF Tornado GR1 aircraft and two Victor tankers took part in a coalition operation, involving some 114 United States, British and French aircraft, against Iraqi military targets in southern Iraq. The action was taken to ensure the safety of coalition aircraft patrolling the no-fly zone below the 32nd parallel in support of United Nations Security Council resolution 688. Early indications are that serious damage was inflicted and assessment of the results is continuing. No losses were sustained by coalition forces.

This coalition action was taken in self defence under international law and is both a necessary and proportionate response to the serious threat posed to the safety of coalition aircraft. The coalition action took the form of air strikes against air defence facilities and command and control facilities. Attacks were also carried out to suppress air defence installations which threatened the security of coalition aircraft participating in the operation. United Kingdom forces participated in attacks against command and control facilities at Al Amarah, with RAF Tornado GR1 aircraft, using 1,000 lb laser-guided bombs against targets designated by the thermal imaging airborne laser designator, known as TIALD, carried by two of the four aircraft.

The action is to be seen against the background of recent Iraqi violations of the no-fly zone and their deployment of SAM 2 and SAM 3 missiles in a threatening posture below the 32nd parallel, south of the airfield used by Iraqi aircraft which were violating the no-fly zone. These posed a new and unacceptable threat to the security of coalition aircraft. A strongly worded demarche was issued to Iraq in New York on 6 January by the United States, United Kingdom, France and Russia, which demanded that the SAM systems recently established south of the 32nd parallel be returned to their previous locations and configurations and that violations of the no-fly zone should cease. The demarche went on to say that, should Iraq fail to comply, the coalition would respond appropriately and decisively, without further warning.

The demarche elaborated on an earlier one on 26 August 1992 which announced the creation of the no-fly zone south of the 32nd parallel. The no-fly zone was necessitated by a situation of severe humanitarian need in southern Iraq arising from Iraq's failure to comply with the terms of United Nations Security Council resolution 688, which calls on Iraq to refrain from further repressing its civilian population. Iraq largely respected the no-fly zone until late December 1992, when Iraqi military aircraft began deliberate and systematic violations. This resulted in an Iraqi fighter aircraft being shot down on 27 December by coalition aircraft.

Following the demarche there were no indications that Saddam Hussein was backing down. There were no fresh violations of the no-fly zone and the missiles were dispersing. However, despite the clear warning issued on 6 January, Iraq moved SAM 3 missiles, which were the subject of the demarche, to new locations south of the 32nd parallel where they posed a significant threat to coalition aircraft. Other missile systems in the south were placed on an operational footing, also threatening the safety of coalition aircraft. The coalition action was in direct response to this threat.

The Baghdad regime can now be in no doubt about our determination to maintain the no-fly zone south of the 32nd parallel, in support of United Nations Security Council resolution 688. Should the need arise, the Government will consider the need for further action in consultation with coalition partners.

The House will also be aware of the deep concern expressed by the United Nations Security Council, following Iraqi incursions into the demilitarised zone on the border with Kuwait and Iraq's violation of land and premises operated and occupied by the United Nations Iraq/Kuwait Observer Mission. The Security Council has also expressed alarm at Iraq's refusal to allow UNIKOM and United Nations special commission flights into Iraq using UN aircraft. The Government will continue to participate fully in consideration of these matters within the Security Council and report developments to the House.

I am sure that the House will wish to join me in expressing admiration for the bravery and professionalism of the personnel of all the coalition forces who participated in this operation and in particular to the men and women of Her Majesty's armed forces serving in the Gulf. They have once again demonstrated the high degree of dedication and the ability that we have learned to expect from them and have contributed immeasurably to the success of this operation.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): May I say how relieved Opposition Members are that all the allied personnel have returned safely. We salute their skill and their bravery. It is worth reminding ourselves in the comfort of the House tonight that the mission was not without danger, as we know from other theatres of operation in the world only this afternoon.

The Opposition have supported the objective of this operation which was to ensure that allied aircraft could patrol the no-fly zone in Iraq, thereby ensuring that the Kurds and, in the south, the Shi'ite Muslims were not subjected to the genocide that they might otherwise have been. That is why the no-fly zones were established, and that is why they had to be enforced.

As allied aircraft could not fly in those zones without threat because of the missiles, it was clearly correct that the missiles should be removed. Saddam Hussein was warned, he was requested, and he refused to move them. The only course of action was to take out the missiles.

We are all aware that increasingly in the past few weeks Saddam Hussein has tried to challenge the resolutions of the United Nations. That cannot be tolerated. We cannot have the will of the United Nations challenged with impunity. Let us just hope now that Saddam Hussein fully understands the resolve of the world to ensure that the resolutions of the United Nations to protect the minorities in the world are upheld. I hope that he has heard what the rest of the world has said.

We are also reassured that the action in the operation was against military targets in the no-fly zone. We are relieved that there have been no civilian targets and, we hope, no civilian casualties. I think that I speak for the House when I express the hope that the casualties on the Iraqi side are absolutely minimal, whether civilian or not.

May I just ask the Secretary of State for an assurance that there will be intense diplomatic efforts to explain, with the coalition Gulf allies, the reason for this mission, because it is imperative, if we are to make progress—and we must make peaceful progress—that we have as broad a consensus as possible. That is vital if this operation is not to be wasted.

We fully appreciate that the Secretary of State is not in a position now to tell us how effective the operation has been. We hope that he will be able to do so tomorrow, and will then give the assurance that the House will be kept fully informed and he will come to the House if he has further information.

I shall end where I began and say that if we are to have a secure world order it must be based on the United Nations. If United Nations resolutions are passed, they must be adhered to and accepted by all sides. That was the reason for today's operation and why we are so pleased that it was so successful.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. It will make a powerful impact if the House speaks with a single voice on the matter.

It was right for the hon. Gentleman to remind the House that the personnel of the RAF who participated in the operation did so at significant personal risk and it is a matter of considerable relief that they all returned safely. It was also right for the hon. Gentleman to emphasise the importance of maintaining the closest contact, co-operation and dialogue with our allies in the Gulf. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we recognise the great importance of ensuring that not only those who participated in the operation, but all who have an interest in peace and stability in the Gulf are able to speak in a single and united manner.

The hon. Gentleman commented on the likely effects of the operation. The early signs are encouraging, but it will be some time before we can describe with certainty the detailed consequences. Of course, we shall keep the House informed when we receive such information.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for coming to the House so speedily to give us the reassurances that we have heard. We warmly support his praise for the coalition forces, especially those that formed part of the Royal Air Force. Many of us felt that more than a diplomatic slap on the wrist of Saddam Hussein was much needed. We warmly support our Government in their resolution to support what we believe to be the will of the United Nations and the coalition alliance that successfully won the war. If we are to secure peace, it is vital that we make it clear to Saddam Hussein that there can be no more such incursions.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct. It is becoming increasingly clear that Saddam Hussein does not respond simply to diplomatic representations and it is, regrettably, often necessary for the international community to back up its representations with the use of force in appropriate circumstances. We now face such circumstances, which was why the present action was necessary.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Does the Minister accept that the success of the action will be determined not only by the effectiveness of the weapons used, and the professionalism and bravery of our forces, but by the extent to which it dissuades Saddam Hussein from further acts of provocation in breach of the United Nations resolutions? If further military action is required—it cannot be ruled out—the Government will continue to enjoy our support and, I believe, that of the British public as long as such action is in accordance with international law, taken in consultation with our coalition partners and uses no more force than necessary.

[Mr. Menzies Campbell]

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman and I can assure him that the criteria against which we judge possible action are those to which he referred.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Having heard the comments from the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Clark) and the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), will my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence feel fortified by the knowledge that the actions taken have the overwhelming support of the House and the country, both of which would wish to join him in paying tribute to the service personnel involved?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall the effectiveness of the cruise missiles during the previous Gulf conflict? Were cruise missiles used today? If it should, unfortunately, be necessary to take further action, will cruise missiles, which can be used with relative lack of danger to service personnel, be available in the area?

Mr. Rifkind: I should like to confine myself to speaking about the contribution of the Royal Air Force. Obviously it is for the United States Government to give details of the operations for which they were responsible. I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments and assure him that the weapons that may be used in any operation will be those that are thought most suitable to achieve the desired result.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): Most hon. Members believe that Saddam had it coming. In the words of an anonymous Pentagon official, it was a spanking rather than a beating. What part did we play in determining that it was a spanking rather than a beating? Is it right that the overwhelming force was supplied by the United States? Is it not politically important for the balance of numbers to be different from what it was? We provided six aircraft out of more than 100 and the French probably supplied a similar number. Would it not be more correct to have a better balance in any future world order?

Mr. Rifkind: In the action we attached great importance to the fact that the choice of targets and the severity of our response should be proportionate to the gravity of the offence by the Iraqi Government. As I said earlier, the targets for which the Royal Air Force was responsible were the Al Amarah base and the command and control functions there.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the integrity of Kuwait is just as valid a reason for international intervention now as it was two years ago? In the meantime, of course, Saddam Hussein has continued to commit atrocities against his own people. Will my right hon. and learned Friend affirm the Government's commitment in conjunction with all right-minded nations to work to bring peace to that unfortunate region?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. It is a matter of great concern that only today Iraqi spokesmen continued to claim that Kuwait was part of Iraq and, clearly, continued to refuse to recognise Kuwait's sovereignty and independence. It is crucial for the international community to speak with a single voice and to ensure that Saddam Hussein's regime is completely isolated in its continuing aggression and provocation.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): From this Bench on a day when we have mourned the killing of a British service man in Bosnia, may I say that we are delighted at the news that there have been no fatalities among the allied Gulf forces. However, there is some concern that the statement referred to the protection of our aircraft. Resolution 688 was clearly designed by the United Nations Security Council to protect the Shi'ites in the south and the Kurds in the north. Has any thought been given to how we can give them better protection? They are suffering, and to some of us it seems that minds are conditioned to reaction rather than proaction in dealing with these issues.

Mr. Rifkind: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the original reason for the no-fly zone was to reduce and, we hoped, to eliminate the use of aircraft as a means of oppressing the Shia population in southern Iraq, and there is significant evidence that it has had a positive and beneficial effect. Of course, we continue to look to further ways of ensuring that all oppression of the population in southern Iraq can be totally ended.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Further to what the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) has said, should not the Minister be emphasising that this strike was to defend defenceless people whom Saddam Hussein has marked down for genocide? Does he not think that we now need to concentrate on the battle for the minds of the people of Iraq and that they need to get the truth about what this matter is really about?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is correct. We are aware that, because of the Iraqi regime's oppression of its own people, there are limited opportunities for those people to express their true feelings. The hon. Gentleman is right to emphasise that their views are as important as the views of other countries in the region in emphasising the hostility and repugnance that we all feel about the behaviour of the Iraqi Government.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement describing this action as a coalition response confirms that it had no authority whatever from the United Nations Security Council, and nor has the Secretary-General endorsed it? Given the Palestinians who were thrown into the desert and Matrix Churchill, it underlines the double standards that have been followed by the Government.

Is the Secretary of State aware also that this will be seen worldwide as the last example of gunboat diplomacy by a lame duck President, and that it will almost certainly strengthen Saddam Hussein? Is he further aware that it is bound to stimulate Arab hostility to the west, with the growth of fundamentalism? Two years ago we probably killed 300,000 Iraqis. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may have noticed on the news tonight that a UNICEF spokesman said that typhoid and cholera were still rampant in Iraq because of the bombing of the water supply. In those circumstances, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman realise that, whatever may be said in the House, world opinion will not take the view that he asks us to accept?

Mr. Rifkind: It is more likely that the right hon. Gentleman's remarks will be seen as those of a lame duck Member of Parliament who does not speak for anyone in the House. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would have preferred the Iraqi regime to be able to use its aircraft and its missile installations to shoot down coalition aircraft and to make the no-fly zone inoperative, and thereby to ensure that the Iraqi regime continued its oppression against the people of southern Iraq. Is that the objective that he would have liked to seek? If so, he speaks for no one but himself.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that, without the slightest shadow of doubt, the first item of news on the Iraqi broadcast tomorrow will be the remarks of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)? The Iraqis will take comfort from them.

I return briefly to the point about acting against acts of provocation by the Saddam Hussein regime. We all know in the House that he will come again looking for more repression of the Kurds and the Shi'ites. Perhaps this is not the occasion, but will my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that if that repression comes in greater strength against the Kurds in the north and the Shi'ites in the south, more—and more positive—action will be taken?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, it is clear that Saddam Hussein will use any opportunity to probe for a lack of will among the international community. I believe that today's action will have demonstrated to him that, far from lack of resolve, the international community is determined to ensure that the no-fly zone will continue to operate and that the people of southern Iraq will be protected as a consequence.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): The Secretary of State and, I think, most of the House would agree that Saddam Hussein has repeatedly and deliberately flouted the authority of the United Nations and the purposes of the various United Nations resolutions that were passed to protect the important minorities in the north and the south of Iraq. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman satisfied that by confining action to the no-fly zones he is able significantly to lift the threat from the peoples oppressed in southern and northern Iraq?

Mr. Rifkind: It is important that we comply with international law and that any action that we take is proportionate to the nature of the offence that has been committed. We made a demarche to the Iraqis, which referred specifically to their introduction of missile installations in the no-fly zone and the use of combat aircraft in that zone. It was therefore entirely correct and appropriate in our judgment that the response that was taken today should be limited to those particular matters.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware that an earlier United Kingdom Government, in 1948, committed unarmed Royal Air Force aircraft, at great cost to the aircrews involved. I am pleased to say that that is not the policy of this Government. Is my right hon. and learned Friend able to assure me that in future operations, as tonight, the concern will be to ensure that professional and brave crews are capable of returning home after the operations? That surely is the essence of it—to make sure that our people return having completed the exercise properly.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, my hon. Friend is correct to draw attention to those matters. I mentioned in my original statement that some 114 aircraft took part in the operation. There was such a large number because many aircraft were involved in ensuring proper protection for the aircraft that were involved in the actual attack on the ground installations. It was by such preparation and presentation that we were able to ensure the safe return of all the crews of all the countries concerned.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Does not the immediate support for this action by the President of Egypt and other Arab leaders demonstrate that there is a wide range of support in the world for the determination that United Nations Security Council resolutions should be upheld? Is it not a fact that that action has been brought upon Iraq by Saddam Hussein's recklessness two years after the end of the war in continuing to defy United Nations resolutions?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman assure the House that not only will sanctions be maintained in all their severity until Saddam Hussein demonstrates that he is ready to obey international law and the United Nations Security Council resolutions, but that the coalition will not hesitate to take further military action to demonstrate that, and that until Saddam Hussein conforms to international law he will be treated as the outlaw that he is?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, it is important that Arab Governments as well as western Governments are expressing their support for the action that has been taken. The action taken by the coalition today was not simply taken on behalf of the countries which directly participated, but on behalf of the international community. That is why there has been the warm response to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. I also endorse the right hon. Gentleman's later comments.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Is it not a cause for deep gratitude that, in the Royal Air Force, Britain has a reliable, courageous and efficient instrument for the imposition of international justice and order? Can my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that if Saddam Hussein is foolish enough again to permit incursions by his personnel into the demilitarised zone in Kuwait or to inhibit the flight of United Nations inspectors into his territories, Her Majesty's Government and coalition partners will, without any shadow of doubt, impose punitive action?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, what my hon. Friend says is correct. It is worth remembering that not only have RAF crews shown bravery and courage today, but they have been applying the no-fly zone for some months in circumstances when, on any day during that period, they could have been subject to attack by Iraqi missiles or aircraft. Therefore, the RAF's professionalism and dedication have been demonstrated during the last few months in the application of the no-fly zone in southern Iraq and in the parallel zone in the north of the country as well.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does the Minister accept that the Government are highly selective in their support for the United Nations? They continue to ignore breaches by Israel and are themselves continuously in breach of the United Nations nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Does he accept that in all probability this action will strengthen, not weaken, Saddam Hussein's position, and that it will solve nothing? The right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot claim that all hon. Members support the action which in my view is entirely misguided and will do nothing to solve the problems of the middle east.

Mr. Rifkind: I reject entirely the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that Britain does not observe United Nations non-proliferation requirements. The hon. Gentleman might see himself as a friend and ally of Saddam Hussein, but—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Rifkind rose—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Rifkind rose——

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will have heard—as, doubtless, did many other hon. Members—the Secretary of State for Defence describe my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) as a friend and ally of Saddam Hussein. You, and many other hon. Members, will know that that allegation is entirely untrue. That being the case, I respectfully ask you to ask the Defence Secretary to withdraw his unfounded and disgraceful allegation.

Madam Speaker: What the Secretary of State said was not unparliamentary. Ministers and other right hon. and hon. Members are responsible for their own comments in the House.

Mr. Cryer: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. The remark was entirely wrong and inaccurate. The Secretary of State was being economical with the truth if he was suggesting that I am a friend and ally of Saddam Hussein. It is quite wrong for any Minister to try to make such a smear, given that [illegible] Members are entitled to make legitimate criticisms of what appears to be a consensus position. It is utterly outrageous. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The point has been made.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. There are no further points of order. I have had enough. Has the Secretary of State finished?

Mr. Rifkind indicated assent.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): The action taken by Britain and other countries will be warmly welcomed by all who believe that the Baghdad bully is the greatest threat to peace in the middle east. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is a scandal that right hon. and hon. Members should give succour to Saddam Hussein tonight?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right. If we are to have the maximum impact on the behaviour of the Iraqi Government, it is important for the views of the House to be presented with great strength and unanimity.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I despair of this Government, with their obvious limitations, ever comprehending that this sort of action simply ensures the survival of Saddam and that, much more dangerous, every such action makes millions of converts to Islamic fundamentalism across the globe.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman must reflect on the consequences of the coalition's not having taken action. He appears to be willing to acquiesce in a situation in which the effectiveness of the no-fly zone would have been destroyed and oppression of the Shia by the Iraqi air force would have been reintroduced. That would have fundamentally damaged the interests that I am sure the hon. Gentleman would like to represent.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Given that Saddam Hussein has also been violating the land border of Kuwait, will my right hon. and learned Friend tell us what action, if any, is being taken to improve the defences of that border?

Mr. Rifkind: The Security Council has told the Iraqi Government that that behaviour is unacceptable. I understand that the United States Government have said today that they are deploying a battalion group to Kuwait, to emphasise the importance attached to the security of that country.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): How many wars and military strikes are the Government prepared to allow that punish Iraqi people but do not resolve anything? How many deaths are to be added to the 100,000 that resulted from the Gulf war? When will the Government show a readiness to save the lives of Iraqi children, whose death rate has tripled since the Gulf war, instead of engaging in this sort of jingoism?

Mr. Rifkind: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the targets against which action was taken today were exclusively military. He should be the first to appreciate that the best contribution that could be made to the welfare of the Iraqi people would be Saddam Hussein's giving up power in that country, and allowing his own people to be represented in a more acceptable way.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Will the Government be pursuing United Nations resolution 799 with equal vigour?

Mr. Rifkind: The Government give their support to all United Nations resolutions.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): In view of the statement made earlier tonight by Sir David Hannay, our ambassador to the United Nations, that the British Government believe in the enforcement of all United Nations resolutions without priority and differentation, will the Secretary of State explain to the House and to the international community—particularly the international Islamic community—why such swift, heavy military action was taken in this case, whereas western powers seem to stand by and turn a blind eye to ethnic cleansing in Bosnia and to the transportation of more than 400 Palestinians to a freezing desert in no man's land? Is that not an example of pathetic double standards? Are not the real friends and allies of Saddam Hussein people such as the Secretary of State, who is a member of a Government who supplied arms to Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman talks typical nonsense. He should be aware, in making comparisons with the situation in Bosnia, that not only has the United Nations introduced a no-fly zone resolution for Bosnia but that since its inception no combat aircraft have flown. It is precisely because of the use of combat aircraft by the Iraqi Government that today's action was necessary.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend pass on to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Cabinet, and to those brave men and women in the Royal Air Force, the fervent thanks of those people on the ground in the marshes in southern Iraq—from whom I have received this evening messages of gratitude?

Mr. Jimmy Wray (Glasgow, Provan): I do not believe it.

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must hear the hon. Lady.

Miss Nicholson: My right hon. and learned Friend may like to remind the House that the BBC World Service is heard in the marshes of Iraq and that the telephone service is usable. Some of us have regular contacts there, and it is derisory of the hon. Gentleman to question that particular point.

I remind my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues of the grave difficulties under which the people of southern Iraq are suffering. For example, the sewage disposal in Basra is 80 per cent. raw ditch disposal—and has been for many years, because of Saddam Hussein. There is no education in the south and no medicine in the marshes, and the people are deprived of all the usual human facilities and all possibility of leading any kind of a normal life. That is due to Saddam Hussein, and has nothing to do with the actions of the allies in the Gulf war. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to make absolutely certain that we do everything possible on the ground to relieve those poor people from the devilry that Saddam Hussein constantly inflicts on them, out of sight of western cameras.

Mr. Rifkind: I listened with great care to my hon. Friend's remarks, because I know that she has made a number of courageous visits to the marshlands of southern Iraq, to make her own outstanding contribution to the welfare of the oppressed people in that area. We are not only pleased that the no-fly zone has helped to reduce that oppression but are always anxious to explore other ways of assisting the people to whom she has given such a high degree of personal commitment.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): Can the Secretary of State give the House an assurance that the Government will seek ways to strengthen the United Nations forces currently patrolling the demilitarised zone around Kuwait? Can he confirm that large amounts of weaponry have already been retrieved by the Iraqis, including four Silkworm missiles that could be used against coalition forces? Can he assure the House that any remaining weaponry in former Iraqi territory that is now part of the demilitarised zone will be moved out of the reach of the invading Iraqis?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is right to refer to that particular problem. There is considerable difficulty in that United Nations personnel are not normally armed and therefore have been unable to resist incursions by armed Iraqis who removed assets, including Silkworm missiles. It is clearly important to draw the appropriate conclusions from those incidents, to ensure that they do not recur.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): It is clear that the overwhelming majority of right hon. and hon. Members are entirely convinced that it was vital, in the interests of world peace, to prevent the United Nations from being made a fool of by Saddam Hussein. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is no less vital that the United Nations should not be made a fool of in Bosnia and Serbia?

Mr. Rifkind: Of course. That is, indeed, a very important objective. The way in which we try to prosecute the interests of the United Nations has to take account of the particular circumstances of each country. We try to use the most effective means available to us to achieve those objectives.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): The Secretary of State should be aware that the action taken tonight is worse than a crime—it is a blunder. It is a blunder because, when the fog of war clears tomorrow, we shall find that the people who have been not "spanked", as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) had it, but torn limb from limb and incinerated under the bombs—smart or otherwise—will be people who never voted for Saddam Hussein and who are not responsible for the crimes that he has committed down the years, including all the years during which the British Government were selling him arms.

The radicalisation and Islamicisation that is occurring across the Arab area and the broader Muslim world will be greatly intensified by what will be regarded as western double standards, whereby the west is ready, at a moment's notice, to pulverise Iraq, but unable, over decades, to do anything about Israel's rejecting and ignoring international law and international standards, or to do anything to save the lives of the tens of thousands of Bosnian Muslims who have died in the current campaign in former Yugoslavia.

Is not the Secretary of State aware that, across the Arab world, Saddam Hussein has been made into a hero by those double standards, and that the blunder and crime that was committed this evening will come back to haunt us in years to come?

Mr. Rifkind: I must first tell the hon. Gentleman that his views are not the views of Arab Governments in the region, who are already welcoming the action that has been taken today. I must also remind the hon. Gentleman that, whereas the coalition today restricted itself deliberately to military targets, the no-fly zone was introduced to prevent Iraqi aircraft, ultimately commanded by Saddam Hussein, from bombing innocent civilians —innocent men, women and children—in southern Iraq. If the hon. Gentleman's advice were accepted, it would lead directly to the non-continuation of the no-fly zone restrictions and to the resumption of the bombing of innocent people. That is where the hon. Gentleman's policy would appear to lead.

Sir George Gardiner (Reigate): My right hon. and learned Friend will already know that the bulk of the British population will support the rather limited counter action that has been taken against Saddam Hussein. Will he acknowledge that, in the perception of the bulk of our citizens, the time will come when we will need not only to give Saddam Hussein a bloody nose but to go for his throat?

Mr. Rifkind: Clearly, if the Iraqi regime continues to ignore United Nations resolutions and to take aggressive action, it will invite further action by the international community. That would be not only proportionate but necessary if such circumstances arose.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Secretary of State accept that he will have my party's support for action undertaken to uphold United Nations Security Council resolutions because we believe that to do other than enforce those resolutions would be to be ineffective and to follow the rather sad example of the League of Nations which was the precursor of the United Nations? However, we believe that all Security Council resolutions should be pursued with equal vigour and not on a selective basis.

As an hon. Member who represents a constituency with a substantial number of armed forces personnel, may I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman what mechanisms are being established to ensure that, should further action be undertaken, the families are aware of the circumstances? He will be well aware of the problems that families face in such circumstances. I remind him, too, that I speak as an hon. Member who lost a constituent in the previous Gulf conflict.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Lady and her colleagues for their support for today's action. We are always anxious to give maximum information to families. It is in the nature of such operations that they have to be kept entirely confidential and secret until they have taken place. Thereafter, however, we try to provide as much information as is consistent with normal security considerations.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. and learned Friend has quite properly reassured the House that our Arab friends have welcomed the action today. But our Arab friends would be further reassured if we were to take proportionate action to make sure that Israel also abided by international resolutions. What action do the Government intend to take to provide that reassurance?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend must put specific questions of that sort to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. I know that my hon. Friend has done so in the past, and that he has been impressed by the answers which he has received.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does the Secretary of State not admit that the action taken today has more to do with the vanity of the lame duck President Bush than anything else, and that the British Government tagged along like lap dogs, as they did in the Gulf war? How many of the installations which were knocked out were provided with British technology?

The Secretary of State has some cheek to attack my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) or anyone else about being an ally of Saddam Hussein when he is a member of a Government who could not tell the difference between an Iraqi gun and an oil pipeline until the truth emerged and we found that the Government were involved in squalid deals to enable Saddam Hussein to carry out genocide against his people.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his typically robust intervention in these matters. His views are not unexpected, although they are based on a complete misunderstanding of the facts. However, a complete misunderstanding of the facts has never deterred the hon. Gentleman in the past, and there is no reason to suspect that it would have a different effect today.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Why is it that the Government of Turkey have denied the use of bases? Is it not a fact that the Government of Jordan have deplored the action and asked for a negotiated settlement?

On a question of fact, do the British have any control whatever over a decision of the United States to use some of the 400 Patriot missiles that have been installed? What is the position on the increased number of American troops in Kuwait? Can the British Government give an assurance that the American troops will be consulted if there is to be any land action?

Do the Government know that there are more Shia Muslims than Sunni Muslims in Baghdad and that this is far from a cut-and-dried situation?

Mr. Rifkind: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that Turkey is giving its full co-operation to the imposition of the no-fly zone in the north of Iraq. Indeed, British Royal Air Force planes and United States aircraft are based in Turkey with the full support of the Turkish Government.

On the hon. Gentleman's latter comments, we had the closest consultation with the United States and with France on the particular operation that I have described today. Such consultation will also apply to any other possible action that might be taken in support of the United Nations or the international community.

Mr. Dalyell: And Jordan?

Mr. Rifkind: We shall have to examine exactly what the Jordanian Government said. We all hope that there are prospects for negotiated agreements. Regrettably, force is sometimes required precisely because Saddam Hussein has shown scant respect for diplomacy and because he only appears willing to acknowledge the use of force.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, contrary to what various Opposition Members have said, this is an attack on not the people of Iraq but the regime of Saddam Hussein? Does he also agree that the vast majority of the people of Iraq, be they Sunnis from Baghdad, Shi'ites from the south or Kurds from the north, will warmly applaud this action and hope that it will hasten the downfall of the evil regime of Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to remind the House of those who have been oppressed by the Iraqi regime. None have been more oppressed than the Iraqi people themselves.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May I, as I did two years ago, welcome military action against this dictator in the middle east? Although a majority of hon. Members are required, and are willing, to support military action, is it not strangely ironic that only two weeks ago officials of the Baghdad regime were in the United Kingdom negotiating with a major British defence contractor for the supply of telecommunications equipment to Baghdad? Surely Ministers should give honest and open answers to Parliament on that matter.

Mr. Rifkind: While I note what the hon. Gentleman says, I would wish to examine the basis of the comments that he has made before making any further comment on them. They are serious matters. I would wish to see the evidence that he has for that allegation.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): May I ask the Minister to be factual in his answer to my questions? First, did the strikes against the Iraqi forces take place inside or outside the no-fly zone? I understood that the United Nations resolution was about a no-fly zone, not a no-walk zone, no-run zone or no-missiles zone. Did the United Nations resolution specifically authorise the coalition forces to bomb missiles which might be inside the no-fly zone?

Mr. Rifkind: On the hon. Gentleman's first question, I can confirm that all the targets that were the subject of attack by coalition forces were in the no-fly zone. On the hon. Gentleman's second question, once a no-fly zone has been authorised in accordance with international law, it is entirely appropriate to act in self-defence to ensure the safety of those who are imposing the no-fly zone. It is because the Iraqi Government introduced SAM missiles in the no-fly zone which represented a very serious threat indeed to the safety of those air force crews from the various countries concerned that it is entirely justifiable and in accordance with international law to take the action that was taken today.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Is it not a matter of great satisfaction that the allies have shown such resolve in this matter? May we congratulate President Bush in the last few days of his presidency on the actions that he has taken, together with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the President of France? Is the action not something for which Saddam Hussein bears full responsibility for bringing against his own people and for which he should pay the price?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. I would add that President Bush can be congratulated on the resolute way in which he has acted throughout his presidency. He has been a superb President in the contribution that he has made to dealing with the aggression represented by the Iraqi regime. That has been to the benefit of the international community as a whole.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Can the Secretary of State give the House estimated Iraqi casualties in the strike tonight? Did the Iraqis return fire?

Mr. Rifkind: At this stage we cannot estimate casualties. But I emphasise that all the targets were military. The operation took place at night. Therefore, it is unlikely that the casualties were substantial in number. On the question about any resistance to the allied effort, I can inform the House that some radar activity was noted during the operation. There was also some anti-aircraft activity in the area of the target and it is possible that some surface-to-air missiles were fired. But it is difficult to be certain at this stage. I can assure the House that there were no casualties and none of the coalition aircraft was hit or damaged in any way.

Dr. Norman A Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): It is surely the case that throughout the United Kingdom people of all political persuasions share a deep detestation of Saddam Hussein and his evil regime. However, the dramatic decisiveness shown by the coalition nations in this action stands in stark contrast to the craven reluctance of the United Nations and so-called coalition nations to take such decisive action on behalf of the people of Tibet, who have suffered something close to genocide at the hands of those ancient men in Peking. They have also shown craven reluctance to help the people of Serbia. Surely what is needed in the United Nations is a unified military command structure and an honourable consistency in the organisation's peacekeeping and peace making activities.

Mr. Rifkind: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that the United Nations has dramatically extended its peacekeeping activities during the past three or four years. In the first 40 years of its existence, it was able to initiate only about 13 peacekeeping operations; a further 13 have been authorised in the past three or four years, which shows that the objectives to which the hon. Gentleman aspires are clearly resulting in some significant enhancement of the UN's ability to influence events and to try to reduce oppression.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Secretary of State for Defence admit that for many years Her Majesty's Government have been the greatest friend and ally of Saddam Hussein, as they have succeeded in arming him to the teeth? Will he also admit that the likely consequences of his statement are that Saddam Hussein will renew his persecution of Kurds and Shias, that the people of Iraq will unify behind him and that the alienation of the Arab and Islamic countries against the west is likely to intensify further, and accusations of double standards against the west, because of its eagerness to bomb Iraq but to appease Serbia, will be made time and again? I therefore ask the Secretary of State to apologise and to withdraw his earlier remark against an Opposition Member who—like many other Opposition Members—is merely guilty of opposing the Government's dreadful record on oppression, Saddam Hussein and double standards.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's suggestion that Saddam Hussein oppresses the Kurds and the Shias only in response to actions by the international community is a most extraordinary proposition. The reality is that nothing would be more likely to lead to a resumption of oppression against the Shias and the Kurds than if the no-fly zone imposed by the international community had to cease because of our unwillingness to take effective action when there have been transgressions against it by the Iraqi Government.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Could the Secretary of State bear to admit that many Opposition Members have never supported Saddam Hussein and have consistently stood up for human rights in Iraq, including my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Madden)? What appalls us is that the British and American strategy has resulted in 300,000 deaths, poverty throughout Iraq and cholera in the streets. What is the objective—is it further bombardment, or is there a serious political objective of bringing peace to that region?

Mr. Rifkind: The international action has led to the liberation of Kuwait and the protection of the Kurds in northern Iraq and of the Shias in southern Iraq, and the hon. Gentleman should be doing all in his power to help to lead that international action towards the eventual disappearance of Saddam Hussein as ruler of Baghdad.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): May I join the Secretary of State in congratulating our personnel on their courage and proficiency in an operation which was successful and probably inevitable? May I also invite him to admit that they are the fall guys for the failure and bankruptcy of the policies of the Government and their allies in the Gulf? First, the Government armed Saddam Hussein and then they prosecuted a war that caused devastation to the infrastructure, the people and the environment of the region, but Saddam Hussein and his odious tyranny is still there, killing the Kurds and Shi'ites and committing acts of aggression against the Kuwaitis and others in the region. The fact is that the allies' policy has failed abysmally and the Secretary of State should have the honesty to admit it.

Mr. Rifkind: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. The allied policy has led to the renewed independence of Kuwait and the protection that is being given to the Shias and the Kurds. I waited with interest, but without success, to hear the hon. Gentleman's scenario as to what would have been more likely to achieve those results.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Security Council resolutions are quite wordy and in some ways rather precise, such as resolution 688. Which detail of the resolution justifies the action that the Americans and the Government have been involved in in Iraq? Can the Secretary of State quote the detail that allows that to have taken place and justifies it?

Mr. Rifkind: Security Council resolution 688 calls on Iraq to refrain from further repression of its civilian population. It was in pursuance of that resolution that the no-fly zone was introduced in accordance with international law. In accordance with international law, it is appropriate to take action to defend those who have the responsibility of applying that policy.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will the Secretary of State tell us what action is now planned to protect the Kurds should there be further attempts by Saddam to strangle and harass the Kurdish people? Can he assure us that, as well as thinking about military action, the Government are serious about trying to bring about democratic change in Iraq? The Iraqi opposition wants that rather than a stand-off that keeps Saddam in power.

Mr. Rifkind: We attach importance to the rights of the Kurdish population in northern Iraq and that is why we have a no-fly zone in that part of the country as well. It has been successfully applied and any transgressions against it by the Iraqi regime would be treated with great seriousness.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): The Secretary of State's robust defence of the United Nations resolution would ring a lot more true if we pursued others as vigorously as we have done this one. No doubt he will be aware of the violations of human rights that are everyday occurrences in Kashmir, yet United Nations resolutions, outstanding from 1947 and 1948, have never been acted upon. We have not had any explanation from the right hon. and learned Gentleman of who authorised today's action. Who authorised it?

Mr. Rifkind: The action was obviously the responsibility of the countries that participated in the operation. They are the countries which have applied the no-fly zone and, in accordance with international law, they are entitled to take action in defence of their own aircrews. I must ask the hon. Gentleman whether he would have preferred a situation where the RAF would have been exposed to attack by the Iraqi air force without the right to defend itself. If that is the action which the hon. Gentleman is suggesting, it would have been consistent with discontinuing the no-fly zone, with all the consequences that that would have meant for the Shia population.

Mr. Boyce: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. There is no point of order at this stage; we are in the middle of questions on the statement.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): In the interests of maintaining international authority, will the Secretary of State assure the House that attention will not be restricted purely to the no-fly zones, at least until the United Nations aircraft are able to fly into Baghdad and United Nations inspection teams can complete their work there?

Mr. Rifkind: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. The Security Council also attaches the gravest importance to the refusal of the Iraqi Government to allow those missions to proceed to Baghdad in United Nations aircraft. Earlier today, there was a report that the Iraqi deputy Prime Minister had said that United Nations planes might be permitted. We hope that that is to be the Iraqi policy, which would be a welcome reversal of the stance that it has taken recently.

Dr. David Clark: In view of what I said previously, I do not think that the House or the Secretary of State can be in any doubt of my support for the operation or, indeed, can be in any doubt that my judgment is at variance with that of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). However, on reflection, the Secretary of State may have slightly misjudged the issue by saying that my hon. Friend was an ally and friend of Saddam Hussein. I must say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I do not think that it helps the House for the message to go out that Saddam Hussein has any friends at all in the House. I wonder whether the Secretary of State would consider reflecting upon his earlier comment and withdrawing it?

Mr. Rifkind: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the remark that I made was that the hon. Member for Bradford, South might think of himself as an ally and friend of Saddam Hussein. If the hon. Gentleman does not think of himself in those terms, I and the House would be delighted to hear that. I must repeat the fact that I believe that the policies that he espouses work to the advantage of Saddam Hussein and will be well received in Baghdad tonight.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Let me make absolutely plain my position on this matter, which the Secretary of State raised directly. I do not regard, and have never regarded, myself as a friend and ally of Saddam Hussein. Now that I have said so, will the Secretary of State completely withdraw his slur against me? I have never sold guns to Saddam Hussein or anybody else.

Mr. Boyce: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. What redress is available to an ordinary Back Bencher who puts a legitimate question to the Secretary of State and is replied to with a question containing serious allegations about that Member's personal stand on the action taken today? Are we to understand that the Secretary of State may answer questions with questions and that Back Benchers have no redress?

Madam Speaker: Back Benchers learn very quickly to pursue matters by various methods. I have been a Member of this House for 20 years. When the hon. Gentleman has been here long enough, he will find ways and means of doing this.

PETITION

Disabled People

11.5 pm

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I should like to present a petition from a large number of members of Mencap in Birmingham. It reads as follows:

SUPPORT CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION FOR DISABLED PEOPLE

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of supporters of Birmingham Mencap shows.

That people who are disabled or perceived to be disabled (for whatever reason) are continually having to face widespread, unjustifiable discrimination.

That legislation is necessary to outlaw this discrimination.

Therefore, your petitioners pray that your honourable House introduce legislation to outlaw unjustifiable discrimination against people who are disabled or perceived to be disabled as soon as possible.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Aujeszky's Disease

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

11.6 pm

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I am extremely grateful to have been granted an Adjournment debate on the subject of Aujeszky's disease and its effect on the pig industry in the United Kingdom. My county—Suffolk—has more pig producers than most. The obvious exception is Humberside, as is shown by the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and other hon. Members who feel very strongly about this issue.

The need for this debate was made urgent by the increased risk of the importation of Aujeszky's disease into this country, and by recent Government proposals to take over the remains of the fund established to eliminate the disease here. In many ways, the issues raised encapsulate the problems that membership of the European Community increasingly poses for the agricultural community. Those who understand the pig industry in this country will know that it is not subsidised as many other sectors of agriculture are. It is efficient, competitive and self-reliant. This self-reliance has never been better demonstrated than by the pig producers' determination to eliminate Aujeszky's disease from this country some years ago.

This debate is about how Aujeszky's disease was eradicated, the money that was used to do it, the likelihood of the reintroduction of the disease from other Community countries, and what should be done with the money left over from the eradication scheme.

Aujeszky's disease is a viral disease that causes high mortality and unthriftiness in both breeding and finishing pigs. Between 1983 and 1990, pig producers funded the eradication of Aujeszky's disease from Great Britain through a compulsory slaughter policy. The scheme followed a poll of producers in 1982, and had the full approval of Ministers. The Government recognised the strong case for eradicating the disease, but were unable to finance the programme. However, they agreed to provide the services of the state veterinary service for the purpose of having the compulsory slaughter policy carried out, and having the necessary blood testing conducted.

The total cost of the programme was £38 million, and after recovery of money through carcase sales, the net cost to pig farmers was £27 million, financed by a levy of 30p per pig, which was collected through the Meat and Livestock Commission and was held in the pig disease eradication fund. Complete freedom from the disease was declared in May 1991 and £780,000 now remains in the pig disease eradication fund, which belongs to the nation's pig producers.

Two recent changes have necessitated tonight's debate: first, imports of live pigs are to be permitted from January 1993, increasing the risk of reintroducing Aujeszky's disease into this country; secondly, the Government's stated intention to take over the money remaining in the fund, which belongs to pig producers. So, having eradicated the disease from this country, there is a renewed threat of it returning from Europe, and the money that could have been used to deal with that eventuality is to be taken over by the Ministry and used as it sees fit.

[Mr. Michael Lord]

Because the Minister understands the matter well, he will appreciate the unique animal and plant health record of this country, helped to a large extent by the fact that we are an island and have been zealous in policing imports and maintaining the highest possible standards. From January this year, that position has changed; we are now obliged to allow the import of live pigs from other European countries in a way that was not previously permitted.

Time does not allow me to go into the various categories of pigs to be imported or how they will be checked and tested. Suffice it to say that the EC Standing Veterinary Committee in Brussels has agreed various rules and our Ministry has been working hard to make things as tight as possible. Nevertheless, pigs will now be allowed in not just for breeding purposes but for further fattening and slaughter. They will be allowed in from all those Community countries where Aujeszky's is a notifiable disease. Although we are obliged under EC rules to allow those imports, all veterinary advice suggests that it will be a retrograde step and will increase the likelihood of importing diseases such as Aujeszky's.

The new rules governing the import of pigs for breeding are reasonably strict; those for pigs for further fattening are less so; and the rules on pigs for immediate slaughter are the least strict of all. How can we be certain that all those rules and regulations will be obeyed? More important, how can we be certain that, even with the closest possible control, infected pigs will not somehow slip through the net?

Aujeszky's is often difficult to spot in pigs without testing and there must be a real possibility, with greatly increased numbers of pigs of all kinds entering the country, that the disease will come with them. It is a sad day when our membership of the Community means lower standards of animal hygiene for this country. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to look again at the import of live pigs and ask himself, given our excellent national record in the matter, whether those changes can be justified. He will recall that the Government intended to bring the standards of European farmers up to ours, not lower our standards to theirs or endanger our herds and flocks with imported problems.

Given the real dangers of importing Aujeszky's disease which I have described, one would have thought that the Government would have been only too happy to leave the £780,000 belonging to pig producers in the pig disease eradication fund against the eventuality that it may be needed again for its original purpose, which was to slaughter infected pigs and keep this country Aujeszky's-free. It is pig producers' money, raised for a specific purpose, and there is every indication that it might one day have to be used again for the same purpose. I understand that the Minister has said that, in the event of the reappearance of Aujeszky's disease, a slaughter policy would be immediately implemented and the levy system reactivated. Pig producers insist that those funds have been raised for a specific purpose and should be held available, should the need arise.

In November, the Minister announced that, following the latest review of public spending, he would take the money from the pig disease eradication fund and use it for "some of the Agriculture Department's activities".

In fairness, the Ministry has always said that the money would be used to defray costs relating to the testing for, and control of, Aujeszky's disease. The Minister will no doubt tell the House that, under the Pig Industry Levy Act 1983, he is only using powers made available to him which allow him to use the pig producers' fund in this way, but those in the pig industry are deeply concerned about this proposal, and their concerns fall under a number of headings.

Most important, they believe—I agree with them—that this money belongs to them, the pig producers. Ministers have always recognised that this money was under the control of pig producers and operated through the industry by the Pig Disease Eradication Fund Board. Pig producers argue that the ministerial powers set out in the Pig Industry Levy Act 1983 were essentially public expenditure safeguards, and it was never envisaged that the powers would be used in this way, although the Minister has suggested from time to time to the industry that these funds could be spent on other purposes.

People in the industry are also deeply concerned that the Minister failed to consult them before the decision was taken, and they see it as being very much against the whole spirit of the Aujeszky's eradication scheme. The Government have talked of using the money to test for or monitor Aujeszky's disease, but the British Pig Producers Association, with which I have had discussions, has put to me the important point that, in its view, the Government have a statutory obligation to meet the conditions of Aujeszky's disease-free status as required by the European Commission decision on trade guarantees. Given this obligation, the BPPA believes that it would be quite wrong to expect the industry to bear the cost of any surveillance work.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I am very grateful to the hon. Member for giving way in an Adjournment debate. I would like to say a brief word of support for the excellent case that is being put forward, not only as an Opposition speaker but also as a Humberside Member with a significant pig industry in my constituency. Would the hon. Member care to speculate whether, if the Government do use this money for purposes not connected with either testing or eliminating Aujeszky's disease, and if we reach the position that he has outlined, in which, with the change to the single market, there may be an outbreak, the Government have a moral obligation to replace an equal amount of money in order to combat any such outbreak?

Mr. Lord: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, because, as I mentioned earlier, Humberside is one of the places where there is great worry about this matter. I take very much the point that he makes—that if, at the end of our pleas to the Minister, it is decided that the money will not be used for the purposes for which it should be used, then there ought to be some very firm commitment that, if it is needed, it will be replaced exactly as it is now, at the appropriate time and without delay.

The BPPA is also concerned about discrimination against the pig industry in the way I was describing earlier when it comes to testing, because similar health monitoring arrangements by the state veterinary service are conducted for other livestock sectors out of public funds.

Finally, and perhaps most important, the pig industry believes that it is being penalised for its self-reliance and far-sightedness because of public spending demands now in other agricultural sectors. It is greatly concerned that the proposed action could be counter-productive and could discourage pig farmers and farmers in other agricultural sectors from embarking on industry-financed schemes. Perhaps most important of all, it feels that there is a grave danger of damaging the trust which should and, I believe, does exist between pig producers and our Government.

On a personal note, I find that hardly a day passes without my hearing of some new and complex regulation which will damage some section of our agriculture industry—whether it is the amount of set-aside for our cereal farmers, the cost of veterinary inspection for our chicken producers, the closure of our small slaughter-houses, the effects of salmonella regulations on our egg producers or the subject of our debate tonight, Aujeszky's disease—all in the name of Europe and progress. Time unfortunately does not allow me to develop this theme too far, and I have no doubt, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you would call me to order if I did, but I object very strongly when Ministers return from negotiations in Brussels to tell us that they have triumphed yet again and that we are to be allowed to go on doing what we were doing quite happily before—only now we will not be able to do it quite as well as we used to.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): As a Humberside Member, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) for initiating tonight's debate. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) represents more pigs than humans. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central agree that the most important action that my hon. Friend the Minister can take is to continue the dialogue that he had with the British Pig Breeders Association before Christmas, when its members were courteously received by him, and continue that consultation process? The association feels deeply about the fact that there has been no consultation on the issue.

Mr. Lord: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. It is vital that our ministerial team maintains close contact with the pig producers. I know that they have spoken to my hon. Friend the Minister already, and I am sure that they will continue to do so, as they place much importance on it.

I urge my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary—who the House knows is a fair man, concerned to do all he can to help agriculture—to hold further consultations with the pig industry with two objectives in mind. First, he should ensure that everything possible has been done to keep Aujeszky's disease out of the country. Secondly, we should leave the pig producers' money where it is, to be used if the industry is faced with Aujeszky's disease again. Above all, he must ensure that the money is not used for any other purposes unless and until the pig producers agree on the alternative course of action.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) was kind enough to invite me to speak for a moment, because he knows how strongly I support his case. I thank him for giving me this brief opportunity, and shall curtail my remarks still further, as all I need to do is say what a powerful case my hon. Friend has made, how wonderfully he has presented it and how important the subject is that he has chosen.

I thank the Minister for his courtesy in allowing me to bring to see him in early December the most important pig producer in my constituency, Mr. Brian Jones, chairman of the pig committee of the National Farmers Union, together with the upcoming chairman of the British Pig Breeders Association. The subject is important to many hon. Members and their constituents. Today there are, alas, too few farming Members of Parliament, but we are fortunate in having outstanding Ministers in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Their dedication is shown by the fact that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary are both present for tonight's important debate. Pig farmers are of great importance to many of us, and we are deeply unhappy that our Government seem to have mistreated that important group.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nicholas Soames): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) on securing tonight's important Adjournment debate. I am extremely grateful to him for providing me with an opportunity to underline Her Majesty's Government's firm commitment to a healthy future for the excellent pig industry in this country.

I note the interest in the debate of my hon. Friends the Members for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) and for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson), who, as she said, has already brought a delegation to see me with whom I discussed some of the issues. I endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West that this is an extremely important debate, and as such is vested with the presence of my right hon. Friend the Minister.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central said, the eradication of Aujeszky's disease in the United Kingdom was an outstanding success, achieved by a determined co-operative effort between industry and Government. The co-operative instinct that gave rise to that effort is perhaps less well developed in this country than it is among some of our major competitors, and it is a tribute to the United Kingdom pig industry—which we freely give—that it should have taken such an important initiative.

Although many people have made important contributions to the effort, I am sure that the House would join me in paying particular tribute to the efforts of Jim Blanchard, whose services were deservedly recognised with an award in the latest honours list.

Before I speak in some detail about the decision to use the outstanding funds, it may be helpful briefly to describe the disease and its history in the United Kingdom, although I do not intend to go over ground that has already been covered by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central.

Aujeszky's was first recorded in this country in 1953, and was made notifiable in 1979 when there were only 34 cases. The presence of Aujeszky's was nevertheless a cause for great concern in those areas where our pig population is concentrated.

A survey in 1982 suggested that the disease was spreading within the United Kingdom, and as a result an eradication programme was introduced.

I should perhaps stress that the disease has no implications whatever for human health, and that therefore disease control benefits only the producer. As a consequence, the Government did not consider it appropriate for taxpayers in general to meet the whole cost of the eradication programme. For that reason, it was agreed that action would depend upon the willingness of producers to fund the costs which would arise from the need to compensate farmers whose stock was subject to compulsory slaughter for animal health purposes.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The Minister makes an eloquent case for identifying the levy funds, which came from this sector for agriculture and were not part of the Ministry's general funds. That is the nub of the argument. As hon. Members from all parties who signed the early-day motion have said, this was an identifiable sum that came straight from the industry and should go back to that sector.

Mr. Soames: If the hon. Gentleman had allowed me to develop my argument for a little longer than one minute and 35 seconds, he would have heard me cover that ground.

A poll of producers confirmed the industry's willingness to proceed on the basis that I have described. The Pig Industry Levy Act 1983 provided for the establishment of a levy to be collected by the Meat and Livestock Commission. The Act extended the powers of the commission under the Agriculture Act 1967 so as to meet the costs incurred by the Minister as a consequence of exercising his general powers under the Animal Health Act 1981, specifically in relation to Aujeszky's disease. This levy amounted to 30p per pig slaughtered or exported live. The money was held by the Pig Disease Eradication Fund Ltd. which was created solely for this purpose, as my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central said.

The cost of the compensation payable on slaughtered pigs under the Aujeszky's eradication programme was recovered from those funds. In addition, the fund provided compensation to owners for consequential losses, the Government's contribution being to undertake the key tasks of the eradication programme—investigating suspect cases and implementing control measures, which led to substantial costs in terms of administration, staff and veterinary services.

About £27 million was collected over the six-year period of active Aujeszky's eradication measures and 432,262 pigs were slaughtered, from 523 herds. That was double the initial estimate of 250 herds which it was believed would need to be slaughtered when the eradication programme was launched. The last confirmed case occurred in September 1989. Freedom from Aujeszky's disease was formally declared in May 1991, bringing the eradication programme to a highly successful conclusion, and greatly enhancing the marketability of British pigs.

Once the disease had been eradicated and the levy had ceased to be collected, there remained, as my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central said, a balance of some £700,000, which has grown with interest. There are provisions within the Act for any such money to be used at the direction of the Minister for the benefit of the industry. The precise use to which this surplus is to be put is central to this debate, and has obviously concerned the many leaders of the industry and industry representatives with whom I and my right hon. Friend have had discussions, which were always conducted in an extremely robust but courteous manner.

This aspect was touched upon on Second Reading of the Pig Industry Levy Bill. The then Minister of State was, as always, very clear in his comments on the matter. He recognised that the issue gave rise to some anxiety in the industry, and he assured the House that any money that was available would be returned to the sector that had provided the funds. However, he also made it clear that it was impossible to be specific about any surplus funds, and refused to speculate on the precise purposes for which surplus moneys should be used.

In the past, we have considered with the industry a number of possible uses for the surplus. Initially, discussions focused on possible research and development projects, and we have agreed to use a small amount of money in that way. However, we received no firm proposals from the industry about how the funds might be used, and in the context of the most recent public expenditure round discussions, it was decided that the remaining balance from the levy should be used for continuing work on Aujeszky's disease that was of immediate benefit to the industry.

Having eradicated the disease, our priority now, as my hon. Friend rightly said, is to secure trade arrangements that will ensure, so far as possible, that the disease will not be reintroduced into this country. This requires us to secure recognition of our disease-free status and appropriate trade guarantees from our partners. These efforts, after long and difficult negotiations, have been extremely successful. The necessary veterinary trade guarantees came into force at the beginning of the year, and I believe that the industry recognises their value and soundness.

Without those trade guarantees, there would have been a real risk of reinfection. This would have led to renewed expense to the industry in trying to maintain our disease-free status through the existing mechanism. That is particularly important with a disease like Aujeszky's. The signs of disease are highly variable and there may be sub-clinical infection. It is necessary to test all cull boars, and to have all samples submitted to veterinary investigation centres for examination. In this way, we are effectively screening the whole national herd, and should be able to detect infection at an early enough stage to take prompt and effective action.

It is the cost of this monitoring that is to be offset by the use of the surplus funds collected through the levy. It is clear that this work is of direct and immediate benefit to the industry. Freedom from Aujeszky's benefits all producers, not just the exporter. It was the potential effect on production which won the support of the industry for action. I have assured the industry—I repeat the assurance to the House—that not a penny of the accumulated funds will be spent by the Minister other than on Aujeszky's disease.

As my hon. Friend is aware, I met the National Farmers Union and representatives from the Pig Disease Eradication Fund Board before Christmas. At that meeting, I made it clear that there could be no going back on the decision, but that we were keen to see a continuation of the close co-operation which has always existed in relation to Aujeszky's disease. My officials are consulting the industry on the details of the surveillance necessary to maintain this country's disease-free status, which is what we all want. We shall also be discussing with it ways of minimising the costs of the necessary work and the financial control mechanisms, as clearly we wish to use these outstanding funds in the most effective, efficient and prudent way possible.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Soames: I must get on: I ask my hon. Friend to forgive me.

As I said at the outset, it is the pig industry that benefits from the freedom from Aujeszky's disease, and it is entirely right that the industry should focus on the real costs of control. It is regrettable, of course——

Mr. Townend: I wish to make an important point. I accept the arguments that my hon. Friend has advanced, but will he assure the industry that he recognises that, when the fund is completely depleted, the monitoring will still have to continue? Will the cost of the monitoring then be paid for by the Government, or will another levy be introduced?

Mr. Soames: No. My hon. Friend will be aware that, if the fund ran out and by some awful chance the disease were to reappear, we would continue with exactly the same slaughter policy, and if necessary we would have to have another levy.

Mr. Townend: With respect, my hon. Friend has misunderstood my question.

Mr. Soames: I must continue.

It is regrettable that the industry should feel that it has not been adequately consulted. That is a point that has been made to me very clearly. I was under no illusions about the initial response of the industry, but I think that it now believes that we are taking a positive approach. It is an inevitable result of the way in which the Government's spending decisions are taken that advance consultation is often not possible. I do not accept that there is a legal obligation to consult before Ministers use the powers that have been given to them in legislation to direct how the funds should be used.

The industry's financial involvement in the maintenance regime will serve to underline the importance of a sensible approach. It maintains the investment of the industry as a whole in its well-deserved high health status. The surplus is finite, and no decisions have been taken on the future financing of ongoing work once the fund is exhausted. In what is, I very much hope, the unlikely event of an outbreak of the disease, the existing controls, including slaughter, will apply. As now, if the fund proves inadequate, we shall have to look to reactivating the levy.

I cannot end without responding to the main points made by my hon. Friend. It is my belief that the Aujeszky's disease story is one of proper achievement. Together, in a short period of six years, Government and the industry have eradicated a disease of sufficient economic importance that producers saw the benefits to them even when faced with the necessity of a levy. It was a wise investment, and one worth protecting. Only Denmark has achieved the same Aujeszky's disease-free status as Great Britain. Disease freedom must pay dividends in terms of increased production and enhanced export opportunities.

Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important Adjournment debate. I have noted the points made by my hon. Friends and by the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and I commend the work of my hon. Friend and the Ministry to the House.

Mr. John Townend rose——

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fines (Ability to Pay)

1. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made as to the success of the points system linking magistrates court fines with the individual's ability to pay.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): The principles of the scheme were successfully trialled before its full-scale introduction in all magistrates courts from 1 October 1992. It is too early to judge the full effectiveness of the scheme, but I am ensuring that it is closely monitored.

Mr. Steen: I am sure that the House will agree that it is important that the way in which our courts conduct their business should appear to be fair. Does the Minister consider it fair that a man on income support who drives along the A38 at 100 mph should be fined £24—less than a parking fine—while a man driving immediately behind him at the same speed whose disposable income is £100 a week, which is not very much, is fined £1,600 for the same offence? Does that not discriminate against the ordinary man in the street and clobber him although he is not a millionaire?

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend will understand that I cannot comment on individual cases. On the principle, however, he will be aware that offenders' means have long been taken into account by the courts. My hon. Friend will know that magistrates still have total discretion regarding the seriousness of an offence and all relevant factors. I hope that he will also bear in mind that a fine is supposed to be punishment which hits the offender's pocket with the same punitive effect whether he is rich or poor. The scheme provides a framework to make that possible for magistrates courts. The scheme will continue to be monitored.

Mr. Llwyd: In my constituency there were two recent cases of driving without due care and attention, both of similar gravity, but one defendant was fined £800 and the other £25. Does that not strike the Minister as absurd?

Mr. Wardle: The units reflecting the seriousness of the offence may well have been the same, but the assessment of the fines would have depended on the offenders' disposable income. That is the purpose of the scheme. As I said, courts have long taken financial resources into account in deciding fines.

Business Crime

2. Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken to reduce the level of business crime.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): The latest safer cities progress report highlights a wide range of successful crime prevention initiatives that have benefited business, whose own crime prevention efforts have also gained from Home Office research covering issues such as retail crime analysis, shop theft and cheque and credit fraud. We have also supported the business and crime initiative launched by Crime Concern and the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Ward: Does my hon. Friend agree that the 300 business watch schemes represent a real commitment by the police and the business community to fight crime in partnership? How does my hon. Friend intend to encourage the extension of such schemes, and what practical help can he give to the participants?

Mr. Jack: I am delighted that my hon. Friend mentioned the word "partnership". That is the key to the way forward. Partnership has certainly been encouraged by the 20 safer city projects, and we have announced our intention to create 20 new safer cities. In addition, I have also had discussions with leading retailers, who are now showing considerable interest in working on crime prevention in partnership with us.

Mr. Redmond: When businesses such as B and Q open on a Sunday they commit a business crime. When will the Minister stop hiding behind local authorities? When will he stop condoning that activity and take positive action to stop those businesses breaking the law?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has given a clear idea of the Government's intentions on Sunday trading. Later this month a Bill dealing with the subject will be discussed. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity then to express his views more forcefully.

Mr. Paice: My hon. Friend has referred to retail crime. He will be aware of the great concern among retailers about large-scale, heavy-duty burglary, including ram raiding. What steps are being taken to reduce the incidence of ram raiding in terms of discussions with retailers and with the Department of the Environment, which controls the planning aspects of the prevention of ram raiding?

Mr. Jack: I recognise the severity of the effects of ram raiding. It is worth pointing out, as this may not be widely known, that ram raiding offences can attract a sentence of up to 10 years' imprisonment if burglary or aggravated burglary is involved.

My hon. Friend should be aware that we are pursuing Car Crime Prevention Year vigorously to ensure that the source of the tools of trade for ram raiders, if one can put it that way, are prevented from being stolen. I shall certainly pass on to the Department of the Environment my hon. Friend's comments relating to protective street furniture.

Mr. Michael: Does the Minister realise that the House is aware that he is being incredibly cheeky in suggesting that he will double the number of safer cities projects when in fact he will produce no extra cash?

On the real question before us, is the Minister aware that crime against business costs more than £10 billion per year, which is equivalent to a third of all NHS spending or 6 per cent. on income tax? Is he aware that fraud in the City of London costs more than £500 million per year? Given the Home Secretary's enthusiasm for putting business men in charge of hospitals, schools and prisons, or perhaps even the police, will the Minister now put some real enthusiasm into taking dramatic steps to sort out business crime?

Mr. Jack That restatement of a problem that we take only too seriously is merely a thinly veiled apology from the Opposition for their total lack of positive thought on how to deal with the problem. Last week we announced in full detail our plans for the safer cities projects. We always made it clear that there would be a limit on funding for existing projects until the end of 1994.

I am surprised and disappointed that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) gives no weight to the announcement that we made about the National Board for Crime Prevention, which includes a dialogue between business and the Government to address the very problems that he detailed.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that the outburst from the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) that the House has just witnessed is an outrage on the great majority of businesses in the United Kingdom which wish to co-operate with the police and the Home Office to prevent crime? Can my hon. Friend tell the House what arrangements he has in mind to ensure that business men are encouraged to sponsor crime prevention schemes?

Mr. Jack: I am delighted that my hon. Friend referred to the police in the context of crime prevention. The police are central and play an excellent role. [Interruption.] If Opposition Members disagree with that, they will have a chance to say so later.

As for contributing to crime prevention, we have certainly made it clear that there will be a real opportunity for local businesses to bring not only their expertise but their resources to help perhaps even to run some of the new 20 safer cities schemes.

Data Protection

3. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the EC data protection directive.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Peter Lloyd): The Government are seeking to achieve a directive as close as possible to the 1981 Council of Europe convention on data processing, on which our law is based. We consider that the convention preserves a proper balance between the rights and interests of data users, data subjects and others.

Mr. Cohen: Will the Government not be adopting double standards if later today they say that they support privacy protection from the press for individuals, from royals to plebians, but then spend their time watering it down for computer records? Why are the Government against the inclusion of manual data and data subject consent before records can be passed to others? Why do they expect France and Germany to have lower standards for their privacy protection than they already have?

Mr. Lloyd: We expect the Germans and the French to have the arrangements that they think best. Data users are well protected under the European convention. The fear is that their real interests will not be better looked after under the directive but rather that the data subjects will have extra expense and inconvenience as their banks, building societies and insurance companies will have to write to them more often to get written permission for routine transfers of information which most people want their banks to do automatically.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that, contrary to the impression given by the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), the United Kingdom is in the forefront of data protection? Does he further agree that United Kingdom law is based on the 1981 convention, which has not even been ratified by five of our EC partners?

Mr. Lloyd: That is right. Five of our EC friends have a long way to go. We signed the convention because, after long discussion, we believed that it provided the best protection for the data subjects as well as allowing business to be transacted by electronic means, which is in the interests of everyone, not merely businesses.

Local Police Forces

4. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is yet in a position to announce the future shape and organisation of local police forces; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I am still considering a range of issues connected with the police service, including the future shape and organisation of local police forces. I shall announce my conclusions when we have proposals to make.

Mr. Dunn: When my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary comes to consider the nature of reforms as presented to him, will he ensure that two things take place: first, that local accountability is maintained; secondly, that nothing is done to damage the integrity, work and competence of the police force of the county of Kent?

Mr. Clarke: Proposals are not being put to me. I am preparing proposals, which, in due course, I shall put to my hon. Friend and to the House. Of course I am determined to make the police service in Britain yet more effective and efficient to tackle the serious problems of lawlessness which we all know that we face. I already have in hand work on quality of service, more effective local policing, the pay and command structure of police forces, and what can be done about policemen who lack the capacity for the job. Now I have announced that I am having a look at the disciplinary procedures for those who face serious charges.

Obviously, I am also looking at structure and financing. I shall certainly bear in mind my hon. Friend's legitimate points when I do so. The relationship between the local police force and the local community is crucial to a good police force in Britain.

Mr. Mandelson: Has the Home Secretary reconsidered the 2 per cent. budget cut forced on my police force in Cleveland as a result of the Government's financial curbs on local authorities, about which I have had a complacent and unsatisfactory letter from his colleague the Minister of State, Lord Ferrers? Does the Home Secretary not realise that unless Government resources match his rhetoric, any reorganisation or tinkering with the management of the local police forces will be regarded by the public with the utmost suspicion?

Mr. Clarke: There has been a further substantial increase in the resources available to the police service nationally and to local government to spend on the police service as a result of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's autumn statement. I shall look up the financial arrangements of the hon. Gentleman's police force to see whether any particular local circumstances explain the difficulties that he describes, but overall we had a good settlement this autumn in the light of the economic recession which we know the country faces. The police service had a bigger increase than any other part of local authority expenditure.

Mr. Sykes: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the tragic murder between Christmas and the new year of an 80-year-old pensioner, Mr. Percy Noble, in Whitby in my constituency? That followed a similar event in September in which PC Moss was tragically blinded in the course of his duties in a so-called joy-riding accident. Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the tremendous anger felt by people in Scarborough and Whitby at those incidents? Is he aware that we want more bobbies on the beat, less paperwork for them to do and, most importantly, the punishment to fit the crime and not the criminal?

Mr. Clarke: I am aware of the tragic events that my hon. Friend describes. I also appreciate that they are only the worst feature of the problems that his constituents and many others face in today's society. That is why I am so determined to ensure that the police are made more effective and efficient. Although obviously the police cannot reduce the level of crime of their own volition, we have to have the best police force possible to tackle it. For that reason, I am looking at every aspect of police forces, including the relationship between the large numbers of headquarters staff in police forces throughout Britain and the policemen deployed on the ground, where I agree with my hon. Friend that the public most wish to see them and gain the greatest sense of security from them.

Mr. Blair: Does the Home Secretary agree that the most important thing that people want is a say in the policing of their local communities? They would resent it very much if policing were to be controlled by Government boards, stuffed with Government appointees. Would it not therefore be better if he had the broadest possible consultation on the changes, so that the outcome could be based on the interests of the public and not on his obsessive dislike of local government?

Mr. Clarke: First, I should make it clear that any proposals that I make will go out for consultation. I doubt whether that will interest the hon. Gentleman very much because he has already denounced my proposals—just in case—before he even knows what any of them are. The public are concerned about the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes)—about how far the police can be enabled to protect members of the public against the rising level of crime—rather than about the hon. Gentleman's prime concern, which is who sits on what committee, which seems to be a comparatively subordinate question.

Woolf Report

5. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made in the implementation of the Woolf report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's proposals in response to the Woolf report were set out in the White Paper, "Custody, Care and Justice", published in September 1991. The White Paper identified 12 key areas of priority for change. I will write to my hon. Friend with a more detailed account of progress in each of the 12 areas and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House. The White Paper paved the way for agency status for the prison service and work is well in hand to establish the executive agency on 1 April. I have appointed a chief executive designate, Mr. Derek Lewis, who I am sure will give dynamic leadership to the service.

Mr. Amess: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that my constituents in Basildon, where crime is falling, agree with the Woolf report? Does he also agree that the rapid progress in providing humane and modern conditions in our prison, is in stark contrast with the record of the Opposition, who cut capital spending on prisons by one fifth in spite of the fact that the prison population grew by 14·5 per cent?

Mr. Clarke: First, I believe that the encouraging crime statistics in Basildon are a result of the efforts of the local police force and the crime prevention initiatives canvassed a moment ago by my hon. Friend the Minister of State. The Government have certainly set a target of a more enlightened prison regime. We have adopted Lord Justice Woolf's proposals, appointed Judge Tumim to point out the deficiencies and are moving towards a more modern and effective management system which will deliver that target as soon as possible. It often surprises me that Opposition Members, who are most critical of the present failings of the prison service, appear most resistant to any idea of changing the way in which we run that service. The steps that we are taking will speed up the achievement of the targets that my hon. Friend wants us to set.

Mr. Maclennan: What does the Home Secretary intend to do about young offenders institutions, especially the one at Feltham?

Mr. Clarke: I visited Feltham, where a series of difficult and tragic incidents have taken place in recent years. I was glad to see the progress being made there to get out of those difficulties. The present governor and staff are to be congratulated on raising the morale of the team, introducing innovative ways to deal with offenders and providing more productive regimes. Bullying at Feltham is being tackled and we hope that efforts being put into improvements there will put an end to the problems that have occurred.

Mr. Bowis: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that when I visited Wandsworth prison recently the most impressive aspect had nothing to do with the laundering of Canadian diplomatic mail bags, but was the building works which will make possible single prisoner cells without slopping out? I hope that that work will continue quickly. The education work being done by the prison education service was the second most impressive thing. Will my right hon. and learned Friend keep a close eye on the current changes to the service to ensure that when prisoners have served their sentences they are able to leave prison best equipped to return to the community and the job market?

Mr. Clarke: My right hon. Friend's autumn statement preserved the Government's capital programmes and I am glad to say that, as a result, the prison capital programme was kept well in place. We are making great advances in extending and improving the amount of prison accommodation. I am glad to say that we are on target for ending slopping out and having integral sanitation everywhere by the end of 1994. More than 70 per cent. of prisoners already have such arrangements. I hope that my hon. Friend is assured that the improvements that he saw when he visited Wandsworth prison will be continued in the near future.

Ms. Ruddock: In the light of those replies, does the Home Secretary recall that his chief inspector of prisons, Judge Tumim, reported only three months ago that prisoners were still in overcrowded and disgraceful living conditions with inadequate medical attention? Do I need to remind him that, since then, there have been allegations of drugs and alcohol dealing and the rape of a female staff member of Long Lartin prison, a riot at Reading remand centre, and reports of a gangland culture at Wymott? The Secretary of State must acknowledge that the central recommendations of the Woolf report on reducing overcrowding and providing better education and work facilities for prisoners have not been carried out by the Government and that in that respect the Home Secretary has failed in his duties.

Mr. Clarke: It was this Government who appointed Judge Tumim to be Her Majesty's inspector of prisons and I recently reappointed him precisely so that he could carry on pointing out to the Government and to the public the failings and shortcomings in the prison service. We know that they exist on a wide scale. The conditions that the hon. Lady described still exist in too many of our local prisons and I have been describing how we propose to tackle them. Substantial improvements have been made towards getting Lord Justice Woolf's recommendations in place and we shall continue to make progress. When we have made the necessary changes to speed up progress, I hope that the Opposition will not merely resist them all, defend the status quo, and become frightfully obsessed with the fact that we bring in business men from outside to raise the management culture and improve the running of prisons.

Electoral Law

6. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had regarding changes in electoral law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have set up five working groups of Home Office officials and representatives of returning officers and local authorities to look at different aspects of the electoral process.

Mr. Skinner: It is about time, because in the 1992 election the Tories helped themselves by rigging the elections and piling up in marginal seats votes which they got from Johannesburg and the Costa del Sol. They made sure that those votes were put in the right place. Does the Minister agree that Tory supporters were also voting for the infirm and the disabled in residential homes in order to win the election? Why has there been no public inquiry into those malpractices? Will he guarantee that he will support the Bill to be presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) on Friday—appropriately, in a few days' time?

Mr. Lloyd: There is not much truth in any of that rant, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The whole House, including most of the hon. Gentleman's party—not the hon. Gentleman, but the Labour Front Bench and most Labour Members—supported the enfranchisement of British citizens living overseas. Some 30,000 voted, but they could not possibly have affected the outcome of the general election. What made a difference was the piling up of Labour votes in the Labour heartlands and inner cities —when the population had moved out—because the boundary review had been so long delayed.

Mr. Rathbone: Does my hon. Friend accept that the vast majority of people in the country welcomed those reforms to allow more people with interests in this country to vote in elections here? However, another aspect of electoral review which requires immediate attention is election to the European Parliament. Can my hon. Friend throw some light on the review to take place on that front?

Mr. Lloyd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We are urgently considering how to take forward the question of adding six additional seats for the next European elections in 1994. We intend to keep the existing voting system but to have the existing Euro-constituency boundaries independently redrawn.

Mr. Barnes: Does the Minister agree that the biggest problem in electoral law is the people missing from the electoral register? Some 2 million have disappeared from the register since 1987 and many redundant names appear on electoral registers, hiding from view the fact that there are many missing people. What are the Government doing about getting a proper—rolling—electoral register? If they are not doing anything, will they support the principle of the Bill that I shall be introducing in the House on 12 February?

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman asks a rhetorical question—he knows perfectly well what we are doing, as he and I have had discussions on the matter. As I said earlier, five working groups of local authority and Home Office officials are looking at the various issues, including that of the register. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, the register has always been a problem. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys is comparing the register with the outcome of the 1991 census.

If the hon. Gentleman casts his mind back to the 1981 census and review he will recall that 6·5 per cent. of people who were eligible to vote were not on the register then and 7 per cent. of names on the register were redundant—the people had died or moved. There is much work to be done by the group, which is why we set it up and intend to consider its recommendations carefully.

Mr. David Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that we won the general election in 1979? Is he aware that we won it in 1983? Is he aware that we won it in 1987? Is he aware that we won it in 1992? Is he aware that when we won those elections it had nothing to do with electoral reform, but was to do with our policies? Until that lot opposite understand those policies, they will never get re-elected.

Mr. Lloyd: Not for the first time my hon. Friend puts his finger right on it. He is quite right and Opposition Members know that he is right. That is why they come forward with fiddling excuses such as those produced by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. Allen: Will the Minister join me in saying that one of the most important functions of his Department is to ensure that all British citizens who are entitled to a vote receive a vote? Does he accept my criticism when I say that it is unacceptable that millions of our fellow citizens are not on the electoral register? Will he make a statement to the House in the near future about proper and adequate funding for electoral registration officers? In particular, will he make a statement about the disabled people who are currently unable to exercise their right to vote even when they have registered? Will he bring forward proposals to put an end to that disgrace?

Mr. Lloyd: All disabled people are entitled to vote. The important factor is that the law requiring local authorities to provide polling stations to which disabled people can gain access is not always applied. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that some local authorities face difficulties with that—he rubs his fingers to indicate that the problem is money. That is why we contribute 50 per cent. of the cost of providing special ramps and help for those people. As the hon. Gentleman knows, if an individual cannot get to a polling station becuase he is disabled, he has a postal vote.

Mr. Burns: Does my hon. Friend accept that the Government, through his Department, make available a great deal of money for advertising voter registration and making it easier for people to register to vote? Does he further accept that far too many people cannot be bothered to make use of those facilities to register their vote? In the past three years, some people have deliberately sought not to register to vote, in the hope that they will avoid having to pay community charge. For that reason, one should not get too upset at the crocodile tears shed by Opposition Members. If people cannot be bothered to register to vote, they get what is coming to them.

Mr. Lloyd: In the last analysis, it must be the individual's responsibility to get his name on the register. The Government have a responsibility to give good advice, assistance and support to electoral registration officers to ensure that those who want to get on to the register, do. We fulfil our responsibility and the study groups aim to ensure that we shall achieve even greater success in future. Electoral registration officers are more effective in the job, which rightly and primarily belongs to them.

Crime (Hampshire)

7. Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the increase in recorded crime in Hampshire since 1979.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Since 1979, recorded crime in Hampshire has increased at a rate of 6·6 per cent. a year, which is broadly in line with the rates of increase for England and Wales as a whole.

Mr. Denham: Is not the Minister aware that that means that crime in Hampshire has more than doubled since 1979, but police numbers have been increased by only 10 per cent? Is he aware that crime increased by 14 per cent. in the last year alone, that there were a dozen crimes involving firearms in Southampton over the Christmas period and that crack is now available in Southampton? In the light of that increase in crime, will the Minister explain to the House precisely how he came to decide, against the advice of the police and the police authority and against the demands of local people, that there should be no increase in police numbers in Hampshire next year? Why has the so-called party of law and order become the Government of criminal Britain?

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman sounds a long alarm. He failed to mention that Opposition Members have voted against every major piece of law and order legislation since 1979. In the year to last June, recorded crime in Southampton increased by 4 per cent., whereas in the previous year it increased by 22 per cent. In the current year, Hampshire police have received 67 more posts. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be asking the Hampshire force to get on with civilianisation so that more uniformed policemen can get out on the beat and combat crime in his constituency.

Mr. David Martin: I agree very much with what my hon. Friend has just said. I wish to raise with him the concern of residents, particularly in Southsea, about disturbances outside licensed premises. Will he co-operate with local authorities, the police force and all others concerned to make sure that, particularly with regard to licensed premises that open into the small hours of the morning, all possible back-up is given to efforts to do something about the problem?

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend is right to express concern about those matters. His concern is shared by the Hampshire force. As he may know, Hampshire police have introduced a clubwatch scheme to deal with violence in clubs and pubs for that very purpose.

Mr. Gunnell: The Minister will be aware that in Leeds yesterday magistrates imposed a——

Madam Speaker: Order. The question relates to crime in Hampshire. The hon. Gentleman must relate what he says to crime in Hampshire and not to Leeds, which I know is dear to his heart.

Mr. Gunnell: I will make the question applicable to all local authorities, Madam Speaker, and therefore to Hampshire.

Is the Minister aware that for the first time in this country a court has imposed a fine on a local authority social services department because of a crime committed by a young person in its care? Will the Minister explain whether——

Madam Speaker: Order. I fear that, although I have given the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to get his question in order, it does not appear that it is directly relevant. We shall have to move on.

Car Crime Prevention Year

8. Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces have developed special initiatives as part of Car Crime Prevention Year.

Mr. Jack: All 43 police forces in England and Wales have engaged in some form of activity in connection with Car Crime Prevention Year and I take this opportunity of congratulating them on their contribution to a campaign which in its first quarter has seen a 2·5 per cent. reduction in car crime.

Mrs. Currie: Is the Minister aware that last year Derbyshire showed the highest increase in car crime in the country and that certain industrial estates in my constituency have been used by car rings to process cars stolen from a wide area of the midlands? Will he nevertheless join me in praising the considerable efforts of the Derbyshire police force to tackle this problem, after years of delay and pressure from the local Labour-controlled Derbyshire county council intended to impede their operations, and encourage them to take whatever initiatives they can to counter the current crime wave in Derbyshire?

Mr. Jack: I thank my hon. Friend for her support for the efforts of the Derbyshire police to counter car crime. It is only fair to add that the figures show tremendous potential for further reductions and I hope that the Derbyshire police will contact, for example, those involved in Northumbria Partnership Against Car Theft, which has brought about a substantial reduction in the number of cars stolen and thefts from cars.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that in Leicestershire, as in most counties, the increase in car crime over the past few years has turned into a plague? In the light of that, the Government's refusal to allow the police any additional forces in any of the provinces is a shameful way in which to treat ordinary people in all our constituencies.

Mr. Jack: I am sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman is single-minded enough to think that police numbers provide the solution to car crime. The police would be the first to admit that it was through their partnership with motor manufacturers, motor traders, car owners and ordinary members of the public that a 2·5 per cent. reduction in car crime was delivered in the second quarter of last year. Let me correct the hon. and learned Gentleman: in this financial year alone, we are putting another 1,000 police officers into service.

Second-hand Cars (Security Devices)

9. Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to persuade dealers to fit security devices to second-hand cars.

Mr. Jack: Through the medium of my advisory committee on car crime, I am working closely with the Retail Motor Industry Federation and the Association of Chief Police Officers to encourage the wider adoption of schemes such as Essex Sold Secure and Northumbria Partnership Against Car Theft, which are specifically targeted at improving the security of second-hand cars.

Sir Anthony Grant: That is all very well, but the current level of car crime is a national scandal. Whoever is responsible—ram-raiders, or young idiots misery-riding —something must be done. The answer is to fit cars with immobilisers. A number of inexpensive models are available; I recommended one to the former Home Secretary, but nothing happened. I have one here—it is a very simple model.

Car dealers and manufacturers will do nothing until they are compelled to. It is up to the Home Office to put a stick behind them.

Mr. Jack: There is certainly nothing immobile about my hon. Friend's solution to the problem. When I visited the motor show this year, I was heartened to see that many more cars made by our leading manufacturers were already fitted with immobilisers and alarms as a standard precaution. After all, those cars will ultimately become second-hand cars. I hope that the methods of Northumbria Partnership Against Car Theft—which instructs the public about precautions such as that described by my hon. Friend—will be widely adopted. Such precautions have already contributed to the reduction in car crime.

Ms. Lynne: In the light of the Minister's reply to me on 4 December, will he inform us of the progress of the discussions with our European partners about fitting inbuilt security systems to new motor cars? Will he also include second-hand cars in the European directive, if that is possible?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Lady is right to draw attention to that aspect. Work is in progress, led by the Department of Transport, to try to encourage our European colleagues to adopt higher standards in connection with locks, alarms and immobilisers. Obviously, the progress that we make today in regard to new cars will affect the second-hand cars of tomorrow.

Voluntary Groups and Charities

10. Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to increase public participation in voluntary groups and charities.

Mr. Jack: The Home Office promotes voluntary activity by supporting bodies whose role is to encourage and extend the work of the voluntary sector to promote volunteering and to provide information, advice and support for other voluntary organisations.

Mr. Howarth: Does my hon. Friend agree that a great many people want to make a contribution to society through voluntary work? Has he any thoughts about the way in which the Government could play a part in establishing networks, neighbourhood by neighbourhood —probably on a fairly informal basis—to help people to find the most worthwhile and practical ways in which to make their personal contributions?

Mr. Jack: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his continuing interest in, and dedication to, the voluntary sector. He asked about local networks and volunteering; we are working with BBC Radio on a £250,000 programme to encourage more individuals to volunteer. We have given a pledge to develop the volunteer centres database more widely, to ensure that people can volunteer and can obtain the necessary information about volunteering. I assure my hon. Friend that that pledge will be high on my list of priorities.

Miss Lestor: While I support what the Minister and his hon. Friend said about involving more people in voluntary work, bearing in mind the disclosure today that a voluntary organisation registered as a charity was employing people who had been accused of offences against children, does not the Minister think that if he is to encourage this he should also vet people before they are allowed to take children away at weekends?

Mr. Jack: I have taken careful note of what the hon. Member says; her experience is considerable. She will know that the Charities Act 1992 does a great deal to strengthen the voluntary sector and the operation of charities and may make its own contribution to the point that she has raised. I will look into the specific case that she mentioned.

Sunday Trading

11. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what review he has made of the operation and enforcement of the Shops Act 1950 over the Sundays preceding Christmas 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None, Madam.

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister realise that what some large companies are doing by flagrantly breaking the law is attempting to increase their market share at the expense of those companies and small businesses which keep the law? Since the lawbreakers may carry on with the same cavalier attitude, whatever modifications of the law are agreed by the House, will the Minister and his colleagues start to put their weight behind enforcement of the law, now and in the future?

Mr. Lloyd: As the right hon. Gentleman very well knows, the law is extremely clear on one point, that the responsibility for its enforcement lies with local authorities. He has, however, been rather misleading in his introductory remarks. He knows, as does the whole House, that for many years many small shops have broken the law. It is in the recent past that the large shops have started to do so, which is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, in his statement a few weeks ago, made it clear that the Government intend to find a solution to this problem—something which eluded us some years ago when we sought to do so—by introducing a Bill that would enable the House to compare and choose between the major options for reform that are available. That should put behind a new law the authority that the current law so clearly lacks.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Wareing: Does the Prime Minister agree that although the action against Saddam Hussein was thoroughly justified, similar military action in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina could not be so justified? Will he give a categorical assurance that no British service man's life will be put at risk by fighting on one side or the other of that conflict, because such a conflict would lead to a general conflagration in the area? Should not the message from the House now be: remember Sarajevo, 1914?

The Prime Minister: The situation in Bosnia presents special difficulties and is quite different, as the hon. Gentleman said. He will know the action that we have taken: we have imposed an arms embargo, sanctions and a no-fly zone which has been made effective. Progress has been made in the peace talks in Geneva—not enough, but progress has been made—and we will take further measures if we have to. As the hon. Gentleman may know, European Community Foreign Ministers agreed yesterday to work on measures leading to Serbia's total diplomatic isolation. The European Community also agreed on the need for an international criminal court and will support that at the United Nations.

Q2. Mr. Pickles: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pickles: In his busy schedule today, does my right hon. Friend have any plans to commemorate the centenary of the foundation of the Independent Labour party? If so, what advice does he offer as the most appropriate way to mark this event?

The Prime Minister: I did not have it in mind to do so, but perhaps we might hold a wake.

Mr. John Smith: To return to the Prime Minister's actual responsibilities, does the right hon. Gentleman believe that it is right that taxpayers' money should be used to pay the legal fees incurred by a Minister in connection with his own private affairs?

The Prime Minister: It is uncharacteristic of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to deal in innuendo. The matter to which he refers has been dealt with by Sir John Bourn, an independent report has been commissioned and the answer is quite clear: no impropriety occurred.

Mr. Smith: Does not the Prime Minister even understand the distinction between a public duty and a private concern? In this case, is not it clear that the Chancellor instructed solicitors because of his decision to rent his own property to a tenant for his own profit? Is not it clear from the report to which the Prime Minister refers that the Chancellor instructed solicitors without referring the matter to a Government legal adviser? If property was involved, should not the Chancellor be asked to repay the money now?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may wish to reflect on and withdraw those remarks. It is uncharacteristically cheap of him to have raised the matter in this fashion. The report fully exonerates the Treasury on the central questions: was it right to make the payment and were any rules breached? Sir John Bourn, who carried out the inquiry, has no criticism on either point. He also confirms that the Chancellor did not ask for assistance and makes no criticism of my right hon. Friend's actions.

Mr. Smith: Does the Prime Minister understand that it is a matter not of innuendo but of public policy on whether taxpayers' money should be used to finance the private legal affairs of a Minister? If the Prime Minister is resting on the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General, which has not yet been considered by the Public Accounts Committee, will he explain why, as is clear from the report, the whole matter was concealed under a heading called "Expenditure . . . on economic, financial and related administration", which included the expenses of pay review bodies and the cost of the BCCI inquiry? Was not there an attempt to hide this matter from the public and from scrutiny here?

The Prime Minister rose——

Hon. Members: Answer!

Madam Speaker: Order. It is pointless the House shouting "answer"; the Prime Minister is at the Dispatch Box doing just that.

The Prime Minister: It says a great deal about the Leader of the Opposition that, the day after our service men have been in action in Iraq and when we have troops in Bosnia, he has raised this matter in the House. I repeat, as he sits smiling smugly, that the Chancellor did not receive assistance. The Treasury broke no accounting rules and in the absence of the rules it was appropriate that judgment should be exercised by two accounting officers. That has been independently examined. There is no criticism of that judgment and if he had a shred of self-respect the right hon. and learned Gentleman would withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Aim Aviation of Bournemouth, which has been so successful in winning export orders in the United States, the far east and Europe that it has had to acquire a new factory at Wallisdown in my constituency? Will he join me in wishing it every success in seeking new orders, which it undoubtedly will be able to do under the policies of the Government?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to do that and I am delighted to hear of this export success. There is no doubt that our exports have been on a rising trend. Equally, there is no doubt that we have the right economic fundamentals to encourage exporting in the future.

Mr. Boyce: What a load of nonsense.

The Prime Minister: It is vital that we do so for our jobs and prosperity. We understand that, even if the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Boyce) understands nothing.

Q3. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livingstone: Does the Prime Minister accept that the vigour with which the Government have ensured that Iraq complies with the United Nations resolutions is not repeated when ensuring that other nations such as India comply with United Nations resolutions on Kashmir or China with United Nations resolutions on Tibet? Is he aware that, to many people in the world, it seems that we pursue United Nations resolutions wth vigour only when they refer to endangered western oil interests?

The Prime Minister: I think the hon. Gentleman knows better than that. This country has a better record of supporting United Nations resolutions than almost any country that he can name.

In the case of the difficulties with Iraq, there was a clear violation and invasion of a neighbouring country and an attempt to capture both that neighbouring country and probably to move on further down the Gulf. Recently there have been deliberate attempts of genocide both in the north and south of Iraq. The whole of the hon. Gentleman's background suggests that he should be supporting the Government in preventing that genocide.

Mr. Bill Walker: My right hon. Friend will be aware that the Cabinet will shortly be looking at proposals for the future of the naval dockyards. He will be aware of the political sensitivity that applies to both naval dockyards. Will he assure me and the House that the decision, when made, will be based upon equal opportunities for both dockyards and that we will be comparing apples with apples so that there is no question of saying afterwards that the decision was arrived at other than properly and honourably?

The Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend that every relevant factor will be taken into account.

Q4. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jones: Will the Prime Minister find time today to pass on the condolences of everyone in the House to the family and friends of my constituent, Lance Corporal Edwards, who was killed yesterday bravely delivering aid to Bosnia? Will the Prime Minister tell the House what measures he will be taking to ensure that the troops performing this dangerous role have the firepower and intelligence back-up to prevent further casualties?

The Prime Minister: The whole House will agree with what the hon. Gentleman had to say about his constituent. He was a very brave man and there is no doubt that he gave his life to save the lives of many other people who would have died, but for actions of Lance Corporal Edwards and those of his colleagues.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will be making a statement after questions which will be directly germane to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Q5. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Martin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that since he visited St. Mary's hospital in Portsmouth, it, with Queen Alexandra's, has been approved for trust status? Remembering all the virulent criticisms levelled at trust hospitals by the Opposition parties, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether he has seen the reports in today's papers that even the official Front-Bench spokesman of the Labour party now sees the sense in our reforms? Is there joy in Downing street over one sinner that repenteth?

The Prime Minister: There is hardly likely to be joy over that particular sinner. But I can certainly confirm to my hon. Friend that I have seen the report. The fact is that the Labour party has no agenda of its own. Conservatism has won the arguments on health and will continue to win them. I well remember what the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said:

"I give this historic pledge that the hospital that serves my constituents will opt out over my dead body."

I hope that the hon. Member does not live to regret that pledge. No doubt if he is ill his local trust hospital will treat him.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Prime Minister find time today to consider the representations that have been made over a number of months by disablement organisations about the need for anti-discrimination legislation? As he once had ministerial responsibility for disabled people and bearing in mind the fact that a Bill has passed through the House of Lords, will the Prime Minister find time for such legislation to go on the statute book in this parliamentary year?

The Prime Minister: This is a technical and difficult matter, as the hon. Gentleman knows as well as anyone in the House, but I will look at the points he raised and discuss them with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Worcester

Q6. Mr. Luff: To ask the Prime Minister when he next plans to pay an official visit to Worcester.

The Prime Minister: I am at present making plans for a series of visits to all parts of the country and I hope to include Worcester among them.

Mr. Luff: Is my right hon. Friend aware that if he were to visit Worcester, he would encounter very great admiration for the skills and bravery of our armed forces, both in Bosnia and the Gulf? Is he also aware that he would encounter great local anger at the inability of the Labour-controlled local council to live within its means and at its failed gamble that it would be bailed out by an incoming Labour Government, as a result of which it is resorting to desperate measures to balance the books, including the sale of much-loved public open spaces?

The Prime Minister: I believe that a number of people may well have gambled on a Labour victory at the last election. I am bound to say that it was always likely to be a poor bet. I quite understand the way my hon. Friend feels about the Labour council in Worcester—many people around the country feel the same about other Labour councils. It is the charge payers of Worcester who will have to pick up the bill for the Labour council's actions and I hope that they will remember that when the local council elections come along.

Engagements

Q7. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Vaz: The Prime Minister may recall that on 14 March 1991 I met him to discuss the case of my constituent, John Hall, who was dying of leukaemia, an illness which he contracted while serving on Christmas island. He also knows that John Hall subsequently died on 3 June last year in the royal infirmary in Leicester. The House rightly honours those who serve this country. Will the Prime Minister join me and others in honouring the memory and selfless devotion of the British nuclear test veterans and pay them and their families the compensation which they so richly deserve?

The Prime Minister: I certainly join the hon. Gentleman in honouring all our veterans, whether those veterans or others. He will know that the question of compensation and whether it is due for the reasons he set out is being examined at this moment.

Bosnia (Further Deployment)

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, I should like to make a statement on Bosnia.

On 15 September I announced that we would be participating in the United Nations operation to deliver humanitarian aid in Bosnia. To do this we sent to Bosnia a battalion group consisting of some 2,500 troops. Since November, they have been involved in escorting relief convoys bringing food, shelter and other essentials to Bosnian communities. I am pleased to say that this operation has succeeded in its aims. Our forces have been directly responsible for escorting some 147 convoys which have delivered 11,775 tonnes of aid. It is no exaggeration to say that there are many people in Bosnia today who owe their very survival to the presence of British and other United Nations forces.

At the time of the announcement of this deployment, I made it clear that our paramount concern was for the safety of British troops. This, of course, is still the case. The last few days have seen an increase in the number and seriousness of attacks on our forces. In particular, there has been the shelling of our base at Tomislavgrad, and then the killing of Lance Corporal Edwards in Gornji Vakuf yesterday. A few moments ago the whole House expressed its sorrow at this tragic loss of life, and we wish to pass on our condolences to his family. He was a brave man on a humanitarian mission who gave his life trying to help others.

In order to enhance the safety of our troops, I am authorising the deployment of additional forces to the region. These additional forces will be available, should the need arise, to reinforce our contingent in Bosnia at very short notice. They will be available to provide additional protection to British forces while they are involved in humanitarian operations. They will also be available to cover a withdrawal of British forces if that should become necessary. We are determined not to be in a position where we are unable to respond immediately to a significant deterioration in the situation.

My proposals are as follows. We shall immediately be sending a small number of extra specialist troops to join our contingent in Bosnia. They will include logistics experts and others who will make arrangements for the arrival of a larger force, if that should prove necessary.

At the same time, as a contingency, we shall be deploying to the Adriatic HMS Ark Royal, with a carrier air group consisting of Sea Harriers and Sea King helicopters, accompanied by two frigates and three support ships. A number of other units will be deployed on the carrier group: a light gun battery, a locating battery and a mortar-locating troop, with support. HMS Ark Royal and accompanying ships will be ready to deploy on Sunday and will take up station in the Adriatic. I should emphasise that there are at present no plans to deploy any of the units embarked to Bosnia itself, but we wish to be in a position to do so immediately should the need arise. We shall also be making arrangements for the possible move to the area of other units at short notice.

None of this marks any change in our policy in the area. The forces that I have described will be used to increase the protection we provide for our existing battle group as it carries out its humanitarian role. We believe that the provision of artillery in particular will enable us to respond to attacks of the kind that we faced at Tomislavgrad. We remain committed to sustaining our participation in the United Nations humanitarian effort if at all possible. These forces will not be used to intervene in the fighting between rival factions in the former Yugoslavia. Our position remains that it is not appropriate to intervene in what is essentially a civil war. Our overriding concern, as always, is to ensure the safety of our forces.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The appalling pictures that we see nightly on our television screens have served to shake many of our fellow citizens. Many of us find it difficult to appreciate how neighbours who have lived amicably side by side for 45 years can now behave like animals towards one another. The Secretary of State is absolutely correct in reminding us that we are indeed witnessing a civil war.

For this reason we were gratified when in September the Government announced in the House their proposal, which the Opposition had advocated, to detach a group of British soldiers to protect the United Nations convoys carrying humanitarian aid to the stricken people in Bosnia. I am glad to have the assurance of the Secretary of State today that the sole purpose of our troops deployed in Bosnia is to provide that humanitarian aid. In that sense, we welcome the statement.

We have argued consistently that our soldiers should have all the necessary armour and the correct rules of engagement to protect themselves. Am I right in assuming that that is precisely what the Secretary of State has announced today? If so, we welcome what he has said.

Yesterday's tragic death of Lance Corporal Edwards brought home to us all the extreme and ultimate dangers involved. I can say unreservedly that we in the Opposition express our deep sympathy to the family and friends of Lance Corporal Edwards. We associate ourselves completely with what the Secretary of State has just said about that young man's valour and effort in bringing succour to those in need in Bosnia.

That tragic incident serves to remind us that our soldiers face dangers from all sides. Can the Secretary of State confirm that the area in which the incident took place is one in which there was fighting between Croats and Muslims? With a view to pointing up the dangers that our soldiers face, can he further confirm the preliminary assessment that the point at which the incident took place was outside the range of Serbian soldiers? Will the Secretary of State confirm also that in Bosnia there are approximately 70,000 Serbian fighters, a similar number of Muslim fighters and 50,000 Croats and that, tragically, all these are potential enemies of United Nations soldiers, who are there trying to assist the civilian population?

Given the reinforcements announced today, can we now be satisfied that there is sufficient helicopter support for our troops on the ground? Why are there no amphibious landing vessels? Is it true that neither HMS Fearless nor HMS Intrepid is seaworthy and, if so, why?

In the middle of his statement the Secretary of State indicated thaat an advance group of specialist troops is to be sent to "make arrangements . . . for a larger force". That suggests a change in the role of British troops. Is that contingency or strategy?

If we are to deploy extra troops, will other countries do likewise? Has the United States said that it will supply troops? Will any of the conscript armies of our neighbours be sent to Bosnia? There is a strong feeling that the British cannot themselves provide sufficient soldiers to do the job. It would be helpful if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would give more information on those points.

There is a feeling that we may be drifting inevitably towards a war which could last many years, and there does not seem to be a clear political objective. It all serves to remind us, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman did today—the message was clear from his statement—that a great deal hangs on the efforts of Lord Owen and Cyrus Vance and their peace proposals. We hope and pray that those proposals can be accepted and endorsed and that Karadic will be able to persuade his Parliament to endorse them so that, slowly, some normality can return to the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for the welcome that he has given to our proposals. He is correct to assume that the purpose of the extra forces is to protect existing British forces in Bosnia-Herzogovina.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the tragic circumstances surrounding the killing yesterday of Lance Corporal Edwards. It took place in Gornji Vakuf, and he is right to say that it arose out of conflict between Croatians and Muslims in that town. There had been tension of that kind for some days. There is no significant Serbian presence in the vicinity. It is believed that the Serbians brought a mortar close to Gornji Vakuf a few days ago, but that was not involved in the incident yesterday which led to Lance Corporal Edwards' death.

The numbers that the hon. Gentleman gave of Serbian, Croatian and Muslim forces in Bosnia-Herzogovina are broadly correct, although obviously they are estimates, and comparable with the figures on which we work.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the use of helicopters. At present, Sea King helicopters are available for casualty evacuation, should that be required. They are based at Split, but could be used if necessary. The proposals that I have announced today would involve a significant number of additional Sea King helicopters on Ark Royal, when that is available in the Adriatic.

The hon. Gentleman asked about amphibious forces. We do not believe that such forces are necessary because, as he will be well aware, Bosnia does not have a coastline and Croatia is co-operating with any deployment that we require to Bosnia. So the need for amphibious forces is not relevant.

I can confirm that no change of role is proposed for the use of British forces in Bosnia. I said that explicitly in my original remarks, and I am happy to repeat it.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for repeating the assurance that our troops in Bosnia will be used only for the purpose of distributing humanitarian aid. Will he accept that that cannot safely be done if it needs to be supported by air strikes and field artillery? I must tell him, though it grieves me to do so, that if the Cabinet commits further troops for use in Bosnia it will not have the support of many hon. Members on this side of the House.

Mr. Rifkind: There is no suggestion on the part of the Government that it would be appropriate or sensible to contemplate a humanitarian operation which could take place only through the use of air strikes. That is not part of our thinking; nor is it part of the thinking of the United Nations.

We must envisage the possibility either that at some stage it will be necessary to withdraw our forces, in which case air cover and its early availability would be of considerable benefit, or that an individual incident might arise during the course of the activities of a convoy which could benefit from the early availability of artillery or air support. But I entirely endorse my hon. Friend's view that if it became clear that convoys could proceed only with the constant use of such forces, that would be totally incompatible with the purposes of the United Nations exercise. I am sure that the whole United Nations operation, and not just the British operation, would come to an end in such circumstances.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I join the Secretary of State in expressing sympathy to the family of Lance Corporal Edwards.

Is it not an inescapable conclusion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's announcement today about reinforcements that, if they are necessary for the protection of our troops now, they were necessary for their protection from the very beginning? Does he agree that, although the primary purpose of the deployments that he has announced is defensive, Bosnian Serbs considering whether to accept the current proposals for a peace settlement would do well to appreciate that those additional military resources can easily be put to other purposes including—if necessary, and at the request of the United Nations—the protection of the Muslim community in Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: With regard to the first part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's question, clearly he did not listen as carefully as usual to what I said. I made it clear that we are not deploying the forces into Bosnia at present. They will be available for use if required. We hope that they will not be required and will remain as assets on Ark Royal.

On the second part of the question, it is important to ensure that the purpose of the continuing presence of British forces in Bosnia is to play a humanitarian role. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to suggest that he might have sympathy with a substantial extension of the role of British forces, but I believe that any significant extension in the use of ground forces would be fraught with danger. It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to draw a fine line limiting the kind of involvement that we might then wish to contemplate. Ground forces are there for humanitarian purposes. That is clearly understood and easy to define. To go beyond that category would be to go into difficult waters indeed.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): May I tell my right hon. and learned Friend that when I first visited Vietnam there were 600 American advisers in that country, but that when I visited Vietnam for the second time there were 500,000 American troops there? It has seemed certain to me from the moment that the Cheshire Regiment was sent to Bosnia that it would have to be either reinforced or withdrawn. I would strongly oppose any significant increase in the number of British troops on the ground, as would many of my hon. Friends, so I hope that if the present battalion is not safe with its present support my right hon. and learned Friend will give serious consideration to withdrawing it altogether at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Rifkind: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns, and I think that I can reassure him by saying that today's announcement will mean that about 89 additional personnel will go into Bosnia. Those are the only people who will enter the former Yugoslavia. An additional 300 or so Army personnel will be based on Ark Royal but, as I have said, they will not be deployed in the former Yugoslavia unless they are required either to help supervise a withdrawal of our force or to enhance the safety of our existing force carrying out its existing responsibilities.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Does the Secretary of State realise that many of us feel that his statement is most alarming and shows clearly what we had predicted—that the Government are slowly being sucked into the middle of a civil war? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that many of us are totally opposed to further involvement of British troops on the ground in Bosnia, and that we decry the fact that he is holding two options open—one to support humanitarian efforts and the other to become further involved on the ground? Does he understand that we fully support the humanitarian effort, but that those on the ground involved in what he has described as a civil war perceive the British troops as representatives of a nation which is taking sides in the political argument in Bosnia? That puts our troops at a disadvantage.

Mr. Rifkind: I note what the right hon. Gentleman says, but he should follow the consequences of his own reasoning. He informed the House that he fully supports the humanitarian efforts of our forces. If that is so, he will agree that it is crucial to protect the soldiers carrying out those responsibilities. My statement today was intended solely to enhance the safety of those personnel, so I believe that the right hon. Gentleman should support the proposals that I have announced.

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves (Birmingham, Hall Green): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that, although many of my right hon. and hon. Friends welcome his explanation that the measures are designed to afford further protection to our troops on the ground involved in the difficult humanitarian work, we might take alarm at his remark that those efforts should continue "if at all possible". We hope to have an assurance from him that "if at all possible" will not become "at all costs".

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the point that my hon. Friend has just made. We believe that the humanitarian operation that the United Nations are carrying out is a worthwhile exercise. It is not simply the British forces but also the French, the Canadian and the Spanish as well as a number of other countries.

It is worth remembering that, so far, the humanitarian operation has succeeded in its objective of getting large amounts of aid to many tens of thousands of men, women and children who have been literally starving over the winter months. Clearly, it is desirable that the project should continue, but not "at all costs".

The criterion that we must apply is the level of risk to those who have been entrusted with responsibility for assisting the convoys. If we or, indeed, the United Nations came to the judgment, it is clear that the operation would cease. That would be right and proper.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I welcome the additional equipment being provided to the British forces in Bosnia, especially the mortar-locating equipment. Is the Secretary of State aware that when I asked a question on the subject in December 1992 the Minister of State replied that mortar-locating equipment would be of negligible utility in Bosnia because of the terrain? What has changed since December? Does that not indicate a lack of Government planning?

Mr. Rifkind: Mortars have been available to our forces in Bosnia since they were first deployed in November. At present we are examining the number of ways in which we can provide increased security on a contingent basis. It may turn out that that particular facility, like some of the others to which I have referred, may not be necessary. However, we think that it is wiser to have mortars available to be used if required rather than to accept a substantial lapse of time before they can be brought from, for example, the United Kingdom or Germany to Bosnia if they suddenly became useful. It is a useful precaution in the circumstances.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that in today's circumstances it is essential for our forces to be supported by the additional back-up if they are to continue to succeed in their humanitarian effort? In the event of the necessity to withdraw our forces, can he confirm that that can be achieved only if there are adequate supporting services to cover their withdrawal in difficult circumstances, with all the armoured vehicles?

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend is entirely correct. We must envisage that that may become a requirement and that we shall have a duty to ensure within the shortest possible time the successful evacuation not only of all our personnel but of the substantial amounts of equipment available to them in Bosnia. That would be a complicated operation on any basis. It is therefore useful to have available in the Adriatic facilities of the sort which would make the task considerably easier. The fact that such facilities are available at such short notice is a continued boost of confidence for those carrying out the tasks on our behalf.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement leaves some sense of confusion in the House because we have had many assurances of caution and the repetition of humanitarian objectives? However, the commitment to further forces with an uncertain objective of either protecting or withdrawing leaves the House in some doubt as to the Government's objectives.

As the civil war in the former Yugoslavia has a history going back hundreds of years to the Turkish, Austro-Hungarian and Nazi occupations, and the murder of the Serbs by the Ustashi during the war, the fear being expressed is a proper fear not only for the safety of British troops, which is a prime concern of the House, but that what could follow from the further commitment to forces is an extension of the fighting and the reverse of humanitarian objectives—namely, that more people will be killed. In the circumstances, would it not be right for the Government to make a clearer statement of their objectives and let us debate and decide whether the House would wish to follow them?

Mr. Rifkind: I am sure that there is benefit in having as wide as possible a debate about the overall objectives of not only British but international and United Nations policy on former Yugoslavia. The Government's objectives for the use of our ground forces are clear and could hardly be clearer: they are to assist in the provision of humanitarian aid and to do so for as long as that aid is required, unless there is an unacceptable level of risk to the safety of the forces in question. That is a clear objective. We have made it abundantly clear—indeed, as clear as possible—that if that level of risk became unacceptably high, or if the humanitarian operation was discontinued, we would have to withdraw our forces in an orderly and safe fashion. We hope that that will not prove necessary for as long as the humanitarian exercise can bring much-needed relief to many hundreds of thousands of people.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that Bosnia is an internationally recognised independent state and that to call the conflict a civil war is a gross and distorting over-simplification? Does he accept that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others, who have condemned the Serbian aggression, which amounts to genocide—200,000 people have been killed to date—have fairly and firmly pointed out where the blame lies? Will he confirm, as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary did in the House yesterday, that if—as we all hope and pray—the Geneva settlement leads to peace, it will be, as my right hon. Friend promised us, an internationally guaranteed peace? Will he confirm that our troops will be able to play a part in, for example, ensuring that all heavy weaponry is taken away from all sides so that Bosnia can become a peaceful, demilitarised country, as its Foreign Minister made plain to Members of Parliament that he wanted when he came here yesterday?

Mr. Rifkind: The Government are clear that the Government in Belgrade bear a significant and heavy responsibility. That is why we fully support the actions of the United Nations in imposing economic sanctions and other measures with respect to that Government. However, we are also conscious that the fighting within Bosnia is, sadly, being carried out by Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims. It is in that sense that I refer to the conflict as having many of the characteristics of a civil war.

We naturally hope that the present diplomatic efforts will lead to a successful resolution of some of the problems. If they do, and if there is a proper and effective ceasefire in Bosnia, clearly the United Nations will wish to give thought to what contribution it can make towards helping with that ceasefire. But clearly that is something for the future. At this stage we must hope that a ceasefire comes into existence. Until now that objective has not been realised.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Do Ministers recollect the dire warnings of Julian Amery and others that the deterrent to Stalin's armies devised by Tito was the training of whole generations in guerrilla warfare? These are extremely tough, determined and skilled people. In those circumstances, what is meant exactly by "risk unacceptably high"? It seems to some of us that we withdraw only in circumstances where it becomes too rough for us. May I ask the rather nasty question whether it will be as easy to get out as it has been from the north of Ireland?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's last point was an invalid comparison. Northern Ireland is a part of the United Kingdom. We have a responsibility to give protection and assistance to a part of our own territory and to our own citizens for as long as that is required. There is no comparable obligation with regard to our presence in Bosnia or, indeed, any other country around the world.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's assessment of the ability of the inhabitants of Bosnia of all backgrounds to indulge in guerrilla war. We are conscious that these are tough people who have a strong tradition of fighting skills. That is clearly a factor that we must all take into account. It is the view of the United Nations, and a view with which we agree, that countries such as ours have an obligation to give humanitarian aid so long as that can be done without unacceptable risk to our forces. I accept that it is difficult to define that term with the precision that we might all like. We have seen since our forces first entered Bosnia that, fortunately—until the tragic events of yesterday—our troops were able to carry out their responsibilities without undue consequences. That was to be welcomed, but it is possible that it may be changing. We hope that it will not, but it is precisely because it could be changing that it is helpful and sensible to have additional forces available in the Adriatic if they should be required for the purposes that I have described.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): In accepting my right hon. and learned Friend's assurances today, and on many occasions in the House, that it is not the Government's intention to alter the role of British forces in Bosnia, and while I understand that it is only prudent that they should have back-up facilities to enable them to make an orderly and safe withdrawal should the situation deteriorate, may I ask him to say a little more about the 90 or so troops with special qualifications who are to be landed in Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: The 89 personnel that we are proposing to deploy in Bosnia during the next few days consist of liaison officers, logisticians, tactical forward air controllers and some personnel who will be involved with observation responsibilities. There are a number of troops with responsibilities of that kind. Although they add up to a relatively small number, they will be able to supplement the existing personnel if future action of the type that I have described should be required.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): To what extent will the extension of our activities in Bosnia be under the United Nations command structure and in conformity with United Nations resolutions? To the extent that that is so, will those activities not be different from the activities in Iraq which were described last night?

Mr. Rifkind: The bulk of the people that we are sending to the area will be deployed on Ark Royal in international waters and, for the time being, will remain under purely

[Mr. Rifkind]

British command and control. Naturally, it will be desirable for the situation regarding any troops within Bosnia to be regularised in the normal way, but, as I said earlier, we hope that it will not be necessary to deploy additional personnel in significant numbers to Bosnia. So long as they are on Ark Royal, it is appropriate for them to remain entirely under British command.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the majority of people will agree with his view that, however horrific the circumstances on the ground, we should not be drawn into someone else's civil war? Is he aware, however, that since the end of last summer the Western European Union has strongly advocated an effective embargo and blockade of the participants in this ghastly affair? Does he not think that that is one of the avenues that we might explore further in an endeavour to achieve peace?

Mr. Rifkind: We are prepared to consider all constructive suggestions and I am aware of the important contribution that my hon. Friend has made, through WEU, to discussions on the issues. This is an ongoing situation and any constructive proposals are well worth examining.

Mr. Ieun Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): On behalf of my party, I express our sympathy for the family of the young Welsh soldier who was killed delivering humanitarian aid to Bosnia. We welcome any steps taken to protect troops who deliver that aid. May I challenge the Secretary of State, as he was challenged from his own side, about his definition of the conflict as a "civil war"? Does he not recognise that the conflict is clearly part of a campaign for the creation of a greater Serbia, part of a plan which started with the annexation of land in Croatia, and that unless it is stopped in Bosnia it may well escalate to Kosovo? When will the United Kingdom accept that there is international concern about this? Is it not time that the United Nations recognised that concern by taking steps to prevent escalation of the conflict, should the peace process falter?

Mr. Rifkind: The conflict has some of the characteristics to which the hon. Gentleman referred—I do not dispute that fact for one moment—but I think that he would be equally willing to accept that the Croatians have been seeking to control as much territory as possible in Bosnia—including territory which would not normally come under their control—and I have no doubt that the Bosnian Muslims, given the opportiunity, would also be seeking to do so. I have therefore said—it is a reasonable comment to make—that the conflict in Bosnia has many of the characteristics of a civil war, although I accept that that is not the end of the story. There is substantial external involvement and the Government have made it clear that they believe that the primary external responsibility must lie with the Government in Belgrade.

Mr. David Faber (Westbury): I, too, welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's reiteration that there will be no change in the role of our troops in Bosnia and, furthermore, that we shall continue to do all that we can to be perceived as utterly neutral to all sides of the conflict in what is undoubtedly a civil war. Can my right hon. and learned Friend comment on the efficiency of the British troops on the ground at present, especially those in and around Vitez? Is he happy that they face none of the internal logistic and administrative problems that so plague the UNPROFOR troops in and around Sarajevo?

Mr. Rifkind: The efficiency of our forces is of a high order. At a much earlier stage in consideration of those matters we were concerned about the command and control arrangements envisaged by the United Nations for the operation in Bosnia. Subsequently, however, the present headquarters were set up with General Morillon as their commander and Brigadier Cordy-Simpson from the United Kingdom as the second in command. That has led to a much more efficient operation and I believe that the British forces and the command and control structures under which they operate are now working effectively.

Press Self-Regulation (Review)

4.5 pm

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Peter Brooke): With permission, I should like to make a statement about press regulation and privacy.

On 9 July last year, my predecessor as Secretary of State for National Heritage, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), announced that he had invited Sir David Calcutt QC, the master of Magdalene college, Cambridge, to undertake an assessment of the effectiveness of press self-regulation under the Press Complaints Commission and to give his views on whether the present arrangments for self-regulation should be modified or put on a statutory basis. Sir David was also asked to consider whether further measures might be needed to deal with intrusions into personal privacy by the press.

I have received Sir David's review and am publishing it today. A final response must await the debate that the House will have on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), and the report of the Select Committee on National Heritage. But the House will wish to have a clear statement of the Government's initial response.

Sir David's overall conclusion is that press self-regulation under the Press Complaints Commission has not been effective and that the press would not now be willing to make the changes that would be needed to make the commission the truly independent body, commanding the confidence of the public as well as the press, that it should be. He therefore recommends that the Government should now introduce a statutory complaints tribunal on the model of that described in the 1990 report of the committee on privacy and related matters—the so-called privacy committee, which Sir David chaired. The tribunal would have wide-ranging powers, including the power to restrain publication of material in breach of its code of practice and the ability to require the printing of apologies, corrections and replies, to award compensation, impose fines and award costs.

As regards intrusions into personal privacy by the press, Sir David makes five further recommendations. The first and most significant recommendation is that the three criminal offences proposed by the privacy committee to deal with specific forms of physical intrusion should, with modifications, now be enacted, together with a civil remedy designed among other things to enable action to be taken to restrain publication. Hon. Members will recall that the offences were designed to cover the obtaining of personal information, with a view to publication, through intrusion on private property, the use of surveillance devices, photographs and recordings. A range of defences would be available, including a new one that the act was done for the purpose of informing the public about matters directly affecting the discharge of any public function of the individual concerned.

Sir David does not recommend the immediate introduction of a tort of infringement of privacy, but he does recommend that the Government should give further consideration to its introduction.

Sir David's other recommendations in relation to privacy are that further consideration should be given by the Government to the extent to which the Data Protection Act 1984 may contain provisions which are relevant for the purpose of misrepresentation or intrusion into personal privacy by the press; the Government should give effect to the remainder of the reporting restrictions proposed by the privacy committee; the Government should give further consideration to the law relating to the interception of telecommunications with a view to identifying all significant gaps—relating to the protection of private telephone conversations—and to determining whether any further legislation is needed.

The Government are most grateful to Sir David for the careful and thorough review that he has produced of what is an exceptionally difficult and controversial subject. We welcome the review as significantly moving forward the public debate on the future of press self-regulation and on the wider question of safeguarding personal privacy.

I shall deal first with Sir David's recommendations concerning privacy. The Government accept the case for new criminal offences to deal with specified types of physical intrusion and covert surveillance. Measures on those lines are now necessary to signal society's strong condemnation of such behaviour and to deter similar instances in future. Subject to further examination of the details of the proposed offences, and to consultations with practitioners in criminal justice and civil law, the Government will bring forward legislation in due course to give effect to the proposals in England and Wales. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will consider whether corresponding changes need to be made to Scots law, given the wider scope of the common law of Scotland.

The Government also accept Sir David's recommendation that further consideration should be given to the introduction of a new tort of infringement of privacy. We recognise, as Sir David does, that that cannot sensibly be confined to the press, and will have to take full account of a wide range of human and technological activity. We also accept the need to examine the extent to which the Data Protection Act may contain provisions that are relevant for purposes of misrepresentation or intrusion into personal privacy by the press. We will, in addition, give further consideration to the legislation on the non-identification of minors and others and to the legislation covering interception of telecommunications, as recommended by Sir David.

I turn now to Sir David's recommendation that the Government should introduce a statutory regime for dealing with complaints against the press. That raises separate, and more difficult, issues which need to be carefully weighed. The Government agree with Sir David that the Press Complaints Commission, as at present constituted, is not an effective regulator of the press. It is not truly independent and its procedures are deficient. Sir David's detailed analysis of those shortcomings is compelling. We also recognise the strength of the case that he makes in his report for a statutory tribunal with wide-ranging powers. At the same time, we are conscious that action to make such a body statutory would be a step of some constitutional significance, departing from the traditional approach to press regulation in this country. In the light of those considerations, the Government would be extremely reluctant to pursue that route. A most persuasive case for statutory regulation would need to be made out.

In coming to a final view, we shall want to take account of the debate surrounding the private Member's Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Hammersmith on freedom and responsibility of the press, which is down for Second Reading on 29 January. On the basis of my statement today, the Government will advise the House that, although we have not announced our final conclusions regarding a statutory regime, we cannot support the Bill.

The Government will also take account of the inquiry into privacy and media intrusion which the Select Committee on National Heritage has set in train, the report of which is, I believe, expected in February. We shall look forward to receiving the report as a further significant contribution to the public debate on those issues. We shall also wish to take into account any response that the press might make to Sir David's detailed criticisms of the Press Complaints Commission. We shall thereafter announce our conclusions.

In the Government's view, for the reasons cogently set out by Sir David Calcutt, self-regulation under the Press Complaints Commission, as at present constituted, is not satisfactory. The Government accept the case for reform. I have announced a number of major steps to tackle the issue of privacy, and, in the light of what I have said about statutory regulation, we invite further public debate on the nature of the reform that needs to be undertaken.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): We are pleased that the Government have decided to bring forward the report's publication, although we have grave reservations about a number of its recommendations. The extent of rumour and speculation about its contents during the past few days have served to confuse, not clarify, the debate. Indeed, the report has to be considered against a background of establishment intrigue involving the royal family and their advisers, Ministers, press barons and Lord McGregor, the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission, who have all made fools of themselves and each other. As some of the Ministers' colleagues are involved, will he give us his views on this, since he appears to be somewhat reluctant to refer to it?

The Opposition agree with a number of things that were said in both the report and the Minister's statement about the way in which some sections of the press have conducted themselves in the past few years. The excesses of journalism, especially the callous exploitation of private grief, bring the whole journalistic profession into disrepute. I am sure that no one on either side of the House would wish to condone such excesses, which have little to do with legitimate investigative journalism.

The report in many respects misses the central issues involved in questions of press freedom. It says nothing about access to public information through the introduction of a freedom of information Act. Nor does it say anything about a right of reply for citizens whose lives are wrecked through the publication of gross inaccuracies about their private lives or their business affairs.

The report also has nothing to say about the concentration of press ownership in so few hands. Can the Minister assure the House today that any Government legislation in regard to Calcutt will include proposals for a freedom of information Act and for a right of reply for ordinary citizens to correct factual errors about themselves in the press? What does the Minister intend to do about the concentration of press ownership? Is he prepared to tell us today that he will refer it to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

I note that the Minister said that he will not support the Bill that is to be introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). Does he recognise that his announcement throws grave doubts on the concerns that he has expressed today about the rights of the individual and the need for reform?

Calcutt's recommendation of a statutory tribunal with legal powers to fine offending newspapers and to dictate official versions of the truth for them to publish is clearly not the answer. The press will not be improved by censors appointed by the Government. In no circumstances will the Labour party support legislation that prevents proper scrutiny of the lives of the rich and powerful, including public figures such as politicians, business tycoons and members of the royal family.

The second main area covered in the Calcutt report concerns the enactment of three new criminal offences in England and Wales to prevent invasions of privacy. We are sympathetic to the view that the ordinary citizen should be protected against the more grotesque invasions of privacy. The report has come down hard on the practices of electronic bugging and using long-lens cameras. We will want, however, to study in greater detail the specific privacy measures recommended in the report.

Finally, the central failing of the Calcutt report, in our view, is its attempt to deal with matters of press regulation in isolation from broader questions of press freedom. The Labour party believes that not only the Government but the press, which responds to any attempt to change the law with hysteria, have a lot more thinking to do on this complex issue.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for the welcome that she gave the report's publication. She made a passing and oblique reference to colleagues of mine in the Government. Her language was somewhat delphic. Let me simply say that the events to which I think she referred —as I have said, her language was opaque—occurred before Sir David was invited to conduct the report. He was invited to conduct it in a manner that had been strongly foreshadowed at the beginning of the 18 months of self-regulation.

The hon. Lady was good enough to give us her agenda, as against the agenda that Sir David was set in his terms of reference. Some of the omissions that she mentioned can scarcely be laid at his door, as they did not fall within those terms of reference. Although her question about concentration of ownership, for example, is an entirely proper subject for discussion in the House, I do not think that it falls within the purview of the report, in the particular circumstances. I cannot forecast whether specific legisation will be introduced; nor can I make any commitments in relation to a freedom of information Act.

The hon. Lady asked about the hon. Member for Hammersmith's Bill. That Bill would establish an independent press authority and an absolute right to corrections of factual errors appearing in the press. It certainly covers some of the ground that would be covered by the press complaints tribunal proposed by Sir David, but Sir David's review raised a number of wider issues. The Government believe that it would be better to address those issues in the round, which was my reason for saying that I could not ask the House to support the hon. Gentleman's Bill.

In regard to the statutory tribunal, the hon. Lady adopted the asseverative technique that she has used on other occasions. She asserted that it was important that the powerful should not be protected. Throughout the report, Sir David made it clear that he did not envisage the protection of the powerful, given the existence of reasons connected with the public interest—which he carefully defined—that would justify alternative action.

The hon. Lady concluded by saying that Sir David had sought to deal with press regulation in isolation from questions concerned with press freedom. She will recall that Sir David said specifically in the report that he thought that it would be a mistake for the Press Complaints Commission to deal with both subjects at the same time: in his view, the issue of self-regulation is separate from that of press freedom. I am sure, however, that the hon. Lady's support for press freedom will be echoed on both sides of the House.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The measures proposed by my right hon. Friend to combat the invasion of privacy are very welcome—and, perhaps, long overdue. Does he agree, however—in regard to the establishment of the press—that, however detestable the conduct of some editors may be, the right to freedom of speech is a precious right which we have upheld for centuries? Surely, however much we may resent what members of the press have to say, we should all defend to the last their right to say it.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the welcome that he has given the Government's action. Of course I recognise—as I did in the answer that I gave the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd)—the overriding issue on the right to freedom of speech, but my right hon. Friend himself welcomed the fact that our proposals dealt with questions relating to intrusion into privacy.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Secretary of State accept that in most countries the privacy of the citizen and the freedom of the press are protected by fundamental constitutional law? The absence of such arrangements in this country has given rise to the need for a piecemeal approach to the law's amendment that has been adopted by Calcutt.

Does the Secretary of State also accept that, whereas certain measures to tighten up the law on physical intrusion and covert surveillance may be acceptable, many people will regard the freedom of the press to act as at least a point of criticism of an over-mighty, over-centralised and over-secretive Government that we have under our constitutional arrangements in this country should not be checked by a statutory body appointed by the Government?

Will the Secretary of State recognise that if the Government will give the citizens of this country the right to invoke the provisions of the European convention on human rights in our own courts, most of the problems that he and his predecessors have had to deal with will go away?

Mr. Brooke: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. Sir David himself makes the point in his report, when referring to legislation that applies in other countries, that the history, culture, tastes and constitutional arrangements in other lands do not necessarily travel readily and easily across borders and that this must be taken into account when examining particular legislation that one would like to introduce here.

The hon. Gentleman paid an eloquent tribute to the freedom of the press which I am sure many other hon. Members on both sides of the House would echo, but there is a responsibility on the part of the press also to make sure that that freedom can be upheld.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I welcome the measured response of my right hon. Friend to the report and, in particular, to proposals for a press tribunal which I believe would be probably unworkable and certainly undesirable in a free society. Does my right hon. Friend agree that journalists should be neither flattered nor persecuted by being treated differently from any other United Kingdom citizen and that what is needed is a criminal justice Bill that would control electronic eavesdropping, intrusion into private property and intrusion by long-lens cameras in a way that would apply to every citizen in the land?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comment. The essence of the proposals that Sir David brings forward is that they are not specifically and uniquely addressed to journalists; they are addressed to anyone who would be engaged in those activities with a view to publication.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): May I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his courteous reference to the Select Committee and for his readiness to await the outcome of the inquiry that we are conducting before he arrives at final conclusions?

A free society requires a proper balance between the essential freedom of the press and the freedom of private individuals from harassing intrusion from media whom, in the normal course of events, they would never encounter except as readers, listeners and viewers. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with me that any reforms ought to be directed principally to the protection not of public figures, whether in the palaces of Westminster or Buckingham, but of innocent people such as the victims of crime and their families and the bereaved families of service men killed in action?

Mr. Brooke: I thank the right hon. Gentleman very much for the kind remarks with which he began his question.

In the context of the proper balance that he described, I would not wish to press the right hon. Gentleman, but if that is a trailer for the report that the Select Committee will bring forward, I think that many in the House will welcome the balance that he describes. In the context of the concentration and emphasis to which he made reference, he is right about the concern to make sure that everyone's home is his castle in which they can be secure and where they should not be interfered with. Sir David makes clear in his report that, where he makes reference to the potential for a defence relating to the public interest, it would need specifically to be related to the particular job that the individual was doing and, therefore, the relevance of the information to the discharge of that job.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I welcome what my right hon. Friend said about measures to prevent intrusion into privacy, especially that most odious practice of pestering those who are suffering from personal and family grief. On the broader issue, does he recall Sir Winston Churchill's saying that parliamentary democracy was a most incompetent system but every other system was infinitely worse? Will he say, therefore, that no matter how odious or detestable a free press seems, every other system is infinitely worse?

Mr. Brooke: I thank my hon. Friend not only for his concentration on those who are in a grief-stricken state but for the tribute that he paid to the freedom of the press and its importance to our constitutional arrangements.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I welcome the report as a part of the continuing, long-overdue debate on press freedom and responsibility and I thank the Minister for his interest in the committee that I set up to inform the progress of my Bill. The argument about the freedom of the press would be stronger if we had an Act protecting freedom of information or freedom of the press. If he introduced a privacy Bill, which, frankly, in the present climate I would not support, he would be introducing a Bill in a country which is almost alone among the western democracies in not having the counterbalance of press freedom legislation. That is why I would not support it in the present climate.

Perhaps we should start from fundamental principles. I hold the view that a citizen in a democracy has a right to expect news to be reported accurately in papers that claim to be newspapers. The Minister will know that the bulk of complaints that have been made to the Press Complaints Commission, to me and to others have been about accuracy. Inaccurate news reporting tends to lead to the further abuses that were brought to my committee's attention. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have had his mind made up for him, but if he listens carefully on 29 January I may be able to persuade him that the balance between press freedom and press responsibility requires a finely drawn Bill that addresses the need for explicit legislation protecting the freedom of the press or freedom of information before we go down the privacy road.

Mr. Brooke: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the tone in which he put his question. He has indicated his reservations about supporting legislation that we might introduce, and I have already made my position clear. The right of reply is dealt with in Sir David's recommendations for a statutory tribunal. I have said that the Government welcome continuing debate on reform, and perhaps the right of reply should be considered in that debate, despite my reaction to his Bill.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): As a member of the Select Committee, I urge my right hon. Friend, in reaching a final conclusion, to be guided by one principle—that the balance between the rights of the individual to privacy and the freedom of the press should be neither prejudiced nor subjugated out of balance? The decisive factor should be the public interest, but neither should be favoured or prejudiced.

Mr. Brooke: The terms in which my hon. Friend framed his question suggests that the trailer that I suggested the Chairman of the Select Committee gave us earlier will be reflected in the views of Conservative members of the Committee. I emphasised earlier that Sir David has identified and added the public interest defence in his report. I should not be surprised, therefore, if it is identified by the Select Committee.

Mr. Joe Ashton (Bassetlaw): Is the Secretary of State aware that one of the problems with the present system is that the Press Complaints Commission gives only an apology? There is nothing between that and going to court for libel and risking incurring costs of £100,000. There must be something in between. Why cannot he introduce a set-up like an unfair dismissal tribunal or the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, whereby a rape victim or a bereaved person who had been grievously abused by the press could make a complaint and be awarded, say, £5,000 or £10,000?

Why is it that we can have a Police Complaints Authority, which is totally independent, local government ombudsmen and health service ombudsmen—and the legal services ombudsmen, because the Solicitors Complaints Bureau was not doing its job? There are plenty of independent semi-statutory bodies which do a very good informal job and that is what is needed, instead of, on the one hand, a vested interest complaints commission and, on the other, lawyers making fat fees and taking great risks on other people's money in the libel courts.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue and I am grateful to him for having done so. The criminal offences that Sir David identifies also carry with them the opportunity for civil action. I indicated that the Government would be taking away for examination the proposals for criminal offences, but the hon. Gentleman is quite right in identifying the fact that a central consideration for the Government must be how the private individual can receive efficient and economical redress if it should be available to him.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his determination to marry a wish to protect the private citizen's right to privacy with the rights of a free but responsible press. My questions follow on very much from the remarks of the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton). Does my right hon. Friend envisage legal aid being available for this new civil action for intrusion of privacy? If not, is there not a real danger that, as with libel, this new tort will be of interest only to the rich and not to the ordinary citizen?

Following from that, before my right hon. Friend reaches his final decision, will he consider going back to the Press Complaints Commission and suggesting that it should reinforce itself, not only with more independent members, but with the power agreed by the industry to fine heavily those proprietors and editors who break their own code of conduct? The aim would still be to make self-regulation work.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's reinforcement of the question of the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton). I was saying that we would need to look at a variety of ways in which that objective could be secured. I think that the hon. Member for Bassetlaw was envisaging some form of summary proceedings. It would be wrong for me, when we have not got into the examination of the preparation of any legislation, to be definitive at this stage, but I can reassert the principle and spirit of what we will be seeking to achieve.

As to what my right hon. Friend says about the Press Complaints Commission, Sir David Calcutt enumerates on page 42 of his report what he regards as 12 deficiencies in the working of the commission. I express a personal view, but I should be surprised if, during the debate in advance of the Select Committee's report, the press did not address themselves to those 12 deficiencies which Sir David mentions.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Will the Secretary of State tell us a little more about his thinking? He says that he accepts Sir David Calcutt's conclusion that the Press Complaints Commission is not working properly. My experience is that it makes rulings but creates no precedents and the press just go on misbehaving in exactly the same way. The press do not comply with their own code. That code is constantly breached and nothing is done. In that sense it does not work. The alternative seems to be some kind of tribunal, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) has said, with some capacity to fine or punish so that it can enforce regulations set up by the press themselves, or giving power for the press to complain to the commission themselves.

Will the Secretary of State tell us what he is thinking? He ruled out a statutory tribunal but said that the Press Complaints Commission is not working. What is the position in between that he has in his mind?

Mr. Brooke: The precise words I used were that the Government would be extremely reluctant and that one would need to have a very persuasive case made out in order to introduce a statutory tribunal. Lord Waddington, who was Home Secretary when the privacy committee originally reported, used the phrase "statutory underpinning" so there is a potential for an instrument that might respond to the concerns of the hon. Member for Bassetlaw. It is too early to be decisive with regard to a report which we received only four or five days ago. It would be sensible for the debate to take place as a whole.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): We warmly welcome the way in which my right hon. Friend is treating Sir David Calcutt's report, and I fully endorse some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton). However, does he accept that there are two speeds? Surely, the public expect fairly rapid action to deal with the intrusiveness of bugging devices, telephonic communication and long-lens cameras but, in the longer term, they expect a final solution to what sort of press complaints commission can be established. Will he ensure that the former problem is dealt with urgently?

Mr. Brooke: The issue of criminal offences clearly involves Departments other than mine, but I assure my hon. Friend that the Government will proceed with all speed. It would be wrong to disguise the fact that these are complicated matters and we must ensure that they are properly studied before we introduce legislation which may not command respect if it is inadequate for the complexity involved.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Secretary of State aware that there is no such thing as a free press, as most of it is owned by a clique of millionaires? Does he accept that the Calcutt committee was set up when we had had a Tory Government for 10 years or more and when the press, ironically, were prying into some aspects of the establishment? As for the royal family, it is now apparent that the press were not doing the prying but that factions at the palace had been giving reports to the press to print. As for bugging and telephoto lenses, it is fairly certain that MI5 and GCHQ have been involved. What protection will there be from MI5 and other institutions? As the statement protects the high and mighty, the privileged and the establishment but not the under-privileged, it wants chucking in the political dustbin.

Mr. Brooke: I shall respond to the hon. Gentleman's three questions. He said that there was no such thing as a free press. I say only that the vehemence with which the issue has been examined in every editorial in the land—in every national, regional and local newspaper—in the past five days suggests that the press believes that there is something worth protecting in its present arrangements.

The answer to the hon. Gentleman's second question is that when Sir David was invited to make his one-man report, which the Government have published today, he did so as a follow-on to the earlier privacy report. The timing of any other event is, in a sense, irrelevant because he was merely reporting at the end of the 18-month period.

On the hon. Gentleman's technicolour observations about MI5 and GCHQ, I give the House a categorical assurance that the heads of the agencies involved have said that there is no truth in the rumours whose only——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): You are not supposed to say that—you have set a precedent.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brooke: If I have set a precedent, I have done so inadvertently, but, in the eyes of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), I appear to have acquired individual excellence. To return to the question asked by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), the only evidence as to why those rumours began was that the technical difficulties were beyond any other organisation —but, unfortunately, the technical difficulties are not beyond any other organisation.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, notwithstanding the very high-minded opinion that the press has of itself as the fourth estate of the realm and as almost untouchable, newspapers are, at root, businesses and interested in making a profit? Although they purvey useful stuff—facts, good comment and even entertainment—they are not above the equivalent of mixing chalk with the flour, which is what they often purvey. In doing so, they are deceiving the public and selling their customers short. It is not true that every other business must run according to rules that protect people from such practices and that the press should not be above such regulation? Therefore, will he not allow himself or the House to be intimidated by the barrage of self-justification and bullying which we have seen in the press in the past five days?

Mr. Brooke: In response to an earlier question, I said that there were responsibilities on the press and everyone else to ensure that the tradition of the freedom of the press, which we revere in this country, could be maintained.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does the Secretary of State not understand that, in any system of accountability, the idea of new torts does not exist for the vast majority of people and that the courts are too expensive for people to obtain redress? Libel action involves costs of thousands of pounds, if not hundreds of thousands of pounds, which automatically place it out of the ambit of ordinary people. Legal aid is not available for libel or slander, in any case. Does the Secretary of State accept that there should be a much better way to provide people with cheap, easy and informal access? Does he also accept that the press will never be properly accountable as long as the present ownership structure is retained? The Calcutt report does not deal with that problem, but the Secretary of State must do so because the press is owned by a tiny group of people, mostly Tory sympathisers, who erode the general standards of conduct in political life by supporting the Tory party with propaganda and money.

Mr. Brooke: I have already tried to respond to the issue of redress for the ordinary citizen when answering the hon. Member for Bassetlaw and my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton). I tried to convey the fact that the Government will be considering the issue very seriously. I have already said that, although I agree that ownership is a wholly appropriate matter for debate in the House, it does not arise specifically from the Calcutt report.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): As someone with a journalistic background who has been absolutely disgusted by some of the antics of the tabloid press in recent years, I welcome my right hon. Friend's sensible approach. However, will he make it absolutely clear that, in adopting that approach and not accepting—at least straight away—some of the recommendations of the Calcutt report, he has in no way been pressurised by the, at times, crude and hysterical campaign mounted in the past few days by certain sections of the press? Does he agree that the press would be very unwise if it did not set about putting its own house in order on some aspects which are manifestly wrong?

Mr. Brooke: We are all aware of debates in the House to which people come with a particular attitude but find that that attitude changes as a result of the nature of the debate. I am sure that some hon. Members will have felt that the manner in which the press has argued its case in the past five days has not necessarily served its best interests.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): We agree with Calcutt and the Secretary of State that self-regulation of the press has failed. Does the Secretary of State agree that any form of self-regulation cannot be improved and will not work in the future, in view of the highly competitive nature of the press? Does he also agree that the answer is not state regulation? We endorse the Government's general approach of trying to make effective civil and criminal rights and responsibilities. It is important that civil remedies are effective and, in that respect, I endorse what the Secretary of State said about legal aid and other matters.

On the question of privacy, I appreciate what the Secretary of State said about different legal cultures on the continent, but I hope that that does not blind him to the fact that things are done better there and that we might learn from that example.

With regard to obligations——

Madam Speaker: Order. In the past 20 minutes hon. Members appear to have felt that we are engaging in a debate rather than in a series of questions arising from a statement. I am very anxious to call all Members who want to be called, but I shall not be able to do so if each Member puts many or long questions. I hope that during the few remaining minutes that I intend to allow for this subject Members will be very brief.

Mr. Trimble: I have just one more question to put to the Secretary of State. Does he agree that we should be concerned with regulation not only of the press but of other media and other persons? May I remind him of my Adjournment debate in December, in which I raised matters pertaining to television? Is he in a position to comment on that matter?

Madam Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his questions and for the way in which he has supported the general thrust of Government action. We have spent much time talking about freedom of the press and about the length of that tradition in this land. Given the fact that the hon. Gentleman is a lawyer, I remind the House of what Sir Edward Coke said at the beginning of the 17th century: that the house of everybody is, to him, as his castle and fortress. That should be borne in mind in the protection of people's rights.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): May I assure my right hon. Friend that his cautious and essentially pragmatic statement will be broadly welcomed but also ask him not to hasten to bring forward legislation in respect of what, after all, is a most complicated issue? Instead, he should listen to the debate with great care and consider how a more independent press complaints commission might be established, perhaps with the right to impose penalties, as has been suggested. If there is to be any kind of control, will my right hon. Friend look to the civil courts for the remedy, rather than to the criminal courts, as the lesser burden of proof is acceptable to the former?

Mr. Brooke: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend for his general support for what we are doing. I shall certainly look carefully at the propositions in his final sentence.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): As it is of paramount importance that any changes should ensure that all citizens are equal before the law, will the Secretary of State undertake to explore with the Home Office and the Scottish Office the issue of access to legal aid for civil actions? This, I believe, has been denied since time immemorial. Does the Secretary of State have any idea when the public debate will be concluded? Are we to anticipate a White Paper or immediate legislation thereafter?

Mr. Brooke: I do not think that I would be doing wrong to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland if I were to say that I think that he will be guided by the same considerations as influenced my answers to certain other questions about legal access. With regard to the timetable, I have indicated that the Government certainly will not respond or reach conclusions until the Select Committee has reported. The normal practice is that, following publication of a Select Committee report, the Government publish a White Paper and provide the opportunity for a parliamentary debate on it.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, under our unwritten constitution, a healthy democracy depends on a press that is not only free but investigative, challenging and, indeed, disrespectful? While accepting and welcoming the specific proposals to control physical intrusion of privacy, may I ask my right hon. Friend for an assurance that the Government will not pursue measures that might throw out the democratic baby of press freedom with the scurrilous bath water?

Mr. Brooke: I think that my hon. Friend will be reassured by the list of defences that would be available in respect of the offences that he is recommending, whose general concept the Government have accepted.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): By accepting the overwhelming arguments in favour of the creation of new criminal offences and, indeed, a new tort to protect privacy —though not the tool of a statutory tribunal—the Government are presumably saying that these matters should be dealt with by the regular courts, both civil and criminal. Once those new offences and new tort become part of our law, it will be alleged either that a journalist has committed the criminal offence or that a newspaper had breached the civil tort. Does it not follow that the Government are really saying that it is better to have such matters dealt with in the regular courts, given the sensitive and delicate issues that will arise, rather than by a statutory tribunal? All issues about state regulation arise equally well in relation to the courts as they would in relation to a statutory tribunal, but we would lose the expertise that a statutory tribunal would develop.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman makes a relevant point. It will be well worth making it in the debates that we shall be having, and to which I look forward, in the next few months.

Mr. Alan Howard (Stratford-on-Avon): As he seeks balanced remedies for the problems that undoubtedly exist, may I ask my right hon. Friend to think deeply before concluding that the resources of self-regulation are exhausted, because I believe that there is scope for strengthening them? Will he also indeed consider extending the protection that the law affords private citizens, possibly by way of a tort of harassment? That might more precisely address the problems with which we should be most concerned, in a manner preferable to a more generalised law of privacy. Will he also think open-mindedly about the possibility of some countervailing strengthening of press freedoms, including freedom of information legislation?

Mr. Brooke: In relation to the strengthening of self-regulation, I should perhaps have added when answering my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) that I imagine that the press will have noted the opinion poll by one of its members which showed that there was a significant majority in the country in favour of a statutory tribunal, which suggests that the manner in which the Press Complaints Commission has so far operated does not enjoy public confidence.

The answer to my hon. Friend's question about harassment is that I infer that there is a possibility that the Select Committee will include a reference to that issue when it reports, and I look forward to reading what it says about that.

My hon. Friend will be aware, on the issue of countervailing freedoms, of the commitments that the Conservative party entered into in its election manifesto on the subject of openness of government.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As this is the slippery slope to state meddling with the press, may I consign the report, if not to the Bolsover dustbin, at least to the recycling plant to make up for all the trees that it took to print it?

It is not true, in the constituency experience of some of us, that people resent intrusion into grief. Often, grief-stricken families like some interest to be taken in them.

I rise particularly to ask if the common law of Scotland can be left alone. As the right hon. Gentleman said at the outset, the common law of Scotland is a bit different. For heaven's sake, leave us out of it.

Mr. Brooke: It would not be right for me to answer on behalf of the Secretary of State for Scotland, whose attention I shall draw to the hon. Gentleman's comments.

I stress—it is in Sir David's report—that large numbers of private individuals—one need only examine the index to the report—have written to complain to Sir David about the manner in which they have been treated. If one confronts a person in one's kitchen and that person says that he is there to represent the public interest, it is a little hard on the individual whose kitchen has been invaded.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): I warmly welcome what my right hon. Friend said about bugging devices, but I urge him to move with great caution down the statutory route. The job of the free press is the same as our job here, which is to expose what should be exposed. Although we may not like what is sometimes revealed, and although the press may not behave in a proper manner, we do not always behave in a proper manner. To inhibit the freedom of the press would do great damage to the democracy which we all value.

Mr. Brooke: Just as I stressed the aspect of Sir David's concern about the private individual, so I should draw the attention of the House to the fact that Sir David specifically ruled out any kind of exclusion zone being built around those in public life.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Will the Secretary of State reflect on the simple observation that the criticisms of the media in recent times have almost exclusively been criticisms of the print rather than of the broadcast media? Is he aware that every test of public opinion shows that the public believe the news and current affairs reporting of the broadcasting media far more than they believe what they read in the newspapers?

While newspapers are subject to a self-regulatory system, broadcasters are subject to a democratically controlled regulatory system. Despite that, the broadcasters have proved time and again to have been outstanding in the pursuit of investigative journalism.

Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect again on his attitude to the Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill which is to be introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley)? That measure would do no more than any broadcaster or investigative reporter would acknowledge: it would allow people a statutory right to have errors of fact corrected. I see a complete contradiction in the right hon. Gentleman's position.

[Mr. Bruce Grocott]

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman raises the subject of broadcasters, as does Sir David in his report, in terms of whether all the media should be subjected to the same law and controls. As the hon. Gentleman rightly says, at present there is a distinction in the manner in which they are controlled. He makes a valuable point when he says that television news journalists are widely respected and, as he points out, are subject to two statutory controls. That issue should be weighed and measured in the debates that we shall be having.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Will my right hon. Friend please steer clear of legislation affecting the press? Does he agree that there is a danger that, in trying to protect the privacy of individuals—in sometimes justifiable circumstances—we could be in danger of restricting the press invading privacy when it should sometimes be invaded, such as in the Maxwell and Barlow Clowes cases? At a time when the establishment is hardly held in high esteem, it would not be easy politically for any Government to sell any control on the press, however justified and well intentioned, to the British public.

Mr. Brooke: The problem—it has been identified by several hon. Members—is that, as Sir David says, self-regulation is not satisfactory as at present constituted, so we have an unsatisfactory position. But I assure my hon. Friend that the issue of the late Robert Maxwell and investigation of him would be a perfectly proper defence in terms of the criminal offences which I described.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I welcome what my right hon. Friend said about the public interest being the determining factor in conflicts between the rights of individuals' privacy and the freedom of the press. Will he confirm, as I think he just has, that there is no legislation that he would recommend—I think none would pass through the House—that would inhibit the press in inquiring into matters of legitimate public concern such as thalidomide or 'Spycatcher" or arms to Iraq-type matters, and that allegations to that effect by certain editors rather betray the weakness of their case?

Mr. Brooke: In his report, Sir David has added two further defences to the three already available in the recommendations of the privacy committee.

Mr. Roger Evans (Monmouth): Will my right hon. Friend explain why, when breaking the law, a journalist should be entitled to plead the defence of national interest? Surely the tradition of Sir Edward Coke, to which my right hon. Friend referred, means that if one besets Headington hall, trespasses on its lawns or electronically surveys what its occupants do, one should suffer the consequences. We should reject the alien concept of privacy. It is all very well to talk about foreign examples, but the French republic is a classic example of where the law of privacy inhibits the prosecution of corrupt politicians.

Mr. Brooke: I assure my hon. Friend, as I have sought to assure the House, that the defences that will exist under the criminal offences cover a wide variety of crime if the information was being sought with a view to publication.

Business of the House

5.4 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Madam Speaker, I will make a statement about the business for next week. The business will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 JANUARY—Progress in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, fifth day.

TUESDAY 19 JANUARY—Progress in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, sixth day.

WEDNESDAY 18 JANUARY—Progress in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, seventh day.

THURSDAY 21 JANUARY—Debate on the Royal Air Force on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 22 JANUARY—Private Member' Bills

MONDAY 25 JANUARY—Second Reading of the National Lottery etc Bill.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet on Wednesday 20 January at 10.30 am to consider European Community document 5248/92 relating to footwear labelling.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that statement.

May we have an assurance that there will be a further statement on Monday about the position in Iraq, when I presume a proper assessment will be available of the position there? Is he aware that it would not be acceptable to Opposition Members to see the debate on the RAF which is scheduled for Thursday as a vehicle for discussing that or other foreign affairs matters such as Bosnia? Thursday's debate stands on its own merits and we expect other Government time to be made available for other matters.

I press the right hon. Gentleman to schedule an early debate in Government time on the issue of care in the community. Recent events such as the Silcock case have fuelled existing concern about that important area of policy. There is much interest on both sides of the House as we approach the shift of responsibility from Government to local authorities for that policy area.

Can the Leader of the House give an indication of the likely date of the Budget, since, apart from that being of interest to hon. Members, we shall want a debate on the most important recent report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. As that will in part contribute to the atmosphere and framework of the debate on the Budget, it would be helpful to have that before the Budget itself.

Mr. Newton: On the hon. Lady's question about a further statement on Iraq, she will know that, as my right hon. and learned Friend said last night, we shall keep the House informed of the likely effects of the operation. He said that it would be some time before we could describe with certainty the detailed consequences, so I shall not make a commitment about a statement at a particular time, but I shall make sure that he is aware of the hon. Lady's request.

I recognise that the debate next week will be concerned with defence matters, specifically in relation to the RAF in terms of what I announced. But that will, I think, permit a quite wide-ranging debate—subject always to the decisions of the Chair—and it may be for the interest of the House that on this occasion the Secretary of State for Defence will speak in the debate, in view of recent developments.

The hon. Lady's next question was about a debate on care in the community. I acknowledge the importance of that subject and the widespread interest in it, in view of the impending changes, as well as the recent case to which she referred and a number of other issues. I am afraid that I cannot undertake to find time for a debate next week, or possibly for some little time, but I note the hon. Lady's request.

Finally, I was rather hoping that the hon. Lady would ask me about the Budget, because I have a little information to communicate. I am pleased to be able to tell the hon. Lady and the whole House that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to open his Budget statement on Tuesday 16 March.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the amount of business now before the House often prevents us from leaving the confines of the Palace of Westminster. Many new Members, and, I am sure, some who are not new, are blood donors. Will my right hon. Friend consider providing an opportunity for a blood donation wagon to come to the Palace?

I have a further brief question, too, if I may.

Madam Speaker: No, no. I said earlier this afternoon that I wanted to hear one question from one Member. Furthermore, the hon. Gentleman's question was hardly a matter for the Leader of the House. For all that, the right hon. Gentleman may like to say something about it, and we shall then move on.

Mr. Newton: I am tempted to make a remark about the amount of blood on the Floor, Madam Speaker, but I note my hon. Friend's interesting request. Blood donation is certainly an important service, but, as you kindly said, it is not a matter for me. Nevertheless, I shall ensure that the point is drawn to the attention of the appropriate people.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House confirm that a statutory instrument will be required to give effect to the recent cuts in hill livestock compensatory allowances? As the cuts are causing great concern throughout the upland areas of the United Kingdom, will the right hon. Gentleman use his good offices to ensure that there is a debate on the Floor of the House on that important issue?

Mr. Newton: I acknowledge the views expressed by the hon. Gentleman. I would wish to look into the exact parliamentary procedures required—but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will at least acknowledge that hill farm incomes have been rising.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware of the serious and deteriorating security situation in Northern Ireland. I have been told that that matter cannot be debated in the Northern Ireland Committee, but only on the Floor of the House. In view of the gruesome murders taking place on both sides of the political divide, will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that he will give us time next week to discuss something that affects the lives and well-being of the people in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot give precisely the commitment that the hon. Gentleman seeks, but I draw his attention to the fact—of which he is no doubt already aware—that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be here to answer oral questions next Thursday.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): Will the Leader of the House be able to find time for the President of the Board of Trade to discuss the rules governing receivership that were used in the termination of Lilley Group plc in Scotland—and especially the procedures whereby viable subsidiaries of that company which were trading profitably were also put into receivership? It will be noticed that, in early-day motion 1141, many hon. Members express concern about the procedures.

[That this House is deeply concerned at the cynical decision of the Clydesdale Bank, owned by the Bank of Australia, to call in the receivers on the Lilley Group plc and the subsequent actions of the receivers Price Waterhouse in ending the trading of financially healthy subsidiaries of the Lilley Group; notes that the receivers are now stating to companies who are owed money for works carried out for MDW, a Glasgow-based construction subsidiary, that debts outstanding of almost £16 million have been transferred to Lilley Group plc, who will be unlikely to make these payments because the majority of assets will be used to pay the banks; further notes that the subsidiaries, if sold, will not be liable to pay the debts owed to contractors for work done, which in turn will lead to substantial job losses and financial hardship for sub-contracting firms such as Fir-Side Joinery of Falkirk who are owed £200,000 by MDW for work already completed; and calls on the Department of Trade and Industry to introduce regulations to safeguard the rights of viable companies in such circumstances.]

I am sure that many hon. Members will have had similar experiences in their constituencies. Viable subcontractors find that outstanding debts are not paid, as happened in the case of Fir-Side Joinery, in Falkirk. Honest hardworking subcontractors see the money coming in for the work that they have done going to the receiver, and they never get a penny of it. Today and tomorrow, the Lilley subsidiaries will be relaunched and sold, and the people who take over will not be liable for debts owed for work done.

Is it not time for a discussion on the rules, to find out whether we can protect hard-working companies which have done the work and should receive the money?

Mr. Newton: As on the previous question, I cannot give exactly the promise that the hon. Gentleman seeks, but I draw his attention to the fact that the President of the Board of Trade will be here next Wednesday. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be able to work a question in then.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Will my right hon. Friend ask the Home Secretary to make a statement next week in connection with the tragic death of Donna Cooper, a much loved 13-year-old schoolgirl who was killed by a stolen car driven, I understand, by someone out on bail? Such matters, involving the mindless taking of a car, affect lives, families and communities in the constituencies of hon. Members on both sides of the House. The subject deserves a statement, so that we can find out what else can be done to help in such circumstances.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Newton: It is clear from the reaction of the House that all hon. Members on both sides of the House would like to join in the expression of sympathy that my hon. Friend offered to the family involved. I shall certainly bring his request to the attention of the Home Secretary. As my hon. Friend will know, the Government have already taken steps to increase the penalties for joyriding, and are now examining some of the problems connected with offences committed by people on bail.

Ms. Ann Coffey (Stockport): Will the Leader of the House set time aside next week for an attempt to clarify the procedures for relatives of Bosnian refugees who wish to obtain visas? I ask that question because of a particular difficulty that has arisen for the Bosnian families in Stockport. At present, the onus of responsibility to go to the nearest embassy lies with the applicant. As the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate, Bosnia is not an easy country to cross. A 17-year-old boy, the son of one of the families——

Madam Speaker: Order. May I give the hon. Lady a little guidance? She should at this stage not go into detail, but simply give a broad outline of what is required and why she seeks a debate next week. If she wishes to pursue an individual case, I am sure that the appropriate Minister would be prepared to consider it.

Ms. Coffey: I apologise, Madam Speaker. I was giving the reasons why I wanted a debate next week. The problem arose from a particular difficulty in my constituency involving a 17-year-old boy who was required to cross the country to reach an embassy. I wondered whether the United Nations and the Red Cross could take more of an enabling role in helping applicants to get visas.

Mr. Newton: You and I both understand, Madam Speaker, why the hon. Lady raised that matter, and we respect her reasons. The right thing for me to do is to draw her concern to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As the Leader of the House is allowing three full days of discussion on the treaty of European union next week, and as the issues are so deeply felt that it may be necessary for the debate to go further into the following week, will he have a word with the Chairman of Ways and Means to establish whether there is any possibility of discussing at an earlier stage the two amendments concerning a referendum? There is a widespread feeling in the House that, if a referendum were approved, the business of the House concerning the Bill on European union would be dealt with very quickly instead of very slowly.

Mr. Newton: First, I confirm my hon. Friend's prediction that it is possible that further time will need to be made available for the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. As for the rest, my hon. Friend will realise that that is not a matter for me. I hesitate to suggest that that is not a matter for the Chairman of Ways and Means, when he is here, because that sounds like a point of order. Nevertheless, I must steer him in that direction.

Ms. Tessa Jowell (Dulwich): Will the Leader of the House ensure that time is provided next week for the Secretary of State for Health to make a statement on the indictment of the Government's commercialisation of health care provided today by the British Medical Association, which describes "a breakdown of many hospital services, leading to a two-tier provision of service as between those patients of fundholding and non-fundholding GPs, which is totally unacceptable."?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will make a statement on that matter next week. I have not had a chance to study what the hon. Lady says the BMA says, but the words she used do not bear much relationship to my experience or understanding of what is happening. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will find other ways of commenting on the subject.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday next week we shall be dealing with the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill? Is it the custom of the House that, in Committee, either hon. Members provide their names to the Chairman of Ways and Means or they are not called?

Madam Speaker: Order. May I give a little more guidance? Hon. Members are inclined—as in this case—to ask procedural questions, which are a matter for the Chairman of Ways and Means, not for the Leader of the House. We should not ask the Leader of the House to come to the Dispatch Box and answer questions on matters which are not his responsibility. I call Mr. Jones.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): When will the President of the Board of Trade come to the House to make his statement regarding the assisted area map of Britain? There is apprehension in my constituency with 3,000 people out of work and the possible loss of a valuable status. Bearing in mind Wales's contribution in coal and steel, and with its massive unemployment at present, it would be wrong for any Welsh area to lose such a status. I should like the hon. Gentleman to tell the Cabinet about those matters.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend is examining a number of issues at present. I cannot give him a definite date on which the assisted areas review will come forward, although I will ensure that my right hon. Friend is aware that the question has been asked, if only because it might well be asked again next Wednesday.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (Halesowen and Stourbridge): During the Prime Minister's Question Time on Tuesday, the Prime Minister announced that he had asked the Home Secretary to examine the question of juvenile offenders, and said that he was hoping to come forward quickly with proposals. Is it possible for the House to have a debate in the near future on this important issue, so that we can feed in the views of the House?

Mr. Newton: Again, I cannot promise an early debate. However, I can certainly confirm that my right hon. and learned Friend is examining urgently and critically the existing arrangements to deal with juvenile offenders in order to decide what measures, if any, it would be sensible to introduce.

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): Given the number of calls for a public inquiry into the death of my constituent, Thomas Adleigh, who died in the early hours of Christmas morning while waiting a prolonged period for an ambulance, will the Leader of the House find time next week for the Secretary of State for Scotland to make a statement on the reduction of overnight ambulance cover in the Argyll and Clyde health board area?

Mr. Newton: As with the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms. Coffey), the appropriate course is for me to bring that question to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Can my right hon. Friend find an early opportunity to debate early-day motion 1154 on emergency services in Tayside?

[That this House notes that during the recent spell of adverse weather throughout Tayside, the police and other emergency services have carried out their humanitarian tasks with great skill and courage; further notes that Tayside Regional Council, Perth and Kinross District Council and Angus District Council have opened up council buildings as emergency shelters for stranded lorry drivers and motorists; congratulates the officers and men of 45 Royal Marine Commando, who, using their skis and Arctic experience, rescued many stranded civilians; and further congratulates the crews of the RAF search and rescue helicopter flight of RAF Leuchars for the vast number of emergency sorties completed in conditions of gales and below freezing temperatures.]

My right hon. Friend will be aware that, even today, many major roads in Tayside are still blocked and communities are isolated. He will be aware of the problems that the people in Tayside will face when the search and rescue flight is no longer available at Leuchars and when 45 Royal Marine Commando is not at its base at Condor. The skiing and Arctic ability of the commandos have saved many people's lives.

Mr. Newton: It is becoming clear that the follow-up period to these business questions will keep my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland fairly busy. I will bring that question to his attention.

Ms. Jean Corston (Bristol, East): I refer the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1162 on today's Order Paper on the subject of legal aid.

[That this House agrees that justice for all can only be a reality when there is provision for access to justice for all irrespective of wealth; notes that the intention of the Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949 was to ensure that no one was to be denied legal advice and representation because of inadequate finance; is appalled that the Lord Chancellor, as part of a Government purporting to espouse citizen's rights, proposes to restrict free legal aid only to those on income support or the equivalent, thereby excluding 12 million people from the legal aid provisions; and calls on the Government to abandon these proposals.]

It calls attention to the Lord Chancellor's proposals to change the eligibility rules for legal aid, the effect of which will be to deny free legal aid to 12 million people. That could prevent women from taking out domestic violence injunctions, or parents from making applications under the Children Act. Will the Leader of the House make time for the House to debate that important matter?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady is right to say that the Lord Chancellor has announced proposals and will shortly be tabling regulations to bring changes into effect. Those regulations will undoubtedly give rise to debate. I simply make the point that nearly half of all households will remain financially eligible for legal aid.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I support the calls today from my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and others for an early debate on crime and law and order, and especially the police service. The Leader of the House will know that, throughout the Christmas/New Year recess, barely a day went by without news of some catastrophe involving youngsters and crime. It is time that the House had a proper debate on the matter.

Mr. Newton: I note the point made by my hon. Friend, which follows the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills. My hon. Friend will know that the Home Secretary is examining a number of matters that arise from the concerns expressed by hon. Members. I cannot add to what I said a moment ago.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House change his mind about having a debate on the national health service and the crisis that has arisen in almost every part of the service as a result of the introduction of the internal market? May I be helpful to the Leader of the House and pre-empt any remarks that he might make about Labour making a U-turn? I was at the press conference yesterday, and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) did not say that we supported the trusts. But we desperately need a debate.

Mr. Newton: I did not have it in mind to make any aggressive remarks in response to the hon. Lady's question. However, it remains the case that, in addition to what I said to the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms. Jowell) a while ago, I am not in a position to promise a debate next week.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): My right hon. Friend will be aware that many customs clearance agents and freight forwarders in Dover have recently been made redundant as a result of the introduction of the single European market. Can he confirm that there will be an early opportunity to debate the efficiency and effectiveness of the Department of Trade and Industry in dispersing the British share of the 24 million ecu that the European Community has announced is available to assist customs agents and freight forwarders? There is anxiety in my constituency that, unless the procedures for dispersing that money are speeded up and made more efficient, it will not filter down to them.

Mr. Newton: I appreciate the reasons why my hon. Friend has raised that point. Indeed, I appreciate the assiduity with which he has pursued the matter on behalf of his constituents over a long period. He too might like to be reminded that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, to whom he referred, will be here to answer oral questions on Wednesday.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Members' interests.

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot add this week to what I have told the hon. Gentleman on previous occasions. Having had some discussions with the Chairman of the Committee, I am examining ways to proceed.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Has the Leader of the House been approached by the Prime Minister about making a statement next week in the light of press reports on the future governance of Scotland? If he has not, may I suggest that he encourages the Prime Minister to speak to the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and other hon. Members who have had experience of devolved government and are interested in Scotland and the Union, bearing in mind that we are known as the Ulster Scots or, as our American cousins call us, the Scotch-Irish?

Mr. Newton: I will draw the hon. Gentleman's kind and undoubtedly well-meant offer to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): When the Leader of the House was compiling the business for next week and came to Thursday, did he observe that it was passing strange that Thursdays in the past few months have been heavy days on which all Members were expected to turn up? On Thursday of next week, the business is a debate on the Air Force, which does not normally arouse a great deal of interest among Members, although I realise its importance. Therefore, will he try to disprove the sinister suggestions that have been put to me, that the reason why such a debate was chosen was to distract Members from coming in on Friday for the debate on my Shops (Amendment) Bill? I thank him if those sinister remarks are wrong. I have known him and the work that he does for some time, and I suggest that he allowed a light Thursday so that Members will have time to study the booklet that they received from me this morning explaining the difficulties of introducing a shops Bill.

Mr. Newton: I had not expected the hon. Gentleman to join the conspiracy theorists who are normally to be found on the other side of the Gangway. I assure him that nothing more was in my mind than the ambitions presented to the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) about Fridays. Contrary to what the hon. Gentleman says, since the House resumed in the autumn, the pattern has been of light days, in the sense in which he uses the word. There have been few heavy Thursdays.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): The Lord President will recall that a few weeks ago I raised the issue of pornography on the telephone, following the rape of a young girl in Hillingdon. He referred me to the Department of National Heritage—which surprised me—and I was referred back to the Department of Trade and Industry. Since then, I have had a debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill, in which the response from the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) was unhelpful. Next Tuesday, I have a ten-minute Bill which has all-party support.

Will the Lord President now or very soon add some weight to the need to regulate pornography on the telephone? I understand that he has two daughters, as do other right hon. Members on the Treasury Bench. I ask them please to consider what I have been saying for a long time, which is attracting all-party support. For that reason alone, will he do something about what is happening on the telephone, which I believe is corrupting and not very wholesome for a civilised country to accept?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that I have two daughters. I also have two stepdaughters. I have no direct or indirect experience of the problem that he describes through them, but I am conscious of the importance that he attaches to the matter and of the sympathy that many people have for his views. I cannot make an absolute commitment, but I will do my best to be here next week to listen to his speech on the subject.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Welsh Grand Committee has not met since last February? Since February, thousands of jobs have been lost in my constituency and those of other Opposition Members. It appears that all representations to the Secretary of State for Wales are failing. Therefore, will the Leader of the House place on the Order Paper next week the appropriate motion to establish the Welsh Grand Committee to discuss the growing unemployment problems of Wales?

Mr. Newton: I cannot give the undertaking that the hon. Gentleman seeks, but I shall certainly bring his suggestion to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Government's proposal to reduce expenditure under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 is likely adversely to affect the educational opportunities and life chances of many children of ethnic minority background in my constituency and those of many other hon. Members? If he is aware of that, will he please urge the Home Secretary to make a statement as soon as possible? If he cannot do that, will he arrange a debate on that important subject as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Newton: Again, I cannot promise exactly what the hon. Gentleman seeks, but I shall bring his concern to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it possible to have an early debate on the recommendations of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, the most important of which is that the security services should be subject to full parliamentary scrutiny? Any such scrutiny committee should not be composed of Privy Councillors alone, hence my early-day motion 1089.

[That this House is strongly of the opinion that the security services should be subject to Parliamentary scrutiny; and moreover is opposed to a committee composed only of privy counsellors being established, which would be outside the normal Select Committee structure.]

Bearing in mind the allegations that have been made about the security services in the latest controversy involving the royal couple, is it not essential that, as in other democracies, the security service be subject to parliamentary scrutiny as early as possible? When can we have an early debate?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise the early debate that the hon. Gentleman seeks; nor can I add to what was said by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage half an hour ago on the question to which the hon. Gentleman adverted. Obviously the report of the Select Committee, like all Select Committee reports, will be carefully studied.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House accept that we need a statement next week on the national health service, even if, after repeated pressing from my hon. Friends, he cannot manage a debate? A two-tier system is developing. I have in my hand a letter from the chief executive of the Bradford hospital trust which says:

"I hope and would expect that preference will be given"——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have had to call several hon. Members to order today for developing their points rather than stating the principle of why they want a debate. The hon. Gentleman is a good parliamentarian and he knows what I am getting at.

Mr. Cryer: One sentence, Madam Speaker. The chief executive of the national health service trust in Bradford is urging consultants to give preference to GP fund holders. That is a serious departure from all the pledges which the Government have given, and that is why we need a statement.

Mr. Newton: I have commented twice on similar questions about the national health service, and I shall not add to what I said earlier.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 1150?

[That this House congratulates the I.L.P. on its 100th anniversary, recognising that the Independent Labour Party held its inaugural conference in Bradford on 13th and 14th January 1893 and that its tradition is continued today by its direct successor organisation, Independent Labour Publications, which has maintained the I.L.P. historic initials and continues to work for the advance and development of democratic socialism.]

That motion contains the simple but powerful initials "ILP". It is about the formation of the Independent Labour party 100 years ago today in Bradford—an organisation which still exists as Independent Labour Publications. A debate on that topic would allow a general discussion on political issues, including democratic socialism, which is still very much alive. For example, Keir Hardie, who was a founder member of the ILP, was known as the Member for the unemployed in the House. We need many Members for the unemployed. We could discuss unemployment during a discussion on the early-day motion.

Hon. Members: Yes—grant it.

Mr. Newton: I am being urged by my right hon. and hon. Friends to grant the hon. Gentleman's request.

[Mr. Newton]

However, I cannot add to the generous offer of my right hon. Friend to provide time for a wake. Nor, indeed, can I identify the undertaker.

Ms. Liz Lynne (Rochdale): Following the answer which the Leader of the House gave to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), although he said that he could not make available any time next week for a debate on community care, will he make time in the foreseeable future before April for such a debate? He should do so especially in the light of the report by the Association of Directors of Social Services that social services throughout Britain are having to cut their budgets.

Mr. Newton: I repeat what I said to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett): I am not in a position to promise a debate, but I shall bear in mind the request given the longer time scale given by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms. Lynne). The ADSS provides a survey of social services expenditure every year at this time, and it is not unknown for it to make gloomy predictions. It must be recognised that funding to local authorities for social services is to be increased by 15 per cent. next year. That comes on top of a real increase of almost two thirds in local authority social services spending since 1979.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): May I remind the Leader of the House of the implied and repeated promise to Members of the House of Commons that we would have an opportunity to debate the six documents on rail privatisation which the Secretary of State for Transport promised would be available before the publication of the privatisation Bill? Those six documents have not yet been received. As Members anticipate that, before the Leader of the House makes his next business statement, the Bill will have been published, will he use his good offices, first, to ensure that the six outstanding documents are made available to the House of Commons, especially the one on the pricing regime for Railtrack, which is crucial and central to the legislation, before the Bill is published; and, secondly, that we have an opportunity to debate the documents before Second Reading?

Finally, with regard to the Second Reading——

Madam Speaker: Order. I call the Leader of the House.

Mr. Newton: We have just had—I accept that it was thanks to Her Majesty's Opposition—a full day's debate on rail privatisation. It is to the credit of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport that he is making so much information so openly available in advance of Second Reading. It seems to me that the right way to respond to that is to treat that information as relevant to the debate which we shall undoubtedly have on the Bill.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Following the reply by the Leader of the House to my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) about hill livestock compensatory allowances, may I invite him to be a little more forthcoming? If, as seems likely, the Select Committee on Agriculture will consider that issue as a matter of urgency, can he give us an undertaking that the House will be given the opportunity to study and debate its report fully?

On the right hon. Gentleman's comment that the incomes of sheep farmers are said to have risen in recent years, I wonder whether he has noted the report of the west country sheep farmer who said that 50 per cent. of bugger all is still bugger all.

Mr. Newton: I do not know that I would want to validate that language from the Dispatch Box, quite apart from the implication of the remark. Nor shall I add to what I told his hon. Friend, beyond saying that any report produced by a Select Committee will be studied carefully by my right hon. Friends.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will the Leader of the House consult his colleagues, the Secretaries of State for Defence and for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, about providing time for a debate on the implications of the second strategic arms reduction treaty and on the question of nuclear proliferation for this country? That debate is necessary in view of the present debate in the Ukraine, which is likely to continue.

The Ukrainian Government might sabotage the whole process, because Members of its Parliament are opposed to the fact that this country, among others, is not giving the Ukraine any guarantees that, if it gets rids of its nuclear weapons, we will not fire such weapons against them. Could the Government find time to debate that issue, so that the Ukraine could be given a negative security guarantee of that type?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will recall that I have already announced in the business for next week a debate on defence-related matters, under the heading of the Royal Air Force. Despite the obvious importance of the matter to which he has referred, I cannot promise another debate at this stage.

Points of Order

5.43 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During Prime Minister's Question Time this afternoon, in your hearing, the Leader of the Opposition launched a strong personal attack on my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Is it not one of the oldest conventions in the House that, if a right hon. or hon. Member is going to name another right hon. or hon. Member, he first gives him or her notice to that effect privately?

I have established with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Leader of the Opposition gave him no such notice. In view of that fact, will you rule on this matter and confirm that that is a convention of the House and that the Leader of the Opposition ought to come to the Dispatch Box and apologise to my right hon. Friend?

Madam Speaker: It is a convention of the House, and it is a matter of common courtesy, that, if one Member intends to name another during a debate, or questions, he or she should arrange for that Member to be informed. Perhaps we can now get on——

Several hon. Members: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No. There is no further point of order, I have dealt with the matter.

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 13 January]

[DAME JANET FOOKES in the Chair]

Clause 1

TREATY ON EUROPEAN UNION

Amendment proposed [13 January]: No. 40, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'II,'.—[Mr. Cash.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

5.43 pm

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): I remind the Committee that we are also considering the following amendments:

No. 323, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'II'.

No. 11, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 2 on page 9 of Cm 1934)'.

No. 17, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 138a on pager 41 of Cm 1934)'.

No. 116, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(other than the following provisions set out under Article G—

Paragraph A (1)
Paragraph B (2)
Paragraph B (3)
Paragraph B (4)
Paragraph B (5)

New Clause 10—Report of European Council—

'.—After the European Council has submitted its report after each of its meetings, Her Majesty's Government shall publish and lay such reports, and those annual reports in writing, as required by Title I, Article D of the Treaty on European Union before Parliament, together with a statement as to their policy and performance in respect of the activities of the Union and their policies for its future.'.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): On a point of order, Dame Janet. Can you say for certain whether this is the Committee stage of the Bill, because it seems that my colleagues are not being called to speak unless they have given their names to the Chairman of the Committee beforehand? Is there any precedent for that during the Committee stage of any Bill?

The Second Deputy Chairman: That is entirely a matter for the Chairman. There is no such arrangement, although the hon. Gentlemen seems to think that there is. If Members wish to be called, they are not obliged to write in beforehand.

Mr. Knapman: You will be aware, Dame Janet, that many hon. Gentlemen and Ladies wish to speak to this group of amendments who have not given their names. I take it from your answer that their efforts will not be prejudiced in any way.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The main prejudice will come from those hon. Members who speak for such a long time that it makes it more difficult for others to speak, and not from any action by the Chair.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Dame Janet. I am acting on the assumption that the procedures of this Committee are not dissimilar in principle to those in a Committee upstairs and that they only vary slightly in practice. You will know, as all hon. Members do, that it is not infrequent for more than one Minister to be a member of a Committee upstairs. You may also know, from conversations with colleagues, that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who I am glad to see present, has given notice that his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is likely to reply to the debate on financial matters. You will also recall that the Minister spoke third in the debate and that many hon. Members—all but the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash)—have asked questions relating to foreign affairs and international law. We hope that no decision will be made that would prejudice the Minister of State having the opportunity to contribute again so that he may reply to those questions before the debate is concluded. He might have to indicate a willingness to do so, but without his reply the debate would be incomplete.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I cannot prejudge who may wish to catch my eye.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order, Dame Janet. The Leader of the House suggested a few minutes ago that I should raise this matter on a point of order. As you will know, he announced that three days will be allocated to discussion of the Bill next week, and it seems that, because of the strength of feeling expressed, even longer might have to be allocated during the following week. I was grateful, as I am sure were all hon. Members, that you and your colleagues decided to allow us to debate a clause dealing with a referendum, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). Could you consider our debating that new clause earlier, rather than at the end of the proceedings? There seems to be a widespread feeling that if that new clause were considered and agreed to, the proceedings on this important Bill might be completed quickly instead of taking a considerable time.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Dame Janet. I have tabled several amendments to the Bill concerning a referendum and I endorse the view expressed by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) that discussion of this lengthy Bill, which we must examine in great detail if a proper examination is to be undertaken, could well be curtailed. If it were decided, through an amendment, to provide the public with the opportunity to have a referendum, one would hope that the debate would shift to a much wider auditorium than this place—to the nation at large. Most decent, sensible democrats would welcome that. I endorse the view that the democratic procedures would benefit if an amendment or new clause were to be debated and passed, to allow the public the opportunity to join in the debate—a debate whose structure will inevitably be curtailed until the decision is made. An early decision on a referendum would be very welcome, not only here, but outside by the majority of the population. They have seen the Danes have a referendum in Denmark and they are asking, "Why can't we have a referendum about this important issue?"

Several hon. Members rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that I can deal with that point of order now. It is not for the Chair to vary the normal order in which amendments are taken.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Dame Janet. I am not complaining about the length of speeches because so far they have been interesting and instructive and I have listened to most of them. This legislation is important and I want to draw your attention to the fact that it is important to all parts of the United Kingdom, and particularly to Scotland, which enjoys a unique relationship within this unitary Parliament, brought about by the union that really matters, the Union of the United Kingdom. Therefore, it is important for the people of Scotland to understand that their views are being heard, listened to and noted in this Parliament.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I am afraid that that is not a point of order for the Chair, although it might be an interesting observation.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Dame Janet. Would it not assist the House if those hon. Members who are calling for the debate on a referendum clause to be brought forward—many of them have also tabled many amendments that are designed to keep the Bill going in the House for as long as possible—[Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. Hon. Members may not like the views being expressed, but the hon. Gentleman has the right to express them, providing that they take the form of a point of order.

Mr. Devlin: The point of order is that if some of those hon. Members who have tabled a large number of amendments wish to bring forward an amendment for an early vote, could they not do so by withdrawing the considerable number of amendments that they have already tabled?

The Second Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Dame Janet. I know that you would always want to be helpful to the House and this is an opportunity for you to be very helpful. This is a wide-ranging and important debate, which covers the vast bulk of the treaty. There have been many debates on the Maastricht treaty, but many hon. Members would like to catch your eye today and some have been unable to catch eyes in previous debates.

This may be the most important and wide-ranging debate on the Bill. It is unlikely that the Government would wish to curtail today's debate, but if they have told you that they will seek—God forbid—to move a closure motion at some stage today, quite inappropriately, could you tell the House now at what time the Government will seek to close the debate so that hon. Members can make their contribution within that time scale?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I remain in blissful ignorance of the Government's intentions.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): On a point of order, Dame Janet. This is the most important constitutional Bill since I have been in the House. It seeks to take large powers from the people of this country and reduce the position of the Executive and its accountability to the nation. I seek clarification on the observation that you made, which seemed to indicate that, because of the complex and difficult matters under discussion, if a speech is lengthy and ranges across the amendments before us, it curtails other Members' ability to make representations on behalf of their constituents. It therefore curtails free speech on this major constitutional arrangement.

Are you saying that an hon. Member who speaks in order for a long time will curtail the ability of other hon. Members to speak? Is that a new Committee ruling which we must bear in mind while trying to debate these great issues?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I have no such grandiose ideas in mind. I was merely making the common-sense observation that if hon. Members want to talk this afternoon, it is likely to be easier if they make shorter rather than longer speeches. However, that is not for the Chair to determine.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): On a point of order, Dame Janet. Is it not particularly perverse of hon. Members who have a stated commitment to the principle of parliamentary sovereignty—I know how sincere that commitment is on the part of the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor)—to suggest that, if there were a referendum on the Maastricht treaty, we would somehow be able to curtail our discussion of the Bill now? If one believes in parliamentary scrutiny and if there is to be a referendum, it is particularly important that we should thoroughly examine——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. That is clearly not a point of order but rather an observation.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): On a point of order, Dame Janet. Can you help me? I have sat through all the debates on this treaty. How can a Member from another part of the United Kingdom—Northern Ireland—make a contribution? I have approached the Chair, but have not been satisfied. I have been a Member of the House for 22 years and have never had to put down my name to speak in Committee. If one was present and stood up, one was likely to be called to speak. Can you assure hon. Members from Northern Ireland that, at some time during the debate, at least one of them will be called?

The Second Deputy Chairman: May I make it clear that there is no obligation on any Member during the Committee stage, or in any debate whatever, to put down his or her name in advance. I have tried to take note of those who rise in their places when one speaker gives way to another.

Mr. Knapman: On a point of order, Dame Janet. Can you confirm that, when a closure motion was moved in Committee before Christmas, although Members representing Welsh, Scottish and Northern Ireland constituencies were present—the Bill affects the whole of the United Kingdom—no hon. Member from any of those three countries was invited to speak prior to the closure. We have had three statements this afternoon and it is now 6 o'clock, so it will be a short debating day. Is that likely to occur again or will hon. Members from those other parts of the United Kingdom have a chance to speak on this occasion?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Member who would have the Floor now, but for the points of order, represents Wales.

Mr. Bill Walker: Further to the previous point of order that I tried to make but failed so miserably, Dame Janet. In your position as guardian of the interests of Back Benchers in Parliament, you will sometimes be required to accept or reject closure motions. Will you bear in mind the interests of the whole of the United Kingdom? I do not make a frivolous point because we know of the separatist movements within the United Kingdom, which wish to break up this unitary Parliament and the United Kingdom. The strongest card that we have to play against them is to ensure that the interests of parts of the United Kingdom such as Scotland are well looked after in the Chamber. If, by chance and for whatever reason, hon. Members are not called, separatists can use that as a device to claim that their interests are not being catered for. I draw your attention to that aspect on closure motions with respect and hope that you will bear it in mind.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I hope that I shall not be found wanting in my duties in that regard. However, we can best help by resuming the debate.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I am grateful to you, Dame Janet, for reminding the Committee that we are debating the first batch of amendments on the amendment paper.

As the House was full last night when I commenced my speech and as every hon. Member was listening intently, I have no intention of wasting time going over the same ground. I know that the Minister of State, Foreign and

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), will be disappointed, but I shall merely summarise what I said, especially in relation to amendment No. 17, which is the third amendment in the batch and was discussed by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith).

Before the House heard last night's statement on Iraq, I was arguing that, far from assisting those of my hon. Friends who are in favour of the treaty, I understood article 2 to do the opposite. Although they may have thought that article 2 was better than a fig leaf covering all the ghastly following articles, it is all of a part with the rest of the treaty. To borrow a phrase from the old days of nuclear defence, the treaty is a "seamless web", starting with article 2 and continuing in that vein.

Some of my hon. Friend's speeches did not show proper respect for those who drafted the treaty. I never cease to admire the intellectual power of those who drafted it. I do not know who they are and I do not make a cynical or sarcastic point. I never cease to admire the intellectual elegance, despite the convoluted language, of the manner in which the matter has been framed. It has been thought out carefully from the beginning and the articles all fit in and work their way through to a conclusion. We should therefore not be flippant about the treaty and say that it does not mean this or that. It has been carefully and diligently thought out.

Article 2 contains three phrases dealing with economic matters, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East and other hon. Friends referred. Indeed, they referred to them as though they would have liked them to be in the Labour party manifesto. I was a little worried about that. The first phrase—and the most difficult—is "a high degree of convergence".

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East seemed to be saying that we were in favour of a high degree of convergence. The only convergence indicators that I can find as I look through the treaty are the reduction of inflation down to price stability—a euphemism for almost zero inflation—the reduction of budget deficits to 3 per cent. and 60 per cent., and the eventual locking of exchange rates.

6 pm

As I tried to argue last night, I do not agree with the treaty, but I understand that those convergence indicators are major factors. If the treaty wants to achieve a single currency in the foreseeable future—be it 1999 or 2001—and if it is to contain all the other convergence indicators that Opposition Members would want it to contain, such as gross domestic product, unemployment and income per capita, we shall never arrive at the ultimate goal of a single currency and economic and monetary union.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Like my right hon. Friend, I oppose the Bill and the treaty on many grounds, not least economic and political sovereignty, which would be substantially eroded if the measure were passed, but would not those in our own ranks—if not Conservative Members—who are in favour of the measure have improved their case had they said that they were in favour of what was agreed in the Maastricht treaty but could not in any circumstances support limiting GDP, which would substantially reduce public spending? That result would in turn give right-wing Governments further ammunition in their fight to introduce measures which would undoubtedly increase unemployment and lead to further deflation.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I shall come to the issue of excessive deficits, which was discussed at some length in yesterday's debate.

The next economic indicator referred to in article 2 is high employment. My hon. Friends made much of the phrase "high employment". My hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) thumbed through the treaty and found quite a few references not merely to high employment, but to "lasting high employment"—or was it "high and lasting employment?" I am not sure how the words were positioned.

We are all in favour of high employment. The treaty does not say anything about full employment, and I should be surprised if it did. It may mention unemployment somewhere. I see my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles thumbing through the treaty to see if he can find such a reference. I shall be surprised if he does. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford, who knows how the treaty was drafted, is smiling.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman ask his hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) to check by how much unemployment has increased in the European Economic Community compared with every other developed part of the world? That would give the right hon. Gentleman something to think about.

Mr. Davies: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles will deal with that issue. I was making a somewhat arid and textual point and saying that those who draft such measures are clever and understand what they are about. They would never mention unemployment. The monetarists—I do not use the word in a pejorative sense as I believe that monetary controls have a vital role to play in an economic system—believe that unemployment takes care of itself, so their only concern is to control inflation.

The phrase "high employment" is carefully chosen. Of course, everyone is in favour of high employment and the Government maintain that we now have it in Britain. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) laughs, but about 90 per cent. of what we used to call the insurable population—the employable population—are in fact employed. The Government have also maintained that there are more people in work now than at any other time. They even say that about Wales, where unemployment is high. The phrase "high employment" is carefully chosen by the clever people who draft such measures. The Minister of State smiles—I am not referring to him, although I am sure that he played a major part in drafting the treaty.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Garel-Jones): I am smiling because I think that the right hon. Gentleman is trying to imply that he is not a clever person but merely a common man speaking up. We all know better than that.

Mr. Davies: That is not what I was implying. I was merely stating that the phrase "high employment" was carefully chosen. If the unemployment level increased to 20 per cent. and 80 per cent. of the population was employed, many people would argue that that was high employment. I do not know the level at which it ceases to be high employment—that is a matter of debate.

I am sorry to say to my hon. Friends the Members for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and for Oxford, East and others that I do not think that there is much salvation or assistance in the phrase "high employment", which is part of the seamless web of the treaty.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Further to my hon. Friend's point, could not the Government defend the present disastrously high level of unemployment as "high employment" and do they not indeed do so?

Mr. Davies: That is the very point I was trying to make. Until one starts discussing very low levels of employment —perhaps lower than 90 per cent.—the matter is subjective.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I believe that my right hon. Friend is trying to distinguish between full employment and high employment, and is complaining that although the treaty refers to "high employment" it makes no mention of full employment. Will he define full employment? Does it mean 100 per cent. employment? If not, surely we are talking about high employment.

Mr. Davies: I am not distinguishing between high and full employment. I would have made the point that when we talk of full employment we all know that it is not 100 per cent. employment. I was merely arguing that the phrase "high employment" was chosen carefully because those who drafted the treaty did not wish it to make a specific commitment on unemployment. The thinking behind monetarist strategy—certainly as developed by the theorists in Europe in the 1980s, although it may be changing in the 1990s—is that employment takes care of itself.

Mr. Macdonald: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: No; my hon. Friend can make his own speech. I have made my point.

I shall not repeat what I said last night about non-inflationary growth, but some of my hon. Friends have gone to town on the subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool—who can perhaps be described as a member of the modernising tendency of the Labour party—wanted the subject to be contained in the Labour party manifesto. He said that everyone was in favour of non-inflationary growth. I noticed that as his speech and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East progressed, the term "non-inflationary growth" was dropped in favour of the word "growth". However, before one achieves non-inflationary growth one must have non-inflation. Those with modernist tendencies must be careful.

I am not sure about non-inflationary growth. I do not think that the residents of Hartlepool who own houses that they are trying to sell want non-inflationary growth. Most of middle England and the middle classes—perhaps I should say, à la Clinton, the working middle classes, although I do not think that the British middle classes would like to be called that—do not want non-inflationary growth. In fact, they are desperate for inflationary growth.

I caution my hon. Friends who are going a bundle on monetarist theory—as I have said, I do not use the term pejoratively—that they must treat that policy as part of a pattern. Non-inflationary growth fits in with a school of thinking which has existed for a considerable time: it existed in the 1970s and was developed, mostly as academic theories, in the 1980s. We must be careful when we try to gain assistance from specific phrases simply because they make up part of the treaty.

Title VI of the treaty—perhaps it should be subtitle VI, although I can see why it has been made title VI—deals with economic and monetary union. There is article 104c, which deals with excessive deficits, and article 105, which deals with monetary policy and sets up the European system of central banks. I will deal first with excessive deficits, because there was some dispute on this side of the Committee and my hon. Friends—certainly my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool—dealt with it at length.

We can agree that according to the treaty the budget deficit must not be more than 60 per cent. of gross domestic product, and Government debt—not strictly the public sector borrowing requirement, but Government debt—must not be more than 3 per cent. of GDP. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool—having told us that it is really all a matter of the broad sweep, the general interpretation, and that the politicians still have their hands on it all and therefore it is all right—proceeded to embark on a textual criticism of the article on excessive deficits. He looked at almost every comma and every word to try to show that it did not really mean 3 per cent. and that we would not be affected.

Then, after all this hoo-ha and argument, my hon. Friend came to a conclusion with which I agree. I tried to intervene to say this, but I do not criticise him for not giving way because he had given way so often. This is what he said, and I agree entirely:

"The main requirement in relation to the deficit is for progress to be made towards the target."—[Official Report, 13 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 1003.]

I cannot disagree with that statement. It is an almost ministerial type statement, well honed, well considered. We all admire the way my hon. Friend does these things and we all admired his speech. So the beautiful summing up of the article is that the main requirement is progress towards the target. The Financial Secretary may even repeat the words, taken from a Treasury brief, when he is winding up.

It does not have to be done in one year, of course. No one could get the Italian deficit down to 3 per cent. in one year; even those who framed this treaty in their ivory towers realise that. It is not a big bang theory at all; it is death by a thousand cuts. It will happen gradually because, as my hon. Friend says quite clearly, it is progress towards the target. The target we are concerned with is the percentage of GDP that the Government borrow. We understand that at the moment it is around 7 or 8 per cent., so the Government will no doubt start now, and will certainly have to start on 1 December 1994, if the Bill goes through the House and the treaty is ratified. The Government will have to start when stage 2 starts, not by imposition but gradually over the years, reducing that 7 per cent. to the 3 per cent. in the treaty. I am sure that my hon. Friend would not argue that that is wrong; it is what is said in the treaty.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): My right hon. Friend is being almost too generous with regard to these reference figures, 3 per cent. and 60 per cent., even allowing for the margin of movement, because both sub-clauses contain the words "close to" the reference level; they must be moving in the right direction and they must also be close to the reference level.

Mr. Davies: Yes, indeed, they have to, because the whole purpose of the exercise is to get eventually to economic and monetary union and a common currency.

This exercise will probably have to go on, because we shall not have arrived at 3 per cent. by the time the next Labour Government take over in 1996 or 1997. We may not have reached 3 per cent. by then; we may be around 5 per cent.—who knows? The Government of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) will come in faced with this. The Government will perhaps be composed of a number of parties. We may find as deputy Prime Minister the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown)—we do not know—and my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East having worked hard in his unproductive orchard, will by then have become Financial Secretary. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool will be a vigorous Back Bencher, striving to get Government money for the inner cities of the north-east, particularly Hartlepool. He will be asking my right hon. Friends for more money, but they will be looking at his speeches and quoting back at him his statement that we have to reach the target. He will have to go back to Hartlepool and explain matters to his constituency party. Young people, not only in Hartlepool but in Llanelli, who drive around in cars that are not theirs and put matches into petrol tanks will probably not come to any of our meetings, but it will have to be explained to them, too, somehow or other, that we cannot do much about it; it is there in the treaty and unfortunately the Lib-Lab Government, or whoever they may be, with the modernising tendency no doubt in the vanguard, will have gradually to start making cuts.

We may not have to cut expenditure, however; we may put up taxation. We have assumed that the way to get to the 3 per cent. is to cut public expenditure, but it is a reduction of Government debt and, as far as I am aware, there are two ways of reducing Government debt: reducing expenditure or increasing taxation, or a combination of the two. That choice will still be there.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool referred to "hands-on" politicians, and certainly the hands-on politician will have to decide whether we put up taxes or cut public expenditure.

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the way to balance the books is not to increase taxation but to increase revenue? Results in the past have shown that very often there has been an increased take from taxation accompanying a reduction in income tax.

Mr. Davies: I do not know whether the Laffer curve made any sense. If the hon. Gentleman wants to talk about the Laffer curve, which I believe was something drawn on the back of an envelope in a Washington restaurant, that is fine, but it is not something that we should go into at the moment.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: On this wonderfully fair-minded valuing of an increase in taxation or a decrease in expenditure, the Community is charged with trying to harmonise taxes, which constrains the ability of the Government to do one side of the accounting.

Mr. Davies: That is the point that I was seeking to make —that, even if there is this marvellous freedom of choice whether to increase taxes or cut public expenditure, there are constraints on taxation. If there is harmonisation of indirect taxes, that imposes constraints, and there may be other harmonisation measures.

Mr. Marlow: Just supposing that the mythical modernising future Labour Government are unable to tear up their election promises and are unable to fulfil the requirements of the treaty that some of his hon. Friends seem so ready to impose upon themselves at the moment, is it not the case that Community institutions, on the basis of a two-thirds majority of countries outside the United Kingdom, would be able to make the Government's task even more difficult by imposing fines upon them?

Mr. Davies: That is what will happen eventually, but it will not happen overnight; they will have another meeting, make a statement, bring a little pressure to bear here and there, and an application from the Hartlepool development corporation to the European Development bank for a loan will be refused. There are many ways of doing these things, and ultimately there may be a gunboat, or whatever —I do not know. Whatever happens, however, there will have to be compliance, because that is how the system works.

I do not think that we should underestimate the effect that the "excessive deficits" article will have on both parties' policies, and the constraints that it will place on them to spend judiciously with the aim of maintaining economic growth.

Mr. Spearing: Will my right hon. Friend also consider the issue of direct taxation? Under article 8a as it currently stands, there is to be no frontier within the union, but would not differentiation of direct taxation of income through labour ultimately constitute that? Given that there must be a level playing field in regard to skills, and in regard to firms employing people throughout the Community, might not differential income tax constitute a fiscal frontier which might be judged inconsistent with article 8a?

Mr. Davies: I do not know. Even now, in practice, we are constrained by the tax rates of other EC countries, because we trade with them now and will trade more with them in the future. Actual constraints already exist, whether or not they constitute legal constraints.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool made a marvellous speech, which is no more than we would expect of him. He had worked hard at that speech. At some stage, he threw out an observation about Delors 2. He said that he was in favour of it—which, of course, is perfectly all right. Delors 2 says that there should be more money in the budget; if it had been accepted, I believe that the budget would have been 1·8 or 1·9 per cent. of the gross domestic product of the 12 countries. However, I did not understand the reference to Delors 2 in the context of excessive deficits. On the one hand, we are told that we must cut our expenditure to an eventual 3 per cent.; on the other, we are told that we must find money to give Mr. Delors so that he has public expenditure funds to pay back to us.

I am sorry if I have done an injustice to my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool; that may not be what he meant. I made my comment en passant, as they say. In any event, he was right to mention Delors 2, which illustrates a real problem. Once countries embark on the exercise of converging economies without actually doing so—the exercise, in fact, of converging monetary and financial indicators—and establish a common currency, as the United States has done, massive transfers will be needed. Conservative Members may not agree with that—it may not accord with their philosophy—but many non-ideological economists will confirm that massive transfers are needed between, say, California and North Dakota.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): May I draw the right hon. Gentlemen's attention to a rather curious aspect of the matter? Hon. Members may belong to the Liverpool or the Cambridge school of economists, they may be Keynesians or monetarists, they may be Ministers, or they may be Opposition Front Benchers, but what unites virtually all hon. Members is the consensus that, at a time of recession, deficits should be allowed to widen. It is hoped, of course, that they will narrow at times of recovery. Why, given that this part of the treaty will deny consensus to the House, are we all expected to vote like sheep for such a ridiculous proposition?

Mr. Davies; That is a good point. I am not sure whether the religious school in Liverpool will agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said; certainly, it does not necessarily accord with strict monetarist philosophy.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a splendid example of the single currency and the single bank currently operates in the United Kingdom, where substantial amounts of taxpayers' funds are transferred from the well-paid to the poorer areas? The right hon. Gentleman comes from Wales, and I come from Scotland; we understand that system, have seen it in operation and do not disagree with it.

Mr. Davies: That is the point that I was trying to make. The same can be observed in the United States. In any event, massive transfers would be required.

In the 1970s, the McDougall report said that, with a common or single currency within economic and monetary union, transfers would have to constitute about 7 per cent. of GDP—and that was before Portugal, Spain and Greece joined the Community. We must now envisage a transfer of between 10 and 12 per cent. of GDP to alleviate the problem of unemployment in South Dakota, and to lessen the difference in wealth between it and California.

That money is not going to arrive, partly because it is not there and partly because no mechanism exists to provide it. The Germans are the paymasters, and they have problems in their own country; certainly, Britain cannot provide it. If no Government have the power to raise taxation at European level, the money will never be there. We are in the worst of all possible worlds. We have transferred democratic power, and we are moving towards a common currency, but we have none of the instruments needed to alleviate—I put it no higher than that—the concentration of economic power in a single currency.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that many of the economic problems suffered in 19th-century Ireland were due to a single currency? The Irish economy fell further and further behind. Another consequence was the mass emigration of the Irish population to the United Kingdom mainland.

Mr. Davies: I have enough problems trying to understand the treaty without going into Irish economics. The current Irish position is very interesting, however. I am told that Ireland has achieved economic success: apparently, it has managed to get inflation down to about 3 per cent.; meanwhile, interest rates have risen 100 per cent. overnight, and unemployment stands at at least 17 per cent. of the people who are left in the country. That, evidently, is the blueprint. The French socialists have pursued the same policies. It is a modernising party, which has not existed for long and looks as though, after the next election, it will not exist at all.

Labour Members sometimes refer fondly to the French socialist party as our sister party. I used to be Labour's defence spokesman; the youngsters in the House will not remember that. Sometimes I would go and talk to members of the French socialist party. "Sister party" may not have been the right description.

The French socialists sold out very early. Now France has a strong economy: it has been stronger than the British economy for a long time. It has low inflation, along with rising unemployment, high interest rates and the "franc fort", which is practically a Vichy franc: it is locked into the Bundesbank and is desperate for support. Come March, we shall see a proliferation of parties, the breakdown of the present Government and all sorts of problems. I remind my hon. Friends that that does not apply only to France; the left in Europe had better start thinking, because all these developments are destroying it.

The beneficiaries will not be the Christian Democrats. The Minister does not like the Christian Democrats. I will tell his relations in my constituency about that. He said yesterday that he did not like them. Nice Herr Kohl will not be the beneficiary of all this because lots of nasty people far to his left will benefit from it. So if the modernising tendency thinks that this is some kind of modernising blueprint for the Labour party, let them just look at the French socialist party.

6.30 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): The right hon. Member modestly reminds us that he has been a defence spokesman for his party. With even greater modesty, he omitted to say that before that he was a Treasury Minister for the Labour Government in the mid-1970s. We have enjoyed his extremely amusing speech, particularly his obsession with his hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and his speech last night—subject to reading the record carefully, I think that he mentioned his hon. Friend 27 times—but I remember what he said when he was a Treasury Minister. It is a long time ago and the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I bring up something of great importance: he has refused ever since to retract it, but I remember it vividly and it is on record in Hansard. He said that the proportion of the French population engaged in agriculture in those days was 25 per cent. I remember that I and other hon. Members asked him to correct the figure because it was 7 per cent., but he refused to do so. Notwithstanding his hugely amusing speech, therefore, how can we attach any credence to what he is saying now? [Interruption.]

Mr. Davies: It is all right, I knew what the hon. Gentleman was going to say. He says it all the time. He caught me out on one occasion. When he is a Minister —if he can keep working at it, I hope that he will eventually become one—I will try and catch him out.

I have referred to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool not because of anything to do with him personally but because he is a representative of the modernising tendency in the Labour party, and I am very concerned that the modernisation goes ahead properly, without leading to the destruction of the party. I was merely pointing out that the kind of modernisation carried out by the French socialist party has not worked very well.

In any event, I will move on to article 105 and the European central bank. The bank is to be the instrument for the control of inflation and of monetary policy. It is quite interesting to look at the set-up because, as one of my hon. Friends said, it is called the European system of central banks. It is described in this way because the Germans have plonked into the middle of this treaty their own federal system of the Bundesbank which has lots of other little banks all round the Länderbanks. So when this goes through, and after the statute has been brought in to make the Bank of England more or less autonomous according to the statutes of the central bank, we, too, shall have a Länderbank which will be the Bank of England, as it were, on the outside and the European central bank in the middle.

The object of the central bank is to control inflation by monetary means. It is a monetarist treaty. The belief is that inflation can be controlled only by monetary means. There is a lot of mythology about this, about reserves and corsets and things like that, but monetary control is basically a matter of interest rates and, in the end, whatever few extra reserves the Bundesbank puts into the economy or the Bank of England takes out, whatever straitjackets are put round, whatever dual rates of interest the French may play with—the commercial or the financial franc—control of monetary policy is about interest rates, and the object of the central bank is to control interest rates.

The control of interest rates is the prime instrument for trying to arrive at price stability. Price stability means getting as close as possible to zero inflation, not every price being stable but there being stability across the board and prices not moving up and down. So the bank exists and it is autonomous for that very reason because, as Mr. Gavin Davies, who works for Goldman Sachs, pointed out in a perceptive article in The Independent this week, the theory used to be, and the continental theory still is, that the control of inflation is a technical matter and that, because it is technical, it should be taken out of the hands of politicians and put on auto-pilot. The matter is then dealt with purely technically, with no consideration of output, growth or unemployment.

This, too, reminds me of my days as defence spokesman. I think it was Edward Teller or one of his ilk who devised something called the doomsday machine. They did not believe that people could actually carry out deterrence; in other words, politicians might not unleash the weapons when the time came. The only way deterrence could work was to programme this doomsday machine, and when the Russian missiles passed a certain point, half-way across the Atlantic or wherever, the machine would trigger off the American response and the Russians would know that.

It would be a bit like that for control of inflation. The autonomous bank is the auto-pilot and merely carries out decisions. When my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool was speaking yesterday, one or two hon. Members interrupted from a sedentary position to say that this was nonsense, that the Bundesbank was not independent, that it listened to politicians and that it was subject to pressure. Obviously, even the Bundesbank cannot live in a complete vacuum, but those of my hon. Friends who fondly believe that the Bundesbank is not autonomous should just talk to former Chancellor Schmidt. What happened to him in 1980 or 1981? He is convinced that, by refusing to go along with what he wanted, the Bundesbank brought down his Government. But we have no need to go back as far as 1981; we need only look at what is happening now. So the Bundesbank is as autonomous as it is possible to be and, on a European scale, it will be even more autonomous because it will not have a Government breathing down its neck: it will have something called ECOFIN which seems to figure broadly in some debates, but there will be no Government there even to make speeches and tell the bank what it should do. The bank is autonomous, it decides on interest rates and, as we have seen, it does so without too much consideration of the effects.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to article 2 of the treaty and what it says, because this is what article 105 on monetary policy is related to? Perhaps he will tell the Committee if he is in favour of the objectives in article 2, which reads,

> "It shall be the aim of the Community, by establishing a Common Market and progressively approximating the economic policies of Member States, to promote throughout the Community a harmonious development of economic activities, a continuous and balanced expansion, an increased stability, an accelerated raising of the standard of living and closer relations between its Member States."

That is what article 2 says, and the means of achieving this is said to be the establishment of the central bank.

Mr. Davies: I have dealt with article 2. I tried last night, but no one was listening. I tried just now, but again the hon. Gentleman was not listening. So I will not go back to it.

I turn now to the split between economic and monetary policy inherent in setting up the bank. It seems to me very silly, to use a not particularly elegant word, to split economic policy from monetary policy. We have seen what is happening in Germany today. I am not saying that the problems in east Germany could be alleviated easily if there were no separate Bundesbank, but if ever there was an exercise to demonstrate that perhaps it does not make sense to separate economic policy from monetary policy, east Germany is it.

The German Government want to increase public expenditure to revive the economy of east Germany, but the Bundesbank, quite properly, pays not a blind bit of interest because, by statute, it is concerned only with the internal value of the currency. In a sedentary intervention —I think that I heard him right—my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said that during reunification the Germans exchanged one east mark for one west mark. That, apparently, was a good example of how politicians can overrule the Bundesbank. That is not true. The Bundesbank is concerned only with the internal value of the mark, which basically is inflation. That is why

Mr. Kohl was able to offer—in an expensive and damaging way—one west mark for one east mark. Karl Otto Pöhl resigned because he disagreed with what the Government were doing, but that was within the province of the Government, not the Bundesbank.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: The hon. Gentleman is making a terribly important speech. I do not recall reading in the Labour party's manifesto—for which, I know, the right hon. Gentleman is not responsible—or in our manifesto a proposal to set up an independent British central bank. I should like to know when that became Labour policy and whether the right hon. Gentleman thinks that it is an appropriate device for effecting a fundamental change in our economic management through the surrogacy of this Maastricht treaty. The House has not debated the principles behind an independent central bank for this country alone, yet we are legislating for it without a proper debate.

Mr. Davies: That is right; it is article 108, I think, which will be enacted under the Bill.

I am told that an independent, autonomous British bank is Labour policy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Since when?"] It was decided by the non-modernised Labour party at last year's conference—I do not know what the modernised one will do. In a short composite resolution, it decided that the Bank of England should be independent or autonomous. I prefer "autonomous". My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool is good on words. Perhaps he appreciates that the word "autonomous" conveys the impression a bit better.

All I am saying is that the proposed split is very silly, but the mistake is being repeated with the European central bank. The European central bank will be responsible for the internal value of the ecu. We were told yesterday, "It is all right; the exchange rate of the ecu will be determined by politicians". I do not disagree. The external value of the ecu will be floating. I do not think that perfect floating can be achieved, but party policy is managed floating. I do not know what that is, so I had better read the conference resolution. I am confused because apparently we must have fixed exchange rates at the moment, but once we have reached the promised land the ecu will float.

Mr. Shepherd: I can bring the right hon. Gentleman hot news from the Frost interview with the Prime Minister. Maastricht is slightly out of date as the Prime Minister is working on a world exchange rate mechanism: the Japanese yen and United States dollar will be intimately linked in this more universalist approach. I know that some foolish hon. Members—even Conservative Members—have giggled at the suggestion, but the right hon. Gentleman should impress on the House the importance of these developments.

Mr. Davies: A world ERM is basically Bretton Woods. Finally——

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): More.

6.45 pm

Mr. Davies: I have run out of things to say.

What depresses me about my colleagues who are in favour of this European venture is that they now tend to deny it. I should have thought that the ends justify the means and that they would rejoice in the convergence criteria, the central bank and everything that has been set up because the object is to achieve EMU and a single currency as soon as possible.

Previous members of my party—the Jenkinses and Levers—would have rejoiced and said, "The pain is all worth it; the end is justified by the means", which is almost a Leninist approach to economic and political life.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Would the right hon. Gentleman like to add to his general list of subjects for rejoicing the fact that the promised land is not yet upon us? The Danish Government have resigned, which I understand will mean that the Danish referendum will be held later, so those who support Maastricht will have to wait a little longer for heaven on earth.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): On a point of order, Dame Janet. Can what we have just heard affect the way in which time is assigned to the Bill? The Prime Minister gave a clear assurance that the Bill will not be given a Third Reading until after the second Danish referendum. If the second referendum is to be postponed by a change of Government and a possible general election in Denmark, that gives us much more time to discuss fully every clause of the Bill, and neither the Government nor anyone else should be in any hurry.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Dame Janet. This is momentous news. It was the intention of the previous lamented Danish Government to put the Edinburgh conclusions to the people of Denmark in a second plebiscite or referendum. There is now no Government in Denmark. The next Danish Government might decide that they do not want to proceed further with this rotten treaty. As there is much uncertainty, is not it appropriate for a Minister to inform the House of the Government's proposals in these new circumstances? It is futile and fatuous for us to continue the debate when there is no Government in Denmark, no prospect of a referendum, and probably no prospect that the treaty will proceed in Denmark. Why proceed with the debate when the whole thing is stone dead?

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Further to the point of order, Dame Janet. Before the Committee gets overexcited, may I point out that sometimes we imagine that we are at the centre of the world, but occasionally are reminded that we are not? So far as I know, only the Danish Prime Minister has resigned. As the Conservative party knows only too well, and as the Opposition know to our cost, that does not automatically mean a general election.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that I can now answer the point, having heard the points of order. As Chairman of this Committee of the whole House, I have no responsibility for other Governments or what impact they might have. My only concern is with the Committee stage before us.

Mr. Dykes: I have a point of order, Dame Janet, but not exactly on that point, which I am not seeking to follow, as you have given us your conclusion, for which we thank you.

Can you guide the House? Many hon. Members on both sides are shocked and angered by the anti-Europeans saying that the sovereignty of this Chamber and this Parliament is sacrosanct and not to be negotiated away; yet they are constantly harping on the constitutional activities of another country and saying that they should be considered before we come to a decision. Can you guide the Committee?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Yes. That is not a point of order for the Chair. As the hon. Member well knows, hon. Members must be responsible for what they say.

Mr. Davies: If the Danish Government had resigned I was proposing to go on for another hour, but as it was just the Danish Prime Minister I shall sit down. I merely say that these are fundamental issues both for my party and for the House and there is also the question of democracy to be taken into account quite apart from economic policy. No doubt we can come back to these matters when we reach further amendments. I think that we should look at them in the interests of the economy of this country and I see nothing here that will do other than cause damage.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): We have listened to an impressive speech from the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). He is genuinely one of those witty speakers to whom one could listen for hours. Indeed, we did. Despite the usual courtesies, the right hon. Gentleman will, of course, wish to leave the Chamber quite rapidly and I well understand that, because clearly his constituents will want to know that the speech he made in the Committee this afternoon and last evening brought down the Danish Prime Minister. That is obviously momentous news. It is quite difficult to follow that speech and I shall endeavour to be slightly briefer, but the right hon. Gentleman has made important points on this cluster of amendments.

The fact that the Danish Prime Minister may have resigned is obviously of great interest to this Committee, but in the midst of a well-attended Committee session we should value the fact that the Committee is scrutinising the Maastricht Bill for itself. The provisions of the Bill are important to the Committee and this country and the attitudes in another country are not of immediate importance, Indeed, the timetable that the Prime Minister has set forth, to complete Third Reading by May at the latest, would still be valid and if the Danes decided to delay their referendum we would clearly maintain that timetable because the original intention was on the basis that the Prime Minister believed that the Danes would have had an earlier referendum.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: I am at a loss to understand quite the point, because as I understand it the Foreign Secretary has assured us that if the Danes fail to ratify the treaty, it is dead. Therefore, this Committee hangs upon the events that take place in Denmark. I should point out to my hon. Friend that I was a Member, as was he, when we passed, lamentably, the Bill called the Football Spectators Bill. The House was marched to the passing of a statute which hung upon someone else's judgment. That is self-denigratory and humbling to this Committee and inappropriate for the passing of great legislation. The truth of the matter is that if the Foreign Secretary's statement stands, the Committee's deliberations are consequential on what the Danes do.

Mr. Taylor: With great respect to my hon. Friend, who is a learned constitutional expert, the reality is that this Committee's deliberations on the Bill are the responsibility of this Committee. The fact that the whole Maastricht treaty may be rendered invalid by the Danish decision is a separate matter. But there are very great differences to the interests of this country according whether or not we merely respond to what the Danes do.

I strongly hope that this country and this Parliament will make their own decisions. If, subsequently, the Danes were not to ratify the treaty, clearly the 12 members of the Community would need to get together and the Foreign Secretary has rightly said that the Danish membership of the Community is as important as that of the other members, in the sense that there are 12 members of the Community.

That is not the same thing as delaying decisions in this Committee because decisions may be delayed in another country. I strongly think that this Committee should take itself sufficiently seriously to make sure that we conduct our deliberations on the treaty in this country's interests.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Member for giving way because he may be surprised to know that I welcome almost everything he has just said, but has he not forgotten one important factor? Unless the Folketing recommends that the consequences of the decision taken in Edinburgh will precipitate another referendum or unless the Danes believe that those recommendations can be made—and they were made, were they not, and negotiated, perhaps for completely different reasons, by the Prime Minister who has only just resigned—is it not possible that another Prime Minister will make another recommendation? There is as yet no full guarantee that any referendum will take place. In those circumstances, at least the need for speed or indeed for any further proceedings at all may disappear.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my old sparring partner, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), for his support and I may store that up for the future as well. On the wider point, we do not know what the Danish Parliament will do, but the idea that we should suspend these discussions because we do not know——

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North) rose——

Mr. Taylor: I am endeavouring to answer the first point, then I will give way.

Mr. Radice: I was trying to help.

Mr. Taylor: Let me help myself before the hon. Member helps me, if I may. The reality is that seven of the eight Danish parties are now, effectively, in favour of what the Danish Government negotiated, so I think that we should stop second-guessing the Danish situation and look at our own.

The point about the amendments in this group is that they effectively remove the amendments to the treaty of Rome that were negotiated at Maastricht. We have heard various arguments about why that should be the case. The difficulty I find is that those who support the amendments before us would therefore be left with the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act unchanged. That is particularly interesting for my hon. Friend for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who is not with us at present. The fact that he supported the Single European Act is a matter of interest and slight confusion for many of the rest of us. I raised this in the debate in Committee in December and it was raised again yesterday. The fact is that it was the Single European Act that made the dramatic step forward from the treaty of Rome and the arguments that were used yesterday, that the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act were all about an economic community, as if we had never left EFTA, are clearly and self-evidently bogus.

In the treaty of Rome there are many references to matters other than economics and if one looks at the Single European Act one will find that it added many items other than those specifically connected with the single market, the 1992 programme. The chapter headings of the Single European Act themselves indicate that social policy was very much in the forefront of the minds of the people who negotiated the treaty, and economic and monetary co-operation, with "union" in brackets, were also very much in the forefront of people's minds with the consequences that flowed from that, which are, of course, not just free trade consequences.

Indeed even in title II, article 3, there were several insertions into the activities of the Community made by the Single European Act. One of them was policy in the social sphere compromising the European social fund, for example. Another was strengthening of economic and social cohesion.

It is impossible to say that if we were to abolish all the changes made in the Maastricht treaty we would be left with something that was about economics. That is simply not the case.

It is interesting that, had he but realised it, my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford was in some difficulty with the grounds on which he chose to defend his position. In order to achieve the 1992 programme—the 285 measures required to create a free market with free movement of goods, people, services and capital—we had to have a series of strong Community institutions and a strong referee to ensure that the measures were applied evenly —I shall deal with that issue later—and we had to overcome the protectionist instincts that could arise over a variety of issues in any of the member countries. That was understood by our then Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher. It was why the Single European Act embraced qualified majority voting.

In order to arrive at the very thing that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford defends himself as having supported, we had to strengthen the institutions that he now says he cannot abide and which he regards as marking the end of Britain as we know it. That is bogus. We joined the European Community in the 1970s, after a big debate, because it was believed to be in Britain's interests that there should not be built on the continent a bloc which we failed to influence.

Indeed, we joined the Community to prevent something which, in the 1950s, we thought would never happen—the solidifying of the Franco-German alliance. That is an important point. As a Labour Foreign Secretary, Anthony Crosland, remarked, it represented the first permanent attachment of Britain to the continent since the Reformation. It was the first time that we believed that we had to make such a commitment to prevent what has always been part of British foreign policy, which is that there should not be a continental bloc that we would be unable to influence. Influencing it was so essential to us that we joined the Community with all the infrastructure that it embraced.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): My hon. Friend is taking great pains to explain that the Community was never only about economics and spoke about our joining the "European Community". In fact, we did not join the European Community—we joined the European Economic Community. If he asks his constituents, he will find that they believe that we principally joined a Common Market and were not involving ourselves in other political institutions. I believe that, until the Maastricht treaty is ratified, the title is still the EEC. If the treaty is not ratified, it will remain so.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend takes a great interest in these matters, but I advise him to have another look at the treaty of Rome. The fact that the Community was called "the European Economic Community" should not delude us into believing that that meant it had nothing to do with anything other than free trade. For heaven's sake, we left a free trade area to join the Community. We knew what the institutional structure was——

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Taylor: Please let me finish this point, and then I shall willingly give way.

We knew what the institutional structure was when we joined. We knew that the Community's ambitions covered a range of issues and could not be achieved by free trade alone. The institutional structure has been apparent since we joined, and we knew what we were in for. Indeed, the words "European Community" have been used in all except legal documents in the Community since 1978. We had nearly 10 years' warning of what we were doing when we signed the Single European Act.

Mr. Bill Walker: May I clarify a point? My hon. Friend was drawing the Reformation into his argument. What date was the Reformation in Britain?

Mr. Taylor: The Reformation took place before I entered Parliament. I shall not bandy points about the Reformation with my respected hon. Friend from Scotland because that would lead us into other difficulties, but it was a very long time ago.

If one considers the history of the Community since the mid-1950s, it is clear that all along we have been part of an economic and political community and that many of its objectives were to be attained by involving ourselves in institutional structures and political debate.

This group of amendments, which would wipe out the changes made at Maastricht, would still leave us with an intensely political community. We must ask ourselves whether that is an ideal situation, and the answer is no. In many cases, what people in this country determined had gone wrong since the Single European Act was passed was on the agenda for correction at Maastricht, and the British Government were able to put much of it right for themselves.

For example, since I came to the House in 1987 there have been many late-night debates about the misuse of Community funds. One of the problems was that no one had sufficient clout or sufficient evidence to point the finger. One of the changes made in the Maastricht treaty is that the Court of Auditors is given institutional status, which is an extremely good thing. Also, the European Parliament is given greater powers of scrutiny of monetary and budgetary matters and can call the Commissioners to greater account. The Committee should welcome such developments.

Another objection that has been raised many times in the Committee is, "While we abide by the rules, chaps, the other lot don't." That is probably true, even though the rules by which we abide are often more onerous than those facing other countries because our civil servants have been particularly zealous in interpreting the rules in the first place. However, I shall leave that issue aside.

The treaty negotiated at Maastricht involves a strengthening of the powers of the European Court of Justice. Before there is shock and horror at the fact that the European Court of Justice should be involved at all, let us be clear—my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) should pay careful attention to this—that by joining the European Community on 1 January 1973 we effectively accepted the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice. It is not a new concept which has suddenly emerged.

The new set of regulations and powers given to the Community to put the single market in place after the Single European Act did not entail a consequent increase in the powers of the European Court of Justice to ensure that the rules were applied by those who agreed them. I hope that the British public will become aware that it is in our interests to apply the Maastricht treaty provisions because they answer one of the great public concerns, which is, why do we appear to be at a disadvantage compared to many other countries?

Mr. Richard Shepherd: There is no question but that the European Court of Justice existed in the 1970s, but one of the issues that concern some of us is that at that time its remit was strictly limited to the European Economic Community, but the change explicit in the treaty broadens the range of its jurisdiction. By removing the word "economic" we have given it a catholicity of ranges and remits. That is the fundamental difference which causes much anxiety to many Conservatives.

Mr. Taylor: If that were the case, I could understand such anxieties, but what my hon. Friend says is not technically correct. The European Court of Justice is given jurisdiction over everything in the treaty of Rome. Therefore, it is also given jurisdiction over everything that emerged from the Single European Act which is consolidated in the treaty of Rome. As I said, the Single European Act was not about a free trade area alone.

I understand my hon. Friend's concerns and there are issues over which I would not wish the European Court of Justice to have jurisdiction. If one reads the treaty of Maastricht, one finds that it does not have jurisdiction over the two new pillars being constructed on foreign and security policy and on matters of justice—to put it technically, those matters are not justiciable.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): There is a complete misconception here. The Commission can be given jurisdiction. Matters can be referred to the European Court of Justice. With regard to the misconceptions that are being put forward by the Government, I can give references. First, the Commission is fully associated under articles J.9 and K.4(2), and it can draft legislation under article K.3(2). Furthermore, any legislation may be implemented by special convention under article 100c. Therefore, my hon. Friend cannot say that these matters are beyond the jurisdiction of the court and the Commission.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend has made an interesting point, but he will be aware that, with regard to the pillar to which I am referring, the Commission is involved. But the Commission does not have the power of initiation, and that makes a very big difference. My hon. Friend will know that the European political co-operation procedure for foreign policy that was established under the Single European Act involved the Commission. But the European Court of Justice does not have power to render the elements of those two pillars justiciable in the way that it does in the case of the treaties of Rome. That is why, during this Committee stage, we are not faced with those matters of foreign security policy and justice. Those matters are outwith the Bill because they do not make amendments to the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way as I realise that frequent breaks in a speech disturb its pattern. I must refer him back to the provisions relating to co-operation in the fields of justice and home affairs. Article K.9 is important as it says:

> "The Council, acting unanimously on the initiative of the Commission or a Member State, may decide to apply Article 100c of the Treaty".

Article 100c is therefore brought into play. I do not wish to be pedantic; I simply want to know what my hon. Friend thinks about that.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend confirms my point. In respect of such matters, Governments make unanimous decisions in the Council.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): It is opting in rather than opting out.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend comes to my rescue technically. The reality, however, is that this is very different from the unquestioned nature of the power of the European Court of Justice under the treaties of Rome. The precise fact is that the Maastricht treaty has clearly separated the other two pillars. Only with unanimous support under article K.9, which has been cited, will reference to the European Court of Justice come into effect. All these things are important.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Taylor: Interventions make the debate exciting from my point of view, but they may not please other Members who wish to speak. I shall very happily give way in a moment.

Let me put all of this in context. The treaty of Rome and the Single European Act—taken together, parts of the treaties of Rome—are, in effect, an expression of Britain's acceptance that it is a part of an economic and political community and that certain decisions are more in the interests of the British people if there is co-operation through the institutions of the Community, sometimes even with qualified majority voting.

Yesterday, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) made the point that, because of the changes that might be made under economic and monetary union, we would see almost the end of Britain's nationhood. That, I think, is slightly over the top.

In economic and monetary terms, Britain is a particularly exposed nation as it is heavily dependent on trading. For a very long time, this country has been buffeted by changes in other countries. Whether or not we are in the exchange rate mechanism, monetary policies set in other countries determine monetary policies in this country. We cannot be isolated. Indeed, that is why, after we left the exchange rate mechanism in September, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, quite rightly, continued to make it clear that British monetary policy could not ignore the monetary policies being set in other countries and, indeed, that he could not set British monetary policy without watching the effect on the exchange rate. He was not attempting to excuse what had happened with regard to the ERM; he was simply recognising the facts.

It is very important to make the point that the Community itself has free movement of capital. No member country has the right to reimpose exchange controls. I accept that there have been breaches of this in the past few months. [Laughter.] Hon. Members should be cautious with their hilarity. Let them take note of how quickly the controls have been removed again. The reinstatement was temporary, and the controls were removed. Ireland is a notable example.

We were the first to abolish exchange controls, and we want the Community to have no exchange controls. However, the very important consequence is that capital finds the home that it most wants to find. If any of our domestic policies are out of line with those of other member countries, capital will find a different home. That applies to industry and to investors in Government bonds. A Government with a very high deficit cannot ignore the fact that some of the deficit may have to be funded abroad. That is the situation in which we currently find ourselves.

7.15 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The hon. Member is presenting a very interesting defence of what I regard as a pretty indefensible position. Does not he accept that if the principle by which the European economic policy is to be run is that capital will find the home that is most suitable to it, any social policies relating to housing, unemployment—or employment—and the environment are bound to take second place? Is not that at the very heart of this whole debate?

Mr. Taylor: I am very grateful to the hon. Member for his intervention. That is precisely the point I wish to make. The reality is that it is not a question whether we can isolate ourselves, whether we can protect British monetary policy, surrounding it with a barrier. The question is: what sorts of policies flow from the conclusion that we have to respect what other countries are doing? That leads to a series of political decisions. The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and I will differ as to how to protect social, housing and other benefits. Those are matters that become a series of priorities in the domestic debate.

With regard to the point that I think is significant, the hon. Gentleman will not like what I have to say. Yesterday, his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) did a few political contortions in an effort to make the best of what might be a bad job. The significant point is that the debate in the Community itself is political. Philosophies bring much to bear on the outcome even of negotiations on treaties. For example, it has not always been known to be strong Labour policy that the principle of an open-market economy, with free competition, should be enshrined in the treaty. But I am glad to say it is enshrined in article 3A because even socialist Governments, such as in France, have been strongly influenced by Conservative thinking over many years. They have been prepared to see right at the centre of the treaty statements with which Conservatives here strongly agree and which strengthen our desire to see the Maastricht treaty ratified as it enshrines many of the political values that we hold dear.

The European system of central banks and everything that flows from it have price stability as a principal tenet. Such things are acceptable to the Conservative party, but probably less acceptable to the Opposition. But that is party politics; it is not a question that arises from whether or not we are in the Community. The reality is that countries that are interdependent with regard to monetary policy do not sit down and ignore what is going on, but get stuck in.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South spoke about the problems of sovereignty. The clever action taken over economic and monetary union was not that we negotiated ourselves an opt-out—I disagree with the Minister of State about the use of that phrase—but that we negotiated ourselves an opt-in. In the process, we maintain parliamentary sovereignty. It is important to remember in that respect that we have not bound a successor Parliament. Meanwhile, we have the right to examine the matter and to influence the institutions that will be set up, including their character and objectives.

I agree that, for those who want nothing to do with it, that is not much of a bonus. They might say, "We shall pack our bags and go home. We do not like this game." But those of us who recognise that we are totally interdependent in the Community—by the facts of the matter, many of which stem from the very action that hon. Members who are now against Maastricht support, including the 1992 programme and the single market—appreciate that we must influence the institutions. And in that process of influencing them, we must make sure that they have the right objectives, which is why I welcome many of the phrases that are used, such as "open market economy" and "free competition."

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Taylor: I give way to the hon. Gentleman because his tie is irresistible.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman's argument is jejune. There is a huge difference between being influenced by economic and monetary policies in other countries—we are influenced by them because we are part of the same world—and being required, even compelled, to maintain our exchange rate within 6 percentage points of DM2·95. Influence is inevitable, but compulsion to maintain relativity in exchange rates is a different matter. If the hon. Gentleman believes that we have influence because we are part of an institution, perhaps he will explain what influence we had on the reshaping, restructuring and realignment of the ERM by virtue of being a member of it.

Mr. Taylor: We are not compelled to do anything in the ERM. It was a British Government decision—I supported it; I am not fudging that—to enter and maintain that rate. We have discussed that subject at great length and I shall not today be deflected into discussing the rights and wrongs of German internal domestic policy, of which I have considerable criticisms, which I have aired to my German friends rather than simply in the House.

When we come to the third stage, the House will make its decision. Convergence is an important issue and many factors set out in the treaty about convergence do not make me feel uncomfortable. That does not mean that I would want us tomorrow to reduce our deficit to 3 per cent. of GDP. With that I would be uncomfortable. But I am not uncomfortable with the long-term objective, and no Government who, over a period—let us leave that undefined—believe in a balanced budget would feel uncomfortable with that.

That reinforces my argument because, given that we are interdependent in the Community—only in the Community is there the Single European Act consequence of the free movement of capital to which I referred—convergence is a desirable objective. There are various means by which to create convergence, and we could discuss that at length, but, given that convergence is a desirable objective, I have no problem with it in relation to the treaty.

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friend will agree that we Conservatives believe in market forces. Is he saying that there is a right rate for any market? If so, what is the right rate for the pound to the deutschmark at any time? If there is no right rate for a market, there is no right time to join an exchange rate mechanism, and the country cannot afford to go through that again.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend and I have differed in many debates about the merits of managed currencies and exchange rate mechanisms. I suggest that it is inconceivable that, in a market with free flows of capital, there is no policy towards exchange rates. I fear that we must continue to differ.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North) rose——

Mr. Taylor: My generosity in having given way will be criticised because of the length of my speech, so I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give way further.

The Maastricht treaty gives Britain many opportunities, the anticipation of some of which have appeared over the years on our party political agendas. For example, an aspect of the treaty is that we try to bring the whole workings of the Community closer to its citizens. We shall later have a chance to debate the technicalities of subsidiarity or minimum intervention, and I shall not deal with that now.

Let us not ignore the fact that there are several initiatives in the treaty for creating greater openness and accountability, for giving British citizens the ability to refer to an ombudsman cases of maladministration in the Community and the greater powers of the European Parliament. Also we should take into account the stress on national Parliaments. It is the first time that such an ability has arisen. It is up to the Committee to interpret it and I welcome its appearance in the treaty. We should be pleased at the inclusion of those matters and support them. They strengthen matters and I urge the Committee not to throw those gains away simply because a vociferous few here are concerned with the institutions which were set up in the 1950s and which we joined in the 1970s.

The Community will not remain static. The treaty that we are discussing has considerable benefits for Britain, not least the fact that the move to ever-closer union, to which we have been attached since the 1970s, can now be seen to take a wider route than it took previously, for there can now be an intergovernmental route to closer union. That is what the pillars are about on foreign policy and justice matters.

It has been shown in the treaties of Rome that the centralising instinct and inevitability that some people—I am not among them—wish to see in the Community have been arrested through the principle of subsidiarity. It is not a question whether on every issue we can define that down to the last dot and comma. The implication of what is on the face of the treaty means realistically that habits in the Community will change—they already are changing—and we have seen flesh being put on that principle at Birmingham and Edinburgh.

The Maastricht treaty has many advantages for Britain in areas about which hon. Members rightly believe that we should take particular care. It avoids a pre-commitment at a future date to a single currency and economic and monetary union. The interest of the House is protected in the treaty. We shall have the opportunity to debate that later. As is stated in the Treasury memorandum in the appendix to the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, we are not automatically bound to rejoin the ERM simply by ratifying the treaty.

I put my cards on the table. I believe that some form of ERM is inevitable. Constitutionally, the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South on that issue do not hold water, and the Financial Secretary made that clear in the debate yesterday. I urge the House to address the treaty as part of what we are already committed to and as a measure that strengthens, rather than weakens, British interests, which does not undermine the position of the House, and which has advantages that we should do more to explain to the British people, who would then perhaps understand why we should be scrutinising the Bill rather than moving towards a referendum. The House is the right place in which to examine the Bill, and I hope that that will continue to be the case during the Committee stage.

7.30 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) and I disagree about almost everything in economics and politics, but there is one aspect of his speech with which I agree. Rightly and properly, frankly and openly, the hon. Gentleman described the character of the treaty, and said that it represented his monetarist political values. I too have come to that conclusion, and that is why I oppose the monetarist nature of the convergence cum monetary union in the treaty.

The hon. Gentleman's speech was open and honest, and it showed the differences between us—the reasons why I shall not support the inclusion of title II. At the heart of the treaty, and at the heart of title II, lies monetary union —monetary union, moreover, of a particular character, which the hon. Member for Esher sensibly and openly described as taking a monetarist route.

During the past day or so of debate, it has been said that at least the treaty provides enough flexibility, and enough of an alternative opportunity to pursue convergence and monetary union by other processes. In that connection, much has been said about the famous article 2. I do not need to dwell long on that, because my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) gave us a useful critical and textual analysis of it. I shall be rather more generous than he was about article 2, because I recognise that some of its wording—the references to high employment, social cohesion, and the rest—means that its tone and character are——

Mr. Austin Mitchell: An improvement.

Mr. Rowlands: Yes, an improvement—although, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli said, even article 2 contains more than a germ of monetarist thinking.

I shall show that, unfortunately, from that point the quality of article 2 is somewhat demoted as the processes and nature of the draft monetary union are revealed to us. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and, to a certain extent, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said that there was a route to monetary union based on growth, investment and jobs, and that the terms of the treaty made it possible to hold those objectives as central.

I have to tell my hon. Friends that I do not believe that that is feasible in anything like the time scale envisaged for the treaty. Such concepts of growth, and convergence based on those sentiments, would require a continuous consistent economic policy to be followed by 12 democratically elected Governments over a considerable period.

I have spent nearly 25 years in the House arguing for some convergence between my constituency and the United Kingdom average. One could have thought that convergence of the economies of regions and communities within one country would be a simple task compared with convergence involving 12 countries, but I have to report to the House that, according to the latest figures, which relate to 1991 or 1992, the county of Mid Glamorgan, part of which I represent, has only 72 per cent. of the United Kingdom GDP per head—and the ratio is getting worse. The figure has fallen from 79 per cent. to 72 per cent.

Even within the United Kingdom, I have seen no convergence between the community that I represent and the rest of the United Kingdom; I have seen a divergence of economic success, wealth and performance—so I find it hard to believe in convergence. I may be unduly pessimistic, but I think that I am realistic in believing that convergence and monetary union are not likely to be achieved by the dream route, with investment and jobs at its centre, in anything like the time scale envisaged in the treaty.

Furthermore, that is not what is on offer in the treaty. Although article 2 sets an improved tone, after that its role is demoted both in the process of moving towards monetary union and in the final nature of the union achieved.

This is a Committee stage, and it is the Committee's task to analyse what is before it, both in the Bill and in the treaty. As the debate is about title II, I shall briefly take the Committee through what happens to the good sentiments of article 2 in the subsequent processes of title II—how it is valued, how it is eventually assessed, and its final role and function.

By article 3a, paragraph 3, there is a new set of criteria, and there are new guiding principles that will come into force. The language of the definition in paragraph 3 is interesting. I have learnt to read and understand the language of such documents, and I hope that I understand article 3a, paragraph 3, all too well. Article 3, paragraph 1, contains a reference to the contents of article 2 as generally a good thing, but by paragraph 3 the guiding principles that "shall entail compliance"—they are not simply principles to be generally promoted, or desirable objectives; they have to be complied with—are a narrower band:

"stable prices, sound public finances and monetary conditions and a sustainable balance of payments."

During the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool yesterday, there were some interesting exchanges. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) ever so gently suggested that the language of the treaty was monetarist—possibly the language of the 1930s. He was accused of being a senior non-modernising member of the party, and his idea was dismissed.

Ironically, I had been sitting here wondering where I had already heard in a consistent form the language and principles of that paragraph—which are repeated throughout all the articles. I had just finished an interesting study and analysis of the way in which Whitehall handled the dreadful problems faced by my constituents in the 1930s, and when my right hon. Friend mentioned the 1930s it triggered off a connection with that research.

The language and principles of article 3a, paragraph 3, resembled the weekly and monthly statements of Chancellor of the Exchequer and Prime Minister Chamberlain, which rejected any form of public works or deficit financing on any scale for the salvation of communities such as Merthyr Tydfil. The language is not coded; it is an openly described set of monetarist principles. By the time we reach article 3, it is those principles which have to be complied with. They are not simply promoted as desirable objectives; they are the criteria which must bite.

By article 3, we have found out that the pleasures and joys of the sentiments behind article 2 have been put in a slightly different context, and now stand in a rather different relationship. As the hon. Member for Esher openly and honourably stated, that series of monetarist principles, which he thinks should be at the heart of the process towards monetary union, are statements of his political values.

Those monetarist principles left my constituency in the 1980s—as they left it in the 1930s—to suffer increasing unemployment. I do not intend to vote for a treaty and a process towards monetary union that enshrines those principles. I refuse to do so. I am sorry that some of my hon. Friends feel that they can manipulate that treaty and that process. I do not believe that we shall be able to do that. For 30 years, my predecessor and I have argued the case. We still find ourselves not converged but diverged in our economic activity, even compared to the level in the United Kingdom.

I do not believe that some of the desired objectives in article 2 will be carried through in the processes to achieve monetary union. Article 3a dilutes the sensible objectives of article 2. I tried to track the role of article 2 through the subsequent articles. In other words, I tried to track the general and desirable tasks in article 2 through the remainder of the articles to the point at which monetary union is achieved. I then looked at article 102a. Of course, that is where the cat is let out of the bag in terms of the function and role of article 2 in the process of monetary union.

We have all been taught to draft in different ways. Words are what we live with; words are our trade. I had a fantastic schooling. I spent four and a half years in the real school of drafting—indeed, in one of the ultimate factories of drafting in which one does one's apprenticeship: the Foreign Office which does nothing but draft.

By the time we reach article 102a on economic and monetary policy, the function and role of article 2, with its desirable objectives of cohesion and high employment, have been changed. Article 102a says:

"Member States shall conduct their economic policies with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the Community, as defined in Article 2,"

It is simply "a view to contributing". If the drafting of that article is not a product of King Charles street, it should have been. If it was not a product of King Charles street, our continental friends have learnt the British art of drafting weasel words to cover the diminution of the importance of article 2 as part of the monetary process.

Although the desirable objective in article 2 is diminished in article 102a, the monetarist principles of article 3a3 are still there to be complied with. So the balance between the joys of article 2 and compliance with the monetary principles of article 3 are now carried through. One is "a view to contributing to", and the other is undoubtedly something which must be complied with or else.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): There are two ways to read the treaty. One way is to read it, as my hon. Friend has done, from the beginning—that may be the logical way to read through a treaty—and to say that article 3a changes the definition, especially from paragraph 1 to paragraph 3, where the stable price element is introduced, and then to read further and say that it is a matter of having regard to the words used.

If one reads the treaty backwards, looking at each of the minor elements with reference to article 2, which is the essential task of the Community, one can say that article 102a is a subsidiary of article 3a, because that is how it is written. One can also say that article 3 is a subsidiary of article 3a.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. While I have been in the Chamber and, indeed, while I have been watching the monitor during the debate, I have noticed that interventions seem to be very long. Some of them are tantamount to speeches, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear that in mind.

Mr. Rowlands: I understand the point that my hon. Friend is making. Although it may occasionally be justified and useful to read a document backwards, I have not found that so. If I understand my hon. Friend's point, and if one looks at the structure of the treaty and the title, at the beginning there is a series of general statements, and then a series of processes is described in detail within a time scale. The series of processes then reach the point at which a group of states will have converged sufficiently to achieve monetary union.

I do not think that hon. Members should read the treaty backwards. It must be read in a forward-looking way because the processes towards monetary union unfold in a series of articles which precede article 102a. The principles have been laid down in articles 2 and 3a. My argument is that, by the time one reads article 102a, the balance in the sentiment, tone, direction and objectives in article 2 have changed to a rather strict monetarist process. If I am allowed to continue, I shall show how that unfolds almost exclusively so.

7.45 pm

Mr. Marlow: In a broader context, has not the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) hit the nail on the head when he says that there are many different ways of reading the treaty? That has enabled my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) to plead for reassurances and tell the Committee how everything will be all right on the night, how none of our powers or our sovereignty will be undermined and how we will be strengthened. At the same time we will allow the commissioner and his friends, the Euro-fanatics, to take all powers from the House as time goes by. The institutions of Europe, the court and the Commission, will take those powers from us. Hon. Members can read the treaty two ways.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not agree that we can read the treaty two ways. It is very clear, and the hon. Member for Esher described it well. The treaty describes monetarist principles and the processes towards monetary union. Monetary union is the only principle of the treaty. I am simply saying that a number of my hon. Friends have argued about the value and importance of article 2 to defend the process.

I am seeking to demonstate how article 2 is progressively devalued as the treaty describes the processes to reach the ultimate point at which the member states decide whether they have achieved a degree of convergence. In article 3, the Commission is given a new power—at least, I think that it is a new power.

We have talked a lot about subsidiarity. This morning, in the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Minister of State and his officials admitted that the principles of subsidiarity cannot and do not apply in any shape or form to stage three of monetary union. In other words, the principle of subsidiarity, which is the central feature of the treaty and stage three of monetary union, will not apply. It is a centralising process, not a process which is subject to subsidiarity.

Mr. Garel-Jones: In the Select Committee this morning, the deputy legal adviser to the Foreign Office made it perfectly clear that article 3b did inform the whole treaty, despite what the hon. Gentleman says.

Mr. Rowlands: If I remember correctly—we will read the text—evidence was previously given to us by professionals. I simply asked Mr. Jay whether subsidiarity would apply to the principles of monetary union in the stage three process, and I think he said no. It was only consistent with other evidence which we have taken.

Mr. Jenkin: In a way, it does apply to monetary union because, by reason of the scale of effects, it is something which is better done at the centre. That demonstrates how subsidiarity can be as much a centralising concept as a decentralising one.

Mr. Rowlands: That is a perceptive point, because we speak of subsidiarity as a one-way process. As the hon. Gentleman rightly points out, it could be a two-way process. Whereas we talk a great deal about the potential decentralising of powers under the subsidiarity provisions of the treaty, alongside it is a hugely centralising process which is necessary to achieve monetary union. I hope that I am not vulgarising the exchange that we had in the Select Committee this morning. In the Select Committee, we talked about, dare I use the term, Mr. Delors's "little list" of devolved powers. We asked the Ministers who came before us to produce a little list of the new powers and responsibilities that the Commission will obtain under the treaty. Article 103 of title II includes, if not a new, an enhanced role for the Commission.

The Commission will almost have the power to play the role of a European International Monetary Fund. It will be in the job of multi-surveillance of every nation's economy and performance. That is the function that is provided in article 103. Rather than reducing the functions and roles of the Commission, the treaty enhances them. To borrow another phrase, the Commission will go into every nook and cranny of a nation's economic and monetary life. That is what is established in article 103.

The other interesting feature of the process of multi-surveillance is that the treaty does not contain a single reference to the Commission looking to see whether unemployment is increasing, whether there is any form of social cohesion and whether there is any real protection. The Commission's function of multi-surveillance in the process of monetary union has no meaning in respect of matters such as unemployment. The multi-surveillance function is already essentially monetarist.

Dr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): Is my hon. Friend aware that the recent Treasury report on the conduct of economic policy, to which reference has already been made, says in paragraph 106, referring to Maastricht:

"A strategy for deficit reduction in the medium term is required under the terms of the Maastricht treaty."?

It is difficult, if not impossible, to find in the report commitments to employment policy and growth as a result of Maastricht. The emphasis is on deficit reduction.

Mr. Rowlands: Absolutely so. That is why examination of the text does not justify the weight that some of my colleagues have put on article 2. Employment and growth are not the major aims which determine the nature of the process which will lead towards monetary union.

In article 103, the Commission is given the role of conducting multilateral surveillance of an individual nation's economy. It is little wonder that the Commission is willing to give up extra powers. It will have a full-time job involving itself in every nook and cranny of the economic life of nations.

Mr. George Robertson: Has my hon. Friend ever asked himself why, if the prescriptions which he says are the central feature of the treaty are so evil and unlikely to lead to growth and, according to his diagnosis, are likely to lead to a worse position, every socialist and social democratic party in Europe, and every trade union in Europe outside and within Britain, is in favour of the treaty?

Mr. Rowlands: Because these are matters of judgment. My judgment on reading the text of the treaty is clear, and it is evidently shared by all those who have spoken tonight. The running thesis of the treaty and the process of monetary union are based on narrow monetarist principles. I cannot answer my hon. Friend's question. My hon. Friend spends more time than me on the matter. He has not damaged my case. Others might not agree with me, but my hon. Friend has not taken me on about how I interpret the text. He has not told me that I am reading the treaty wrongly. If he thinks that I have got a point of fact wrong, he should tell me. He simply tells me that others have different views.

Let us examine the text. The text of article 104c on excessive deficits does not say that one reason why a country might have such a deficit is because it wishes to reduce unemployment. Article 2 does not deal with excessive deficits. By the time we reach excessive deficits in article 104c, it is clear that the route to monetary union is a monetarist one.

Mr. George Robertson: My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) dealt with several of the points that my hon. Friend makes, countered them, and argued strongly with some of the interventions that were made. I simply ask my hon. Friend, in a shorthand form at this stage in the debate, to remember that it may not be the case that he is right and everyone else in the 12 European Community countries is wrong. It might be the other way round. I simply ask him to reflect on that.

Mr. Rowlands: I hope that my hon. Friend thinks that he might find himself in that position, too. I am defending my case and making my points based on the text before me. My hon. Friend has not once yet told me that I am reading the text wrongly. I cannot be responsible for the company he keeps: I can only say how I read and understand the text.

By the time I reach paragraph 2 of article 105 on monetary policy, I find no vestige of reference to article 2. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said paragraph 1 contained a reference to article 2, but even he had to admit that the opening sentence of paragraph 1 of article 5 says that the primary objective of the European central bank is to maintain price stability. It is not to implement the objectives of article 2.

Again we have the words:

"with a view to contributing to the achievement of the objectives of . . . Article 2."

Those are the weasel words about the good things in article 2 by the time we reach the functions and role of the European central bank.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Is one of the reasons why there is such support for the treaty among social democrats and socialists in the EC the fact that the treaty is not a policy document but a framework? It is a framework for decision-making—[HON MEMBERS: "No."] Yes, it is. In essence it is not a policy document. The policies will come from that document. I suggest to my hon. Friend—I shall be interested to hear what he has to say—that article 2 will be the key article in determining what sort of policies we have.

Mr. Rowlands: It is a treaty. It will have to be ratified. It places clear, specifically defined obligations on the Governments of member states. It contains language which I have just described, which implies, "Thou shalt comply in this or that respect and apply these principles." I have identified those principles of compliance and how they differ from the objectives of article 2. I have compared the language of article 2 with that of the rest of the treaty. One language is of policy; the other is of compliance.

The treaty contains detailed obligations which will force us to adopt a particular method of achieving a particular form of monetary union. I object to that. I hope that my hon. Friend will not vote for the treaty on the basis that it is a framework within which a country can have different policies. It is a clearly defined route to monetary union, based on a series of narrowly defined principles of monetarism.

Dr. Berry: Is my hon. Friend aware of a policy document which has just been issued by the new Government of the Republic of Ireland, which states:

"Budgetary policy will therefore be based on the overriding requirements of the Maastricht treaty. Prospective participants are required to adhere strictly to an annual general government deficit on around 3 per cent. or less of GDP"?

So it goes on. That is a specific policy document embracing the principles of Maastricht.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend underlines the point. If my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) wants another illustration of the point that the treaty is not simply a framework but an explicit series of obligations, I recommend that he reads article 108. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West said that the treaty is merely a framework, but it is not. Article 108 states that, during stage 2 of economic and monetary union, this Parliament must pass an Act to change the statutes of our national bank. That is compulsory. It does not state that we may do so if we wish —it is not permissive.

What is even worse is what might happen if the House does not want to pass such an Act. Why should we legislate in that way? I do not believe that the Bank of England should be made autonomous. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East has described what he thought might be constructive alterations to the statutes of our national bank, but I wonder whether his suggestions would be possible under the treaty.

Article 108 states not only that we must legislate to change the statutes but that we must do so in a particular way. Such an Act would have to be compatible with the statutes on the European central bank laid down in the treaty.

I do not know whether the provisions of the treaty should be defined as obligations or merely as a framework, but in my language, article 108 forces us to legislate to change the character of the Bank of England and its relationship with the Government. When such a Bill comes before the House, we will be in a curious position. Hon. Members on both sides might seek to move amendments to change the proposed character of the new Act, but Ministers will tell us that we cannot do so, as that would not comply with the protocol and the provisions in the Maastricht treaty regarding the European central bank.

I cannot think of a better illustration of loss of sovereignty, in the way that this Parliament has always interpreted sovereignty. I am a bit of a parliamentary historian and have written about the evolution of Parliament in the 17th century, the original arguments for the creation of the Bank of England and the tonnage and poundage legislation of 1694.

Whatever else we used to think that this place was all about, it was about the sovereign right to legislate. As a result of article 108, during the next 18 months the Government will have to introduce a Bill to change the relationship between the state and the Bank of England, and that Bill will have to be compatible with the protocols and provisions on the European Community bank laid down in the treaty.

If one wills the end, one must will the means. The alteration of the character and nature of our banking statutes is one of the means for us to achieve monetary union as laid down by the protocol in the treaty.

I want the Financial Secretary to answer two questions which fall within his patch. Presumably, if we pass the Bill, unless the Danish people throw it out in their referendum, the treaty will be ratified, and stage 2 of EMU will start next January. That is only 11 months away, not in 1996 or 1997. During stage 2, legislation along the lines that I have described will be introduced. First, will the Treasury Minister tell us whether it is the Treasury and the Government's best estimate that stage 2 will start on time?

The opening paragraph of chapter 4—"Transitional Provisions"—states:

"The second stage for achieving economic and monetary union shall begin on 1 January 1994."

What if it does not? Will the treaty have to be amended, or will powers be created to override it? Does the Minister think that that deadline is feasible? If that is the deadline in agreeing the treaty, we will have to introduce legislation to amend our national banking statutes.

In an interesting passage of his speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East described some of his thoughts about how he would change the statutes. I have not had a chance to consider all of them, but I should like the Minister to study my hon. Friend's interesting reference and say whether his ideas would be compatible with the provisions in the protocol on the European central bank, because that will define the limits of our legislation and the new banking Bill.

I can think of no better illustration to show my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West that the treaty is not merely a framework but that it contains a series of explicit obligations.

Mr. Randall: They are declarations.

Mr. Rowlands: No, they are not.

I realise that I have spoken for a long time, and would like to give other hon. Members a chance. Finally, the cat is out of the bag when one reads the last clause describing the third stage of monetary union. Article 109j lays down the full criteria to decide whether convergence has been achieved and monetary union can go ahead. It does not contain a single reference to article 2 or to unemployment levels.

In his excellent speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli said that one could achieve convergence and monetary union, under the provisions in the treaty, while there was 20 per cent. unemployment in Merthyr Tydfil or in the United Kingdom. Unemployment would not be a factor to decide whether the country was in a fit state to qualify for monetary union. The four criteria listed in article 109j are all based on monetarist principles and have nothing to do with the general propositions in article 2 about cohesion or high unemployment levels.

We are being asked to buy a type of monetary union which must be achieved by a particular process. I represent a constituency that has suffered too often from such ideas and economic principles for me to support the Bill. Even if I did not have that instinct, I would say that we should object to the Bill because the treaty is hugely centralising. Monetary union will create more centralisation. Even if a sufficient cohesion fund is created, it will have to be administered and disbursed centrally.

Secondly, the treaty is hugely restrictive. One of the major tasks for the Community is to reach out and reinforce the democratic structures of the Czechs, the Hungarians and the countries of central Europe. Much that is in the treaty will make it infinitely more difficult for a meaningful political and economic relationship between the central European countries and the Community, with its monetary union.

The treaty does not outline the shape of the Europe that I want in the late 20th century. The treaty is the last vestige of a process that began in the mid-1950s during the cold war. The creation of the original Community was as much a product of the division of Europe and the cold war as of any great dream of a reunited Europe. Many of its principles and ideas were based on that.

I believe that we have come to the end of that phase, as the cold-war division of Europe has come to an end. We should now look for alternative routes for economic and political union within the structure of an economic common market and an intergovernmental structure of co-operation of the kind represented in the second half of the treaty.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), said yesterday that I would try to intervene briefly today to speak on aspects of the treaty that fall within the Treasury's sphere of responsibility as they relate to economic and monetary union.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Have Ministers, in their attempt to answer some of the points that have been made, told you how they hope to answer points that have not been made? Many of us who have been here for three days have not been called to speak and the matters that I wish to raise have not been touched on at all yet.

The First Deputy Chairman: No, the Government have not told me that.

Mr. Dorrell: Perhaps my hon. Friend should reflect on the fact that our limited memories mean that we shall deal with the issue in tranches.

As befits somebody who lives in the Victorian splendour of the Foreign Office, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State has spoken about pillars and architecture. As somebody who occupies what was described in the papers yesterday as the "linoleum palace", I propose to speak solely about the engineering of the Community—its economic policy.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) started his remarks yesterday by referring to the Community's objectives defined in article 2 of the treaty of Maastricht. His example was followed by several of his hon. Friends. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), from extremely different standpoints, both started their speeches by discussing the objectives defined in article 2. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has also followed their example, and I am therefore happy to follow them down that road.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Llanelli that three key factors arising from article 2 would be common ground on both sides of the Committee, among supporters and opponents of Maastricht. Article 2 commits the Community to achieving high employment. The right hon. Gentleman had fun discussing the difference between employment and unemployment.

Mr. Marlow: I am sorry to make this point now, but I was speaking to some hon. Friends who had just entered the Chamber when my hon. Friend the Minister stood up. As he will know, I have tabled a couple of amendments, but have not had an opportunity to discuss them yet. Other hon. Members have also tabled amendments. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that a Minister will respond to the debate once all those who wish to speak have spoken, particularly those who have not yet put forward their amendments?

Mr. Dorrell: As I said in answer to a similar intervention, we are dealing with the Bill in tranches. Having listened to the debate, I thought that there was sufficient meat for me to deal with some of the concerns expressed and to put the Government's view on the points that have already been made.

I was going through the three key elements defined in article 2, picking out the key objectives of high employment, raising the standard of living and the quality of life of Community residents, and the achievement of sustainable, non-inflationary growth. Those objectives should be, and largely are, supported on both sides of the Committee. Although they may be shared objectives, the discussions on the methods by which they are achieved have revealed considerable differences. Several hon. Members on both sides of the Committee have alleged that the treaty and the institutions envisaged within it contain a deflationary bias that would make it impossible for such a Community to deliver its objective of high employment and the other side of that coin, which is low unemployment.

May I concentrate the attention of the House first on the evidence that has been adduced to support the assertion that the institutions envisaged by the treaty contain a deflationary bias or make impossible the objectives defined in article 2? The evidence that has been adduced in support of that argument during the debate is, to put it mildly, flimsy. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney treated us to a long speech based on the proposition that there is a clear division between a monetarist approach to monetary management. Although he did not define it, he implied that an alternative approach to monetary management could better deliver the objectives of article 2. The assumption that lay behind this speech took place more than 10 years ago, and most of his arguments have now become out of date.

Mr. Leighton: Is not the proof of the pudding in the eating? The first stage of economic and monetary union was the exchange rate mechanism, which made interest rates higher than was needed for the purposes of the domestic economy. That was deflationary, and unemployment rose by 1·1 million during that period. Does not that prove that the ERM was deflationary?

8.15 pm

Mr. Dorrell: The point that I was seeking to develop was whether there could be a choice between the delivery of growth and high employment, and the controlling of Government deficits. In one or two intervention, the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who is not in the Chamber at present, appeared to believe that the higher the budget deficit, the faster the rate of growth. Surely the experience in the past 25 years of Governments of both political parties has tested that theory to destruction. High budget deficits undermine the delivery of employment and growth objectives. We embrace the commitment to proper control of budget deficits that is enshrined within the treaty, not because it is in the treaty but because experience over many years has shown that failure to observe the disciplines of proper control of Government deficits undermines the capacity of any economy, not just this economy, to deliver objectives of growth and high employment.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister may be right or wrong. Much of the issue is theory and fashion. Whether he is right or wrong, why entrench one view in a treaty that can never be changed except with the consent of 12 nations? Why give economic theory such codification?

Mr. Dorrell: The right hon. Gentleman may describe it as theory, but I do not believe that the experiments with the approach of the hon. Member for Walsall, North are theory. We have seen repeatedly that failure to control budget deficits has undermined the capacity of this country and other countries to deliver their objectives.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): Governments are elected to take a view about budget deficits. Labour Governments think that one can expand budget deficits, whereas Conservative Governments generally take the opposite view. It is not up to a treaty to determine that matter.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is not quite right, because some Opposition Members have questioned whether it is possible or even desirable to deliver sustainable, non-inflationary growth. For example, yesterday we had a contribution from the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who said:

"article 3a(2) states that the primary objective of economic policy is 'to maintain price stability'. That has never been an objective of the Labour party". —[Official Report, 13 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 946-47.]

There is ample evidence to support that assertion.

In one of the last sentences that he spoke yesterday the right hon. Member for Llanelli said:

"We cannot have non-inflationary growth in today's western capitalist economies."—[Official Report, 13 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 1011.]

I do not believe that that assertion is true. The experience of successfully run economies, both in Europe and further afield, flatly contradicts the assertion made by the right hon. Gentleman last night.

Mr. Denzil Davies: There may be one or two such economies, but will the Minister give examples of countries in western Europe that have achieved non-inflationary growth since the war?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall give an example, but I should be cautious about doing so too often as I think that most people in this country get bored of having Germany quoted at them as an example. Germany has achieved a lower average rate of inflation and a higher average rate of growth than us.

Mr. Radice: I thought that I was on the same side of the argument as the Minister, but I fear that he is losing me. It is true that it is important to have a low inflation rate. It is sensible to have rules on budget deficits if we are to have a single currency. But if there is a recession and a high level of unemployment across Europe, there is a case for counter-recessionary measures. That was precisely what was agreed at Edinburgh. Surely the hon. Gentleman is not arguing against that case. I hope that he is not.

Mr. Dorrell: I am not arguing against the proposition that budget deficits fluctuate according to the state of economic activity. It would be hard for me to do so.

I can quote no better authority for that view than Lord Lawson, who is not always associated with such a view. The Committee will remember that he made a speech during the 1980s, from which he quotes extensively in his recently published book, supporting the assertion that budget deficits fluctuate according to the level of economic activity. That is the answer to the issue raised earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), who was concerned to ensure that a budget deficit objective did not have to be cast in stone or at a fixed level every year, regardless of the state of economic activity.

Mr. Jenkin: The important distinction in the legal enforceability of the treaty is whether one is trying to achieve a deficit of less than 3 per cent. or wilfully avoiding achieving it. Without giving away any Budget secrets, will my hon. Friend say whether the Government will be trying to achieve a 3 per cent. budget deficit in the coming financial year? Alternatively, will we be able to interpret their actions as those of a Government who are wilfully avoiding doing so beeause that is in Britain's economic interests?

Mr. Dorrell: We shall be trying to avoid an excessive budget deficit, as the treaty requires us to do, not because of any treaty obligation, but because we know that that is the only sensible way of running an economy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I thank the Minister for giving way. I want to intervene because he has referred to me in his argument.

Surely the essence of democratic decision making is to try to hold a balance between the employment level and the inflation level. Governments are continually trying to make such judgments. Economic policy becomes deflationary when Governments become obsessed with reducing inflation and increase unemployment. That is exactly what the Government have done—their fight against inflation has become paramount. Surely the essence of article 3a is that price stability is the paramount objective of economic policy. It states that member states and the Community should pursue the general economic policies of the Community only in so far as they are

"without prejudice to this objective."

Mr. Dorrell: The reason for that is that we recognise, as do the signatories of the treaty, that the delivery of the wider objectives are not assisted, but jeopardised, by a failure to maintain stable prices. The answer to the point raised by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby was provided, with some distinction, by his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, when he said:

"My hon. Friend referred to price stability. It would be interesting to hear his arguments in favour of price instability"—

I agree with the hon. Member for Oxford, East.

"I have yet to see the benefits of price instability to working people and, in particular, to pensioners. There is no merit in price instability."—[Official Report, 13 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 947.]

That is the answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: That is an insane argument. The essence of capitalist and market economies is that prices will fluctuate—that is the nature of such economies. Nobody is arguing for price stability in the sense that prices do not fluctuate. Price stability in this context refers to the obsession with keeping inflation as low as possible —zero inflation—which has existed for a long time. When governed by such an obsession, that aim must be paramount over other Community objectives, including full employment.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the efficient functioning of the market economy depends on the ability of prices to fluctuate. It does not depend on the ability of the value of money to fluctuate. The effect of a progressive decline in the value of money—the rate of inflation—during the past 20 years has been to undermine economic performance and the delivering of social objectives in this country.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend talks about excessive budget deficits. He will be familiar with article 104c, which states that the Commission shall "examine compliance with budgetary discipline on the basis of the following two criteria:

(a) whether the ratio of the planned or actual government deficit to gross domestic product exceeds a reference value, unless —either the ratio has declined substantially and continuously and reached a level that comes close to the reference value"—

3 per cent.—

"or, alternatively, the excess over the reference value is only exceptional and temporary and the ratio remains close to the reference value".

Which of those two criteria will the Government satisfy with regard to next year's Budget?

Mr. Dorrell: Although we accept, for reasons that I have given—which have nothing to do with the treaty of Maastricht—the desirability of avoiding excessive budgetary deficits, we do not at this stage accept the legitimacy of the Commission or any other European institution's authority to require us to pursue a budgetary policy that is not of our own choosing. That marks the success of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in delivering the British protocol. None of the compulsory provisions of the treaty of Maastricht relating to monetary union apply to the United Kingdom unless and until the House passes an Act of Parliament to determine that they should apply.

Many of the speeches made in Committee have avoided the fact that this country is not committed to moving to stage 3 of economic and monetary union. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) sought to argue that the defence negotiated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister——

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister's case has moved. He did not answer the question posed by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), but merely said that there was an opt-out provision and we did not have to take action if we did not want to do so. Do the Government and the Minister consider it a desirable objective to belong to the monetary union?

Mr. Dorrell: We have made it perfectly clear, as we did throughout the negotiations, that we regard that as a question which is impossible to answer at this stage. That case was not accepted by any of our partners, except Denmark. That is why Britain and Denmark secured provisions within the treaty to allow them to take that decision when the necessary information was available. It is not now available. That is why we have reserved our ability to make that decision at a much later date.

8.30 pm

Mr. Leighton: The Minister has been very generous in giving way, which makes for a good debate. On the point about price stability, is he aware that the Governor of the Bank of England, in speaking quite recently to the eastern Confederation of British Industry, said that we could have achieved price stability this year but it would have meant too much deflation? So he and the Government decided not to go for price stability this year because it would have meant too much of a recession. Should we not have four objects of economic policy? One is as low inflation as possible, but the others are balance of payments equilibrium, economic growth and high employment, not just going for one.

Mr. Dorrell: I do not want to cover that ground again, but that is exactly what I said in defining what I saw as the key objectives set out in article 2.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Why would my hon. Friends want to legislate for convergency criteria, which will create great pain, when they do not necessarily know at this stage whether they want to enter into the third stage? Take, for instance, the average on interest rates. With good fortune and if the Government take their courage in their hands, we shall bring down interest rates much faster than the European average. We shall be well outside the convergence criteria on those, and that creates a problem. The treaty says that we are meant to be within the range of 2 per cent. of the average of the European convergence criteria, so why would we legislate for the second stage?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is not quite right, because I do not think that it is possible for us to be outside the convergence criteria on interest rates by being below; the convergence criterion is to be within 2 per cent. of the lowest. But I will check that.

The point about the convergence criteria is that they come into play only if we choose to go to stage 3 of economic and monetary union. I agree with the right hon. Member for Llanelli, who, although he made it clear that he was opposed to a single currency, also said—I do not think that I misreport him—that if we choose to go to a single currency, the convergence criteria defined in the treaty make some sense as criteria for delivering a single currency. That is a point of view that is supported by somebody who opposes the basic argument that I am trying to advance.

So my hon. Friend is not on to a good point when he concentrates on the legislative nature of convergence criteria. They merely describe conditions which individual member states have to satisfy to become members of a single currency, because without coming within that cone of convergence there is no realistic prospect of a single currency working.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: That is the very point: why does one then need to legislate for them? They are criteria which the Government have it in their power to pursue in any event. It does not require the enactment into United Kingdom legislation and the decision can be made on the basis of the proper management of the economy. It is not necessary, therefore, as I understand the argument of the Financial Secretary, to legislate. So surely the Financial Secretary could accept the amendments before us on this point.

Mr. Dorrell: The amendments, as my hon. Friend knows very well, remove the relevant titles from the effect of the European Communities Act 1972, and the reason why those are unacceptable is that they would make it impossible for us to discharge our obligations under the treaty within domestic law.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way to my hon. Friend later. I want to move on to deal reasonably briefly with the arguments advanced yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South to the effect that we are committed to joining stage 3 of the economic and monetary union and that the safeguards do not work. He was particularly concerned that we are committed to rejoining the exchange rate mechanism. He sought to argue that on two counts, both of them, I think, wrong. His argument was, first, on the ground that there was a legal obligation. He said that there was a legal obligation contained within the treaty which, when interpreted, would require the British Government, against its will, to rejoin the ERM.

I believe that there are three answers to that. The first is that nobody has yet quoted from the treaty a specific and express obligation to rejoin the ERM, for the simple reason that there is no express obligation within the treaty.

Mr. Macdonald rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way to any hon. Member who can quote to me the article in the Maastricht treaty which expressly requires membership by any member state of the exchange rate mechanism. I say that with total confidence; there is no such obligation imposed under the Maastricht treaty.

Sir Trevor Skeet: It is at 109j. It is one of the criteria that are laid down and, since it is one of the criteria, we have to go along with it.

Mr. Dorell: It is one of the convergence criteria; my hon. Friend is right on that count. But there is no obligation on us to converge, because there is no obligation on us to reach the end result.

Several hon. Members rose——

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. There are proper codes of debate. Hon. Members know full well that if the Minister wishes to give way, he will do so. If he does not, hon. Members should resume their seats, however senior they may be.

Mr. Dorrell: Secondly,——

Mr. Macdonald rose——

Mr. Dorrell: Very well, I will give way just once more.

Mr. Macdonald: I have listened to the Financial Secretary's argument, but I think that he has got it slightly wrong. He is implying that the convergence criteria apply to the United Kingdom only if it opts in to the process towards monetary union, if it decides to go ahead with the third stage. But the protocol, especially paragraph 2, which says:

"Paragraphs 3 to 9 shall have to effect if the United Kingdom notifies the Council that it does not intend to move to the third stage.", implies that to exempt itself from the convergence criteria the United Kingdom has to notify the Council that it is not moving to the third stage. It is not a question of opting in to the convergence criteria; it is automatically in the convergence criteria unless it specifically notifies the Council that it wishes to opt out.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is on to a drafting point. He will see that paragraph 1 of the protocol reads as follows:

"The United Kingdom shall notify the Council whether it intends to move to the third stage before the Council makes its assessment under article 109j(2) of this Treaty."

The first paragraph of the protocol leaves the question entirely open. The second paragraph, from which the hon. Gentleman quoted, is an introductory paragraph which leads into paragraphs 3 to 9. Of those paragraphs, paragraph 4 is the one that is the safeguard for the United Kingdom position and that states that, in the case that we have indicated that we are not going to join the economic and monetary union,

"The United Kingdom shall retain its powers in the field of monetary policy according to national law."

So there is no obligation to join either the ERM or the economic and monetary union. There is no express obligation in the treaty, nor is there an implied obligation either in the protocol, from which the hon. Gentleman quoted, or in article 109m, which my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South quoted yesterday. He used the obligation in article 109m to regard exchange rates as a matter of common interest. As I pointed out to him yesterday, that is precisely the same obligation as has been accepted by every member state of the European Economic Community, as it then was, and the European

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Community, as we now know it, since the day when the original six signed the treaty of Rome, because it is contained in virtually the same language in article 107 of the treaty of Rome, which was signed in 1958.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): My hon. Friend is saying something that has puzzled me for a considerable time. I think that everyone will agree that the single currency and monetary union are at the heart of this whole treaty. If it is not the intention of the Government eventually to join in a single currency, why are they forcing the treaty through? If we do not join in 1996, it makes the whole thing an absolute farce.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend has raised an important point. Let me answer his question in a slightly elliptical way; it strikes me as the most cogent. Yesterday, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South said:

"I cannot see how we could remain within the European Community as the only country—other than Denmark, perhaps—committed to staying outside the single currency."
—[Official Report, 13 January 1993; Vol. 216, c. 986.]

My hon. Friend's point was that, whatever the legal position might be, there would be a practical obligation to join a single currency, if one were established.

I do not understand the logic of that argument. My hon. Friend says that he does not wish to become part of a single currency; he then seems to argue that, because he hopes that the United Kingdom will not become part of such a currency, it follows that the continentals will not be able to set it up. That is clearly a nonsensical proposition for any hon. Member to adopt.

The success of the treaty lies in the fact that it allows the United Kingdom to continue to participate in the design of a system of economic and monetary union at which it is likely—I put it no more strongly than that—that some other member states will wish to arrive. It also allows us to preserve freedom to decide, at a later date, whether to join the single-currency monetary union that has been created—with our participation—by our partners on the continent. Furthermore, the treaty clearly establishes the consequences of that decision.

Let me ask the House—including my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell)—to reflect on the possibility that, if the Bill is rejected, some member states will establish a currency union in any event. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South said yesterday that, in his view, the United Kingdom would have no choice but to join that union. If the Bill is not passed, the continentals will be able to establish a single currency without our participating in its design—and my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South believes that we would have no choice but to join it. Surely that is not a better position than that established by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in which we participate in the design and are free at a later date to decide whether to join.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Having been given a good run yesterday, I did not intend to prolong today's proceedings, but this is becoming ridiculous.

The whole purpose of not ratifying the treaty would be to avoid setting up a single currency, with all the accompanying paraphernalia. All I meant yesterday was this: if the treaty were ratified and the single currency were established, we could not possibly stay outside it. Of course it is theoretically possible for others to set it up and for this country alone to stay outside it, while remaining in the Common Market. But—I am leaving aside the legal point, on which I disagree with my hon. Friend the Minister—it would not work out like that. In practical terms, we could not possibly work within the framework of the new single currency and the institutions attached to it while remaining outside it.

Mr. Dorrell: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's point; I merely seek to develop the logic of the position that he has described. I do not agree with his claim that the establishment of a single currency by other European countries would leave us with no option but to join that currency. If that is his argument, however, I do not see how he can conclude that it is in this country's interests to stand apart from the development of such a currency, if the continental powers choose to establish it. I am a great fan of the House of Commons, but I know that it is not within its competence to deny other European sovereign states free choice to establish a single currency, if that is what they choose to do.

Mr. Marlow: This is a complex issue, and I may be wrong; but I am a little fearful that my hon. Friend misled the Committee earlier. In my previous intervention, I referred to paragraph 2 of article 104c, which relates to the Commission monitoring whether we maintain sufficient proximity to various criteria regarding budget deficit. My hon. Friend said that our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had negotiated a very effective opt-out on monetary union. Let me draw his attention to protocol 5, on certain provisions relating to the United Kingdom. The provisions excluded do not include paragraph 2 of article 104c(2), though they include paragraph 1 of that article. It appears that paragraph 2 will apply to the United Kingdom regardless of whether we comply with stage 3.

8.45 pm

Mr. Dorrell: That is true, but my hon. Friend should also remember that the penalties contained in a later paragraph of article 104c do not apply unless and until we choose to join monetary union. The effect of article 104c is to commit us to the arrangement described in article 109e:

"In the second stage, Member States shall endeavour to avoid excessive government deficits."

We have accepted that treaty obligation—an obligation which, as I said earlier, we embrace, not because it is in the treaty but because we seek to impose it on ourselves.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Surely, given the existence of such an obligation in the treaty, there is a severe risk that the Commission—or any other element that is important in the structure of the EC—will wish to comment on the size of our deficit from time to time. If that happens, is it not likely to have an adverse effect on markets and to make things extremely difficult?

Mr. Dorrell: It is true that the Commission can comment. It can already comment. A regular feature of the agendas of ECOFIN meetings is examination of the performance of individual member states in relation to published criteria. In that regard, there is nothing new in the treaty. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), the key point is that the penalty provisions in article 104c do not come into effect unless and until we choose to move to stage 3 of economic and monetary union—and that is our free choice.

Let me now deal briefly with an aspect of the design of EMU, which has already become clear on the face of the treaty.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can know what I am going to say. I hope that he will contain himself. After all, I have already given way to him twice.

More than one hon. Member has argued that the prescription for the central bank provided in the treaty of Maastricht would design a bankers' Europe—a Europe in which the central bank would not be accountable to the people of Europe in an acceptable way. If the House is to consider that, it must ask itself what its choice will be for this country when the time comes for us to decide whether to join a single currency and become part of a monetary union. At that point we shall be considering whether we want to accept an obligation to accept membership of a single currency.

Of course, if one is deciding whether to join a single currency, it is a proper consideration to look at the arrangements for the management of that single currency; and if there is a single currency, there must be a monetary authority responsible for managing it. Equally obviously, if it is a currency that will circulate in 12 member states, the monetary authority cannot be one that is firmly rooted in the institutions of one member state. I do not detect much support in the House for the proposition that the monetary authority responsible for all 12 member states should be ECOFIN; still less do I detect enthusiasm for the proposition that it be managed by the European Commission.

There is, of course, plenty of scope for individual hon. Members to have a view about whether a single currency is desirable, but if there is to be a single currency the institutions defined within the treaty are a broadly sensible means of managing that currency, developed from what has been, to some degree, the successful experience both of other member states and of states outside the Community that operate a monetary authority that is distinct from the main economic policy authority within the state. Since it is the commitment that we should retain at member state level responsibility for taxation and for wider economic policy questions, it is inherent in the assumptions of the treaty that economic policy, taxation policy and so forth should be to some extent divorced from monetary policy. The institutions designed and set out in the treaty represent a fair attempt by the Community to learn from the experience of other countries that operate a monetary authority that is different from their taxation and economic authority.

Sir Peter Tapsell: My hon. Friend puts these matters with the utmost clarity, and it is exhilarating to hear a first-class mind explaining these things so clearly, but since, throughout our history, we have never thought it right to establish an autonomous central bank, run by our own fellow countrymen, why should we now in any circumstances wish to set up an autonomous central bank run by foreigners, even if we had a single currency?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend reinforces my point. If he takes the view that in no circumstances can he contemplate a monetary authority that is not, first, combined with economic policy and taxation and, second, responsible one hundred per cent. to the House, he clearly cannot in any circumstances support a single currency that circulates in 12 member states of the European Community. That is the consequence of taking such a position.

The point that I seek to put to the Committee and to my hon. Friend is that there are many people who believe that a single currency has something to contribute to the development of economic management and an efficient economy within the member states of the Community. If one is interested in that concept, some institutions along the lines of those defined in the treaty seem to me not only a natural consequence of the desire to establish such a currency but the fruit of learning from the experience of those other countries—Germany, the United States and Sweden have all been quoted—which operate monetary policy independently from the main political authority.

It seems to me rather odd to argue that the United States or Germany or Sweden are any less democratic as a result of the institutions that they have chosen to establish.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way yet again. May I define what I mean by autonomous? I mean a central bank that is not democratically accountable to democratically elected ministers answerable to a democratic assembly. So even if we had a single European currency, I would argue strongly that we need to have a single European central bank that is democratically accountable and answerable—and that is what we do not have in the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes, but I invite him to design a workable system for a European central bank that is politically accountable to a European political process. I do not believe that it would be easy to do and I certainly do not believe that it would learn the lessons that are available from other central banks that are divorced from the tax and economic management authority.

I should like to get on, Mr. Morris, because I am conscious that I have already detained the Committee for a great deal longer than I had intended.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, as I know that he is seeking to reach the conclusion of his arguments. I would just like him to clarify an earlier point that I may have missed. It seemed that my hon. Friend was suggesting that we had a position of opting into stage 2 as and when we chose, but article 109e says:

"The second stage for achieving economic and monetary union shall begin on 1 January 1994."

So from that point onwards, do we not therefore cut into stage 2?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend misheard me. The British protocol and the British position is that we are free to decide whether to join stage 3 of monetary union. We are clearly committed—and we make no bones about it—to stage 2 of the process, at which point monetary policy remains the exclusive concern of member states and national Governments.

I should like, if I may, Mr. Morris, in conclusion, to come back to the essential point.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend seems to commend the British constitution on the basis that it is democratic. Surely the essential characteristic of the British constitution is that we have a sovereign Parliament. It is not necessarily a direct democracy at all. The thing that is different about the other constitutions to which my hon. Friend has drawn the Committee's attention is that they are federal and written structures.

Mr. Dorrell: It would be a brave man who would describe the French political tradition as federal. There is a wide range of political traditions in Europe, some of them federal, some tending to be more centralised. To my knowledge, all operate a written constitution but that does not undermine the basic premise.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: I really am confused now by my hon. Friend. We can opt in, if the House so decides, at the appropriate time to stage 3: is he indicating that we have an opt-in or opt-out choice of stage 2 with its convergence criteria, or are we obliged to follow the convergence criteria? That is the question.

Mr. Dorrell: I am seeking to be crystal clear. We are committed to stage 2. We are not committed to stage 3. The convergence criteria are conditions precedent on joining a single currency. A single currency is not stage 2. A single currency is stage 3. If we decide not to join the single currency, we are not committed to seeking convergence on the conditions required to join it.

I come back to the essential fact. The treaty of Maastricht provides this country with three things. It provides us with the right to participate in the preparation for the arrangements for a single currency. Secondly, it provides us with a choice about whether to join that single currency, which we shall have participated in designing. Thirdly, it sets out clearly the consequences for Britain of joining or not joining that single currency. There is no need for the House or Britain to exercise that choice now. The only decision that the House must make in accepting or rejecting the Bill is whether to participate in preparations for that single currency. I strongly believe that it is in Britain's interests to participate in that process and leave that choice open.

Mr. Macdonald: The important point to seize upon in respect of the Bill and treaty has already been made: Maastricht cannot be seen and judged entirely according to the wording of the treaty alone but must be seen in a wider context—as part of a process, a journey of member states towards ever closer union. There are two reasonable questions to ask about Maastricht: first, whether the journey towards every closer union is desirable and, secondly, whether Maastricht is an appropriate way of continuing that journey. I believe in the goal of ever closer union, but I accept that it is a matter about which one must make a fundamental judgment—either one favours that goal or one does not. I shall not enter into that debate now.

9 pm

Even if one accepts the goal of ever closer union, it is still possible to ask whether Maastricht is the best way of achieving it. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), I accept that Maastricht is not perfect. I do not think that any hon. Member would defend Maastricht as the perfect treaty from our own point of view. But it is not drawn up from one point of view: it is an agreement and, necessarily, a compromise between 12 different Governments. The question is not whether it is perfect—[Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman. May I ask hon. Members who are having private meetings on the Back Benches to protect the interests of other Back Benchers by having their meetings elsewhere?

Mr. Macdonald: I am grateful, Mr. Morris.

The question is not whether Maastricht is perfect, but whether it is an appropriate way forward. I accept that Maastricht is not perfect. Expectations that it should conform in every comma and sentence to the goals of one Government or one country, far less of one party, are unrealistic. One cannot get socialism in one treaty; Maastricht is part of a process. We want to see a subsequent treaty after Maastricht; it must be an ongoing process.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) spoke of the need for a system of fiscal transfer to make the goal of economic and monetary union operate as effectively and fairly as we would like. I entirely agree. [Interruption.]

Mr. Radice: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. If Conservative Members want to confer among themselves, why do they not go to the 1922 Committee? We listened to their speeches; they should listen to ours.

The Chairman: I should be most grateful if hon. Members below the Gangway on both sides of the House would hold their meetings outside the Chamber.

Mr. Macdonald: The point that I was making is that Maastricht will have to be followed by subsequent treaties to make the process of economic and monetary union operate as we would like. I should like a subsequent treaty to allow fiscal transfer among member states, which will be necessary. I should like a further treaty to give the European Community, via the Commission or other institutions, the ability to raise taxation directly to facilitate the process of fiscal transfer and of borrowing to operate the deficits which will prove necessary from time to time according to the development of the economic cycle. Once we are in the state of economic and monetary union, there will inevitably be constraints on the fiscal and deficit-operating powers of individual member states. Therefore, these powers have to be devolved upwards into Community institutions.

The question is not whether the treaty is perfect, but whether it represents substantial and valuable progress. I argue strongly that it does because, for the first time, it brings in a social dimension, an environmental dimension and valuable political dimensions. The social and environmental dimensions are brought in on their own merits, not as consequences of successfully operating a single market but as goals to be pursued and achieved on their own merits.

Reference has already been made to article 2, which embodies some of the social goals that I find so attractive and valuable in the treaty. I noted that when the Minister referred to article 2 he managed to mention the goal of high employment, but he could not get the words "high social protection" out between his lips. Yet high social protection is what we shall be committed to as a goal of the Community, as a consequence of this treaty. There are a number of provisions in the treaty which relate to the economic and social goals which lie behind much of the treaty.

I was earlier challenged privately by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) to find a third reference to employment in the treaty. Yesterday I managed to find him a second one, but now I have found a third as well. The second was agreement on social policy, which the Government has unfortunately opted out of but which a Labour Government can easily opt into. The third reference is in article 123—hon. Members will find it on page 31 of the blue document—which refers to the social fund to be set up to provide for social training and to combat unemployment and help people to find employment. Article 127 goes over similar ground and article 130 is perhaps one of the most important of the lot as it talks of the need for economic and social cohesion and particularly of the need for the Community to set itself the goal of bringing forward the more economically backward and disadvantaged areas of the Community and also to bring forward and take special account of the rural areas, which is something that I warmly welcome. Throughout the treaty there are numerous references to social and economic goals which I, as a socialist—and, I hope, all my colleagues on this side—would have warmly welcomed.

Despite those social goals, which are in the Community framework for the first time on their own merits and not as by-products of achieving a single market, and although these are valuable gains, there has been controversy about the economic provisions, particularly those relating to the central bank and the convergence criteria. There has been a very odd aspect of the debate tonight and yesterday about the economic provisions in this treaty. Some Conservative Members and Baroness Thatcher regard these economic provisions as letting in socialism by the back door. Yet, on the Labour side, one or two of my colleagues have argued the reverse—that the treaty nails us to the bed of monetarism for ever. Both cannot possibly be right, and it is just possible that both are wrong. I believe that both are indeed wrong, although by implying that the treaty embodies and places in the framework of the Community certain goals which the Social Democrats would be happy to embrace, Baroness Thatcher is more correct than my hon. Friends who criticise the treaty for being too monetarist.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that his views, Baroness Thatcher's views or anyone else's views are irrelevant because the article on page 91 entitled "Independence" makes it abundantly clear that, when the central bank is established, no Government of any party, no Chancellor of the Exchequer or Minister will be legally permitted even to make representations to it, to phone or to write, without committing the equivalent of a Euro-crime? Therefore, while he or Baroness Thatcher may be right, the fact is that the central bank will decide. It will be appointed for eight years, and no politician, no Prime Minister, no Chancellor of the Exchequer, Finance Minister or Back Bencher will be permitted even to make representations to it. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman had better keep quiet and wait and see what the bank does. Whatever it does will be its own business, not that of democratic Governments or Parliaments.

Mr. Macdonald: I shall deal later with the question of the independence of the central bank. I was trying to say that, regardless of what it says in the treaty, there are different arguments about how its provisions should be interpreted. Some of my hon. Friends argue that provisions such as that to which the hon. Member for Southend East (Sir T. Taylor) referred make the treaty inevitably monetarist, whereas Conservative hon. Members and Baroness Thatcher say that the same provisions make it an inevitably socialist document. The arguments will continue. In other words, the treaty is not the end of political argument as some have implied because those who suggest that it is the end of political argument cannot agree even about which political argument has been brought to an end by the treaty—some say it is the monetarist argument and others say it is the socialist argument.

Mr. Shore: Irrespective of what different politicians have said about whether the treaty is monetarist, democratic socialist or anything else in character, surely there can be no dispute about the words in the treaty which describe the independence of the central bank. Part of the relevant article states that Governments will undertake it—there can be no argument about that. Either the words mean what they say or they do not.

"not to seek to influence"

Mr. Macdonald: As I said, I shall deal with the independence of the central bank in a moment. My point is that arguments have been advanced from both parties that the treaty is somehow an end to political debate. According to some, it locks us into a monetarist framework for ever, while according to others it locks us into a socialist framework for ever. That is nonsense—both arguments cannot be right. The existence of the two arguments proves that they are both wrong. The treaty will be debated after the Bill has been passed——

Sir Peter Tapsell: There is no antithesis between the hon. Gentleman's description of a socialist and a monetarist situation. Karl Marx was a monetarist, and this country had the most extreme monetarist policy it has had this century when Mr. Denis Healey was Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Macdonald: It is an interesting point—that socialism and monetarism are the same thing—but it was not exactly what the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends or mine were arguing.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Seriously, does the hon. Gentleman not accept that it is the end of all political argument if his views, those of the Government and those of the French and German Governments cannot even be communicated to the central bank? I accept that the hon. Gentleman may be a very good Member of Parliament, and he has shown so far that he is a man of integrity. Does not he accept that the political argument about economic policy will be ended if the central bank runs everything, if appointments are for eight years? Would not any Minister be committing a Euro-crime if he were even to write a letter or make a phone call——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not making an intervention; he is making a second speech.

9.15 pm

Mr. Macdonald: This treaty is not the end of political argument. It is not the end of debate about the future of economic policy. It merely transfers the debate from a purely national stage to a European stage and puts it in a wider context. After it has been passed, there will still be arguments between my hon. Friends and Conservative Members as to what it means and whether it commits us to a more monetarist framework or a more socialist framework or neither.

Mr. Corbyn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Macdonald: I have exhausted that point and want to move now to the question of a central bank.

Yesterday my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said that price stability is the primary but not the exclusive purpose in having a central bank. Of course, the context in which the bank has to operate will be determined by member states individually and as a Community group, pursuing the goals that are articulated in article 2. Although that is a very cogent and very powerful point, some of my hon. Friends and some Conservative Members—for different reasons, presumably—object to the notion that the bank will not be able to take instructions from any particular member Government. In that sense, it will be independent. In my view, the notion of independence is rather overdone in the context of the central bank and monetary institutions. Experience of the Bank of England indicates that, frequently, the idea of political control, certainly when exercised by Labour Governments, can be quite empty. The direction of influence, rather than being from the Government to the bank, presumably via the Treasury, is often from the City to the Government via the bank. The bank acts not as the instrument of Government policy, particularly Labour Government policy, but rather as a wooden horse for the City of London within Governments of both parties.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend is right in saying that the Bank of England has often operated against the interests of Labour Governments. That is due to the mandarins who run it. If the hon. Gentleman has such doubts about the running of a bank which theoretically is state-owned and state-controlled, what influence does he think will be possible in the case of an independent central bank dedicated to a course of Euro-monetarism?

Mr. Macdonald: I am glad that my hon. Friend accepts that the Bank of England cannot be regarded simply as an instrument of Governments, especially Labour Governments. Conversely, banks which are nominally independent—for example, in Germany—respond to quite a degree of political influence.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): What about recent events?

Mr. Macdonald: Well, there has been the question of unification. There is a question about whether the German Government and the Bundesbank have very different views about interest rates.

The Chairman: Order. I remind the hon. Member that we are debating amendment No. 40, not German interest rates. Perhaps he will address his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Macdonald: I had no intention of dealing with the details of German interest rates, Mr. Morris, but to make the general point that independent central banks are not immune to political influence. Nor does the notion of an independent central bank mean that Governments are constrained from carrying out policies that my hon. Friends would warmly support.

For example, an independent central bank in the United States did not prevent President Roosevelt from carrying out a new deal programme to revive that economy out of recession. An independent central bank in Sweden has not prevented successive Governments from pursuing policies which many of my hon. Friends would like to see implemented in Britain.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Is my hon. Friend aware that it may be wrong to make an analogy between the Bank of England and the European central bank because the result of the relationships of elected Governments with the European central bank would become part of European law, part of which would proclaim that democratically elected Governments had no right to advise the bankers of that institution? What, in that event, would be the point of holding elections? Why bother to vote if those elected could do nothing to influence the decision makers?

Mr. Macdonald: I am simply trying to establish that the vision of an independent central bank being inimical to any kind of social development or political progress is not borne out by the experience of other countries with independent central banks. That applies to Sweden and the United States, which have been able to carry through progressive social and economic policies.

The whole question of independence is more complex than legislation would have us believe. Indeed, if we compare the experience of Germany and Sweden with that of the United Kingdom—with Labour Governments here having to wrestle with a supposedly dependent central bank—my argument is borne out.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend's interesting contribution, and I do so only because word has been communicated to us that the Government may be about to move the closure. If that should happen——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member is better informed than I am.

Mr. Hain: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris——

The Chairman: Order. I have ruled on the point that the hon. Member raised. I—the occupant of the Chair—decide whether there should be a closure motion. No such motion has been moved and I am not interested in rumours.

Mr. Macdonald: A European central bank, because it would be composed of people from all the different countries—not just the fast growing and big countries but all countries, including the more economically backward areas of the Community—would provide a more balanced view of Europe's overall economic needs than either the Bundesbank now provides of those needs or the Bank of England, City-dominated and London-centred, provides of Britain's overall economic needs.

Mr. Radice: That is why the French have been such supporters of the idea of a European central bank. They want to mitigate the influence of the Bundesbank. That fact supports the point that my hon. Friend is making.

Mr. Macdonald: My right hon. Friend is right, and what he says relates to a larger point. We must see the treaty and the progress towards monetary union not only in their own terms but in relation to the other options.

The convergence criteria are equally controversial to many of my hon. Friends, who argue that they are hostile to economic growth, to the achievement of high employment, and so on. My first point is——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Macdonald: I have not yet made my point, so I shall do so before taking an intervention.

My first point is that if we are to move towards a monetary union, clearly there has to be some kind of central monetary and financial control over its members. We have to make sure that one member cannot pursue a course of irresponsible unilateral solo deficit running, which would inevitably have an impact on the other members. That being so, it is reasonable and right that there be some central restraint and control over members of the union—for example, contol over the kind of deficits that they are allowed to run. That happens now within the monetary union of the United Kingdom, in which the central Government exercise control over local authorities, and it must inevitably happen within a monetary union covering Europe as a whole.

Mr. Hain: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Macdonald: No. I must go on and make my second point.

The key point is that the central control must be flexible. It cannot be rigid; it must allow for differences and for stresses and strains within the monetary union—and the treaty allows for exactly that flexibility.

Mr. Cash: Has it occurred to the hon. Gentleman that the convergence conditions are precisely designed to create unemployment? Furthermore, has it occurred to him that the arrangements for capping under the excessive deficit procedure are designed to ensure that public expenditure will be capped? Does he appreciate that the system will not work, and that the cohesion funds will not make their way from one part of Europe to another, because there is neither the will not the ability to pay? Does he appreciate that the system will therefore collapse?

The Chairman: Order. That is too long an intervention.

Mr. Macdonald: I disagree with the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) about the cohesion funds. I believe that there is both a need and a desire to develop a Community in which there is more fiscal transfer than at present. That will be necessary. If it were not for the resistance of the United Kingdom Government, we should have drawn a little closer to that goal at Edinburgh.

Of course the convergence conditions are not designed to create unemployment. They are designed to lead to monetary union. But it is valid to ask whether, in the process of meeting the convergence criteria in order to achieve that goal, we may impose conditions upon ourselves which are too severe, and which may lead to unemployment and so on. I question the idea of 1999 as the date by which monetary union will be achieved. I am sceptical about that.

Mr. Hain: In giving a general blessing to the convergence criteria, to the narrowness and rigidity of the treaty, and to the idea of an independent central European bank—and with that an independent Bank of England —is my hon. Friend in line with Labour party policy as expressed by the Front-Bench spokesmen?

Mr. Macdonald: As I said when I spoke about an independent central bank in an intervention last night, I did not expect that all my hon. Friends would agree with me on that subject. Tonight I have tried to argue that blind resistance to any notion of an independent central bank is not necessarily grounded in real fears about the economic and social consequences involved. If one compares the experience of the United Kingdom to that in Germany or Sweden, my argument is that to have a politically independent central bank does not necessarily lead to the economic and social goals that my hon. Friends want.

The Chairman: Order. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would address the Chair and not simply talk to his hon. Friends. I should also be grateful if he could now conclude talking to his friends.

Mr. Macdonald: I apologise. I will try to work through to a conclusion.

9.30 pm

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Did I hear you correctly when you asked my hon. Friend to conclude his remarks, or were you just bringing him to order?

The Chairman: No, the hon. Gentleman misheard me. I asked the hon. Member for Western Isles to conclude his remarks on the point raised by the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) so that we can get on with the specific amendment.

Mr. Macdonald: I know that other hon. Members wish to participate in the debate. I shall conclude by referring to the convergence criteria. My point is that the convergence criteria are flexible within the wording of the treaty. In the first instance, the treaty provides that some countries may not meet the convergence criteria and, therefore, will not qualify for monetary union. Paragraph 3 in article 109k on page 29 of the treaty provides a specific exemption for countries which, because of their inability or lack of willingness to meet the convergence critiera, do not qualify for monetary union. The article specifies that countries which do not meet the convergence criteria or qualify for monetary union are not subject to the fines, constraints and penalties to which some of my hon. Friends have referred. The Council of Ministers can agree that certain countries are exempt from the fines because of their economic circumstances, and such countries will not qualify for, or achieve the goal of, monetary union.

The framework laid down in the treaty is not so rigid as some would insist that it is; there is room for an opt-out, not just for the United Kingdom but for every country in the Community.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Even when countries operate under the rules, is it not the case that there may be circumstances in which the member states may decide that the rules do not apply? In the case of fines, the word "may" is used throughout the protocol.

Mr. Macdonald: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is the point that I was coming to. It is the flexibility not only of a country joining the monetary union but also of the convergence criteria not applying to a member of the currency union after it has joined the monetary union, and the penalties not applying to a member of the monetary union if it fails to meet the convergence critiera. That is decided by the Council of Ministers. I grant that to my hon. Friends.

Any member of the monetary union must argue its case with the other members of the monetary union on the basis of its particular economic circumstances and say that it cannot meet the inflation criteria, the budget deficit criteria or some of the other criteria. If the country successfully argues its case in the Council of Ministers, the constraints, fines and penalties no longer apply.

Mr. Winnick: I have listened with great care to what my hon. Friend is saying. Despite everything else, does he accept that that takes away the authority of the House of Commons and the Government of the day and places them in a position, at best, in which we would be virtually begging the body involved for permission to overspend in the circumstances that my hon. Friend described? Is my hon. Friend not worried about the erosion of the basic sovereignty of this House of Commons and this country —the very reasons why we are here in the first place—quite apart from the cuts which will undoubtedly occur in public spending?

Mr. Macdonald: Of course I worry about that, but I ask my hon. Friend to face up to reality—which is that we face such constraints whether we are inside a monetary union or outside it. I ask my hon. Friends to recall the history of the 1970s when we had to beg the International Monetary Fund for permission to run a deficit. I ask my hon. Friends to recall the history of the past year and, indeed, this year, when we had to beg the Bundesbank to reduce its interest rates because of the condition of our country.

Mr. Winnick: Until we left the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Macdonald: Yes. I remind my hon. Friend that we are still begging the Bundesbank to reduce its interest rates because they place constraints on our ability to deliver our economic goals.

The point is simply that we shall have to operate in an international environment whether we are inside the monetary union or outside it. I argue that we are better placed within the Council of Ministers to convince our colleagues—and frequently our socialist colleagues—within it of the special needs of the United Kingdom than trying to persuade the bankers of the Bundesbank or of the IMF of Britain's special case.

The arguments about the future course of economic policy in Britain will continue after the treaty has been passed. We shall continue to need to negotiate and make agreements with international partners after the treaty has been passed. The treaty is not the watershed that some of my hon. Friends would like to insist that it is. It moves the argument away from a purely national stage on to a European stage. I argue that that strengthens our position and helps us to win our arguments in those spheres in the future.

The Chairman: Rev. Ian——

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:——

The Committee proceeded to a Division——

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: May I point out that it must be on the procedure relating to the Division, not on any decision of the Chair.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Sir, you called my name and I stood up. The Whip was entirely out of order. I was called and I want you to rule on that. You called my name. I should like a ruling, Sir. You had called my name and, according to the Standing Orders of the House, I was entitled to speak.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is correct, but the closure may be moved at any point. I am not to know when the closure is to be moved. I merely have to judge whether it is an appropriate time for the closure to be accepted or not. I made that decision.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. I have listened carefully to what you said, but if I was called, I was at least entitled to utter some words before being interrupted by the Whip who moved the closure motion; that did not happen.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman makes a point, but my judgment was that it was appropriate to conclude the debate as the motion had been put. The closure motion can be moved at any stage of any speech. It is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman had only just been called.

Mr. Bill Walker (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Is it on procedure?

Mr. Walker: Yes. The procedures of the House are designed, as I understand it, to give the House the opportunity, in Committee or elsewhere, to hear clearly views from all parts of the United Kingdom. When you made your judgment to accept the closure motion, were you satisfied that the interests of all parts of the United Kingdom had been heard during the four-day debate that has taken place, because if not——

The Chairman: Order. I understand the point of order, but I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to page 406 of "Erskine May", where he will read that the discretion of the Chair is absolute and is not open to dispute.

Mr. Walker: I am not disputing your decision but asking whether, in a constitutional debate, it will enhance the reputation of this Parliament in Scotland. If it does not, this day will be remembered for a long time by Scots.

The Committee having divided: Ayes 298, Noes 240.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I will take points of order afterwards.

It being after Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Alnwick (Development Area Status)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Patnick.]

10.6 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder if you would be good enough to give the House some guidance as to how you intend to call right hon. and hon. Members in the course of our important discussions on the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that, as he will observe, I am now a reincarnation of the Deputy Speaker, and therefore discussion on proceedings in the Committee is not in order. Mr. Beith.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I make the point that the right hon. Member who has the Adjournment debate is a Back Bencher and has waited a considerable time for it. I will take quick points of order, but no more.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have always understood that the duty of the Speaker was to protect the interests especially of Back Benchers. I have also understood during the 22 years that I have been here that the House represents England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, and that it makes no difference where an hon. Member comes from; but I have also understood that all sections of the community represented here would be called in debates to give their view.

I should like to ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if it is worth while for hon. Members from Northern Ireland to come to the House for the debate that has been concluded if, on all the days that they have asked to be called, they have not been called, and if, when they are called, the Government gag them. Is there no way whereby an hon. Member can be reasonably assured that, if he sits through all the debates—I understand that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) wants to speak; I too have sat through all these debates—he will be allowed to speak?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. This is a United Kingdom Parliament, and the Chair tries to choose hon. Members to contribute to all debates on that basis.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman has an Adjournment debate. The hon. Member has raised a point of order already.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Walker—with reluctance.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. If hon. Members wish to participate in debates, either in a normal session in the Chamber or in Committee, does the Chair, in its capacity of protecting the interests of Back Benchers and all aspects of Back Benchers' interests—in other words, whether they sit on the Opposition Benches or on the Government Benches—and in the interests of attempting to procure a balance, achieve that balance? If so, thus far no one from Scotland on the Conservative Benches has spoken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already ruled that I cannot comment at this stage on what went on in Committee.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No, the hon. Member has had one point of order. I hope that this is a totally different one. Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Budgen: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was unable to make my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member made his point of order. I made it quite clear, and I make it clear to all hon. Members in the Chamber at the moment, that I am now sitting here as Madam Speaker's Deputy. Neither she nor I can comment on what has happened in a Committee of the House. Points raised then should be raised at the next meeting of the Committee and not in the Adjournment debate of another hon. Member.

Mr. Beith: It is a convention of the House that hon. Members respect the fact that another hon. Member has the Adjournment debate, because the time that they take is taken out of the Adjournment debate.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a matter that is important to my constituents. I am glad to have the attention of the Minister for Industry. He and I were elected to Parliament on the same day, and he will know that since then I have often raised the need for development area status in the area that we are talking about.

I am talking about the Northumberland coalfield area. I am glad to be able to make a further plea on its behalf before the Minister reaches his final decisions about which parts of the country shall have development area status now that he is reviewing the map. I appreciate that he cannot give me the answer that I want in this debate, because the map for the whole country will be announced at once at a later debate. He will then be obliged to take into account the results of the review of the disastrous pit closures plan, even though nothing in his tool kit of development measures could possibly cope with the deluge of unemployment that would result if anything like that original programme of closures went ahead.

I want to direct the Minister's attention to an area that is already suffering desperately from decades of pit closures. The Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area lost development area status in 1984, since when I have been campaigning with local authorities to get it restored. At the same time, the Morpeth and Ashington area, which includes an adjoining part of my constituency around Lynemouth and Ellington, was reduced to intermediate status, and I supported a similar campaign for the area. Sadly, the employment situation in these areas has worsened during the period and their cases therefore become stronger. Pit closures have continued, and with the area having to compete with assisted areas, almost no new inward investment has been recorded since 1984.

The area that we are discussing is the main part of the Northumberland coalfield. The Alnwick and Amble travel-to work area includes the town of Alnwick, which, although it is a market town, has depended significantly on coal mining, and Amble, which was once a busy mining and coal shipping town. The area also includes Seahouses, traditionally a fishing port with significant tourism, and remote and beautiful areas such as the Rothbury area.

The fact that the travel-to work area was so wide was one of the factors that led to its loss of development status in 1984, because it diluted the high unemployment figure in Amble and Alnwick, but unemployment has now increased throughout the area. Alnwick district council has submitted a strong and well-documented case to the review on behalf of the area.

The Hadston and Broomhill part of Castle Morpeth district, consisting mainly of a large housing estate built specifically to house people from the old mining villages, is also in the Alnwick and Amble travel-to work area. Castle Morpeth borough council pointed out in its submission to the Department of Trade and Industry some months ago how absurd it is that this deprived part of its area, which at that time had 12 per cent. unemployment, did not have development area status, yet the much more prosperous Ponteland part of the area, with 3·5 per cent. unemployment, had the full benefit of development area status.

Those figures have increased significantly since, but there is still a huge difference, with the most prosperous area having development status and the most deprived not. Castle Morpeth would like to keep its development status in the Ponteland area because of the potential for development at the airport, but it throws into sharp focus how wrong it is that the most deprived part of the borough should not have development status.

A recent study of the Hadston estate for the Northumberland coalfield task force, which was set up with the help of the Minister's Department, revealed that 38 per cent. of unemployed claimants had been out of work for more than two years, and that 55 per cent. of those interviewed had worked for a total of less than a year in the previous five years. This is a desperate problem of long-term unemployment, with resulting social problems in an area that the Government have wrongly excluded from assisted area help.

Immediately south of Hadston are the coalfield communities of Ellington, Lynemouth, Linton and Widdrington, which have the inadequate intermediate status because they are in the Morpeth and Ashington travel-to-work areas. The whole of the area has been hit hard by a succession of pit closures in recent years. At Shilbottle and Whittle collieries in the Alnwick area—although Whittle now operates as a small private drift—at Lynemouth and at nearby Woodhorn, Ashington and Bates collieries thousands of jobs have disappeared in the past decade.

The only remaining British coal pit in Northumberland, and potentially the only one in the north-east, is in my constituency, at Ellington, and it is no secret that it was on the closure list until days before that dreadful list was published. Closely linked with the fate of that colliery at Ellington are the Alcan power station and smelter, as well as the Blyth power station. More than half the jobs at Alcan have gone as production has been cut back. If any one of this complex of related industries were to go altogether, the whole structure could go, with the loss of more than 3,000 jobs.

PA Cambridge Economic Consultants have advised Northumberland county council that, if that happens, unemployment in the Morpeth and Ashington travel-to-work area would approach 17 per cent. That was the advice some months ago. On the latest national figures, that would be higher. A similarly sharp rise would happen in the Amble and Alnwick area.

Even on the most optimistic scenario, without such a catastrophe, they expected unemployment to rise to 15 per cent. in the Morpeth and Ashington area, and to more than 13 per cent. in the Alnwick and Amble area. In the meantime, since they made those forecasts, the Alnwick and Amble figure has reached 14·2 per cent.

Unfortunately, other industries on which this area depends face dramatic job losses. The Alnwick and Amble area has an exceptionally high proportion of employment in agriculture, forestry and fishing. It has been estimated that 800 jobs will be lost in farming in Northumberland following the CAP reforms, and at least a third of those will be in this area. Fishing and associated trades face certain job losses because of restrictions on fishing opportunities and the Government's deplorable decision to phase out the north-east salmon fishery. The building industry has been devasted in the recession. Indeed, the main source of new employment in the Amble area has been the prison service, one of the few industries that seems to have survived the recession in reasonable numbers.

From an employment point of view, this whole area from Alnwick to Ashington needs the same level of support, and needs it very badly. The DTI recognised that under the previous Minister, when it set up the coalfield task force. Europe recognises it; the whole area is eligible for help under objective 2 and under the RECHAR scheme, which was so long delayed by the argument over additionality.

A lot of work is going on to help the area through these schemes, through local authorities and by the efforts of industry. Other things are needed, like full dualling of the A1 and investment in education and housing, currently squeezed by local government spending restrictions, but much of this work will be undermined if, when the new assisted area map is announced, all or part of the Northumberland coalfield is left without assisted area status, competing with areas which do have it and can therefore offer better incentives to inward investors or existing businesses.

Many of the businesses already established within our area belong to groups and companies which have plants elsewhere in Britain or abroad, and their head offices or main boards may very well shift new investment to plants which are enjoying development status either in Britain or in some equivalent form in other countries. The Northern Development Company has made clear that the evidence of past investment is that the north of England will not attract inward investment without assisted areas status.

The main factors which the Government have said that they will take into account in making their decision on this matter are current rates of unemployment, persistence of unemployment rates above the national average, the proportion of long-term unemployed in the local work force, the likely future demand for jobs and peripherality and distance from markets. The Alnwick and Amble area and Morpeth and Ashington area both pass all those tests. Unemployment in both areas is at present more than 14 per cent., with male unemployment at or above 20 per cent. and as high as 70 per cent. on some housing estates.

Apart from the impact of limited amounts of seasonal work, a large part of the unemployment is long-term. The job losses I have described in mining, farming and fishing, and the fragile nature of employment in the Ellington, Lynemouth and Blyth complex, mean that we must prepare for future job losses on a large scale. The area could hardly be more peripheral: it is further from London and from the channel tunnel than any other part of England.

The case is so strong that I do not see how the Minister can, in all justice, fail to accept it.

10.18 pm

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, we were elected to the House on the same day. Therefore, it is a privilege to reply to his debate on what he sees as the need for assistance for his constituency. I know that he takes a great interest in his constituency, as I do in mine, and I sometimes envy the opportunity that he has to raise issues as he has done this evening.

The right hon. Gentleman understandably focused his remarks on the importance of assisted area status. It is especially understandable when one bears in mind the fact that the area, or part of it, had the status before 1984. As he knows, the current review of the future shape of the assisted area map was announced last June, and the criteria on which the review is based were set out in the consultation document.

We invited interested parties to submit their views and, as the consultation document explains, the primary base for the review is the range of statistical information on unemployment, which includes data on the current level, the persistence of unemployment rates above the national average in recent years and the proportion of the long-term unemployed in the local work force.

Other factors considered include demographic changes and the likely future demand for jobs in the area, taking account of the growth or decline in local industries—I shall deal with that point in relation to the mining industry to which the right hon. Gentleman referred—and other measures of economic performance, including activity rates and the important issue of peripherality to which he also referred. As he said, in England one cannot get further from the channel tunnel—I do not know what his hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) would say about the situation across the border.

The review is based on the existing travel-to-work areas, which are broad approximations of self-contained labour markets. It will be a year or more—I suspect more —before new travel-to-work areas are defined using the data from the 1991 census. The current map covered about 35 per cent. of the working population of Great Britain when it was designated in 1984. Of that, development areas covered 15 per cent. and intermediate areas the remaining 20 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman said something about the inadequacy of intermediate area status, but I do not think it is regarded in that way by many of those who have submitted requests for such status. It is a valuable and valued status.

[Mr. Tim Sainsbury]

It is unlikely that the coverage of the new map will be greater than now, and it could be somewhat less. Coverage of the new map will, of course, have to be agreed with the European Commission, as it was in 1984.

The broad objectives of Government policy with regard to the assisted area map continue to be to reduce regional imbalances in employment opportunities and to encourage the development of indigenous potential within the assisted areas on a stable and long-term basis.

During the consultation period last year, more than 1,500 written representations were received from Great Britain, and, by the end of last year, Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry had held meetings with more than 50 delegations, in addition to the delegations seen by my colleagues in Wales and Scotland during the same period.

I have received detailed representations, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, from Northumberland county council and Alnwick district council in support of development area status for the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area. Those representations cover comprehensively the effects on the TTWA of structural unemployment changes, especially in the coal industry which, as he said, had a considerable effect on the area some time ago. They also cover the difficulties faced by the area in attracting new industries because of the distances and the lower-than-average rates of small firm formation and participation in economic activity.

Before the previous review of the assisted area map in 1984, the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area enjoyed intermediate area status. At that time, Ministers decided that other areas had more pressing problems and that Alnwick and Amble should not be included in the revised map. Of course I am aware that that decision was, not surprisingly, not well received by the county council. That proves that intermediate area status is valued by local authorities and industries.

The current review, like that of 1984, is based on travel-to-work areas, which are the smallest areas for which reliable statistical information on unemployment is available. However, loss of intermediate area status has not meant that the area has been without assistance, and I shall say a few words about the situation since 1984.

First, there is the status of the area for European regional policy purposes. The various maps defining eligibility for European Community structural funds are separate from the assisted area map—which defines eligibility for aid from my Department—and are drawn up against criteria decided by the Community. I expect to receive from the European Commission at the end of this month proposals for new regulations governing, amongst other things, the selection of objective 2 areas—those suffering from industrial decline. The designation of areas under the new arrangements is unlikely to be completed until the middle of this year, and it will come into force from 1 January 1994.

As a result of its status under objective 2 of the structural funds, the Alnwick and Amble area has had access to individual project support from the European regional development fund and, subsequently, to the Tyne and Wear/south-east Northumberland integrated development operations programme—referred to as "TAWSEN". In addition, part of the travel-to-work area surrounding Amble is eligible under the TAWSEN RECHAR programme for former coal-mining areas, under which £11·5 million is available. So far, 53 applications have been received for more than £6 million of this, and £3·7 million has been approved for 27 projects.

A major beneficiary of European regional development fund support has been the marina development in Amble, which received a £700,000 grant in 1986. Other projects that have received support include the development of the employment training workshop at Amble, the second stage of the development of the Alnwick playhouse and improvements to tourism information throughout the area.

Secondly, the Rural Development Commission has operated a programme of advice for businesses and for the provision of premises in the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is well aware of this, as, last month, he performed the opening ceremony for the scheme of 10 workshop units at Alnwick—units ranging from 550 sq ft to 1,850 sq ft—developed by English Estates for the Rural Development Commission. That was part of a programme that has seen the provision in the Alnwick and Amble area since 1984 of more than 54,000 sq ft of workshop units and 10,000 sq ft of factory units, at a total cost of about £2·5 million. Of the total of 108,000 sq ft of space in 61 units in the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area, 70,000 sq ft in 39 units is let, providing an estimated 280 jobs.

The Rural Development Commission also provides grants to return redundant buildings to productive business use; marketing and exhibition grants to help rural firms to achieve profitable sales; and quality assurance courses to help rural businesses to prepare to accreditation. A wide variety of projects have been supported in the area, ranging from the provision of a rural coalfields development worker based in Hadston to a grant towards a centre for voluntary organisations to provide a "one stop" service. Since 1989, the area has had £165,000 of funding approved under the rural development programme.

The Rural Development Commission has just begun a review of its rural priority areas. It has published its proposals for handling the review, which it expects to complete later this year.

Enterprise support for small and medium-sized businesses in the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area is provided by the training and enterprise council for Northumberland at its customer support centre in Alnwick, and includes access to business counselling services. The Northumberland TEC also provides a range of training support measures, including the business enterprise programme and business growth training.

From its total budget for this financial year of over £14·8 million the TEC has contracted to provide 126,000 weeks of youth training, or more than 2,000 places, and 42,000 weeks of employment training, or a further 1,200 places. I am glad to say that it has been distinguished as the only north-east TEC, and only one of three nationally, to achieve four bonus points in the TEC performance awards for 1991-92.

I congratulate the TEC on its achievements to date. I am sure that it will continue to make a major contribution to the development of the skills of the work force of the area. As I am sure the right hon. Gentleman agrees, the development of skills is particularly important when it comes to ensuring economic revival and the strength of the area's economy. I look forward in due course to seeing the Northumberland TEC's response to the invitation to bid for a one-stop shop.

Mr. Beith: The Minister referred to a number of bodies that are helping in the area. I hope he will note that every one of those bodies treats the coalfield area as a whole and works throughout it. Not one of them divides it into three separate categories of eligibility, as his Department has done up to now, and as I hope it will stop doing when it publishes its new map.

Mr. Sainsbury: I note what the right hon. Gentleman says, and I am sure that they, like my Department, are seeking to target their help effectively to where it is most needed. I recognise that the area, like the rest of Britain, has been experiencing difficult trading conditions in recent times, and I note from the submission made by the district council that the position of the area in relation to the whole of Great Britain is broadly the same now as it was in 1984.

I was also pleased to note, from the same source, its estimate of a net increase of 12 per cent. in the number of VAT-registered businesses in the area over the same period, even in the face of the difficulties to which the submissions, and the right hon. Member, referred. The Government will continue their efforts to dismantle unnecessary bureaucracy and encourage the formation of new businesses.

Despite its relatively small size—approximately 1,000 businesses and a work force of about 14,000—I am pleased to note from local press reports the successes achieved by businesses in the area. I understand that Phoenix Mountaineering, which was set up in Amble 11 years ago, has grown to employ 130 people and has, for the fourth season, been the supplier of ski wear to the British Olympic team. The right hon. Gentleman will join me in congratulating the company on that. The enterprise of local residents has been further demonstrated by 3 Bears Playthings of Rothbury, which recently received a European Community award under the women's enterprise initiative for creating employment opportunities for women in a rural area.

Understandably, the right hon. Gentleman referred to reductions in employment in the coal industry. I am very much aware of the importance attached by the local community to the last deep mine in Northumberland; as the right hon. Member knows, Ellington is not among the collieries currently under review. My officials in the DTI north-east regional office, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy, in his capacity as Minister for the north-east, have had discussions with members of the local business community about the strategic interdependence of coal mining at Ellington, the activities of the port of Blyth and aluminium manufacture at the British Alcan smelter.

The importance of those activities to employment in the immediate area and beyond is recognised. As a result, I assure the right hon. Member that I am fully aware of the local situation and its effect on the local community.

The county of Northumberland has a proud history as one of the earliest areas in which coal was mined on an industrial scale. It is perhaps inevitable that there have been extensive closures in the last 20 years as coal reserves have become worked out or too costly to access. Northumberland county council has clearly brought out in its submission to me the position since 1980, with closures of six collieries, the last being Ashington in 1988. I recognise that the closure of the Ashington complex, like Ellington outside the Alnwick and Amble travel -to-work area, undoubtedly had its effects in the right hon. Member's constituency.

In recognition of the difficulties faced in the Wansbeck district of the Morpeth and Ashington travel-to-work area, my Department is supporting the work of the Wansbeck initiative. That body involves local authority, central Government and enterprise agency members and is aimed at the regeneration of the area, which includes the former Ashington complex. Substantial progress has been made in dealing with the residues of coal mining, and the plans for the Ashington business park mark the next stage in the reclamation of the area. When completed, those will provide landscaped amenity land and a 50-acre business park capable of providing 500,000 sq ft of accommodation.

The right hon. Member will welcome the efforts currently being made by the reconstituted Northumberland coalfields task force, in which my Department participates, to regenerate the area from Alnwick to Cramlington. It has set up a number of subordinate task groups, each served by a particular district. It is perhaps most appropriate to the subject of the economic regeneration of the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area that Alnwick district council looks after the business development group on which DTI, English Estates, British Coal Enterprise, the Rural Development Commission and other bodies are represented, and that co-operation is valuable.

I have carefully noted what the right hon. Gentleman said. I assure him that the points he raised will be carefully considered and taken into account with all the other submissions I have received, including those from Northumberland county council and Alnwick district council specifically concerning the area.

Mr. Beith: I am sure that the Minister will remember that the relevant part of Castle Morpeth borough, and the parishes to which I referred, must also feature in his study.

Mr. Sainsbury: As I said, I have carefully noted everything that the right hon. Gentleman said. He will appreciate that I cannot today anticipate the completion of the assisted area map review as a whole and make a specific announcement about a particular area. The review will be concluded as early as possible in 1993. Taking account of the coal inquiry, an announcement will be made as soon as possible after the necessary clearance with the European Commission.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Local Authority Tenants

9.34 am

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I wish to present a petition from 500 local authority tenants who reside in the city of Cambridge in my constituency. Their concern is

That Section 105 of the Housing Act 1985, part of the original Tenants Charter of the Housing Act 1980, gives a most important right to council tenants in England and Wales in that it obliges their landlord authority to consult them on matters of housing management.

The right of tenants to be consulted and to have their views taken into account when any subsequent decision is made is the foundation for tenant participation in housing management.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House: Will instruct the Government to make no amendment to reduce tenants' rights under Section 105, Housing Act 1985 (1985 c. 68) and to therefore strike out Clause 114(2) of the Housing and Urban Development Bill, published on Thursday, 22nd October 1992, and strike out clause 115(1) of the Bill insofar as it concerns the proposed amendment made in Section 27(AA)4 of the 1985 Act.

To lie upon the Table.

Treaty of Maastricht (Referendum)

9.36 am

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I present the second group of petitions signed by many tens of thousands of people from all over the United Kingdom who are in favour of and opposed to the Maastricht treaty and represent a wide range of political opinion. The petitioners state:

That the provisions of the Maastricht Treaty, which was negotiated by the heads of Government of the member states within the European Community, are designed to bring about a European Union, complete with its own constitution, in which all the countries that are party to it, will belong; That this union, and its laws, will have a profound effect upon the way in which the United Kingdom is governed, and upon the democratic rights of the citizens of this country to elect and remove those who now enact and administer the laws of this nation".

The main point of the petition is

That the British people have been given no right to determine, for themselves, in a democratic vote, whether or not they wish these constitutional changes to be made".

The Petition ends in the traditional way:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House: Will ensure that before the Maastricht Treaty, or any modification or amendment of it, is approved by Parliament, or ratified by Her Majesty's Government, the citizens of the United Kingdom shall be given the right to vote for, or against, that Treaty, in a National Referendum, and that the decision reached in that Referendum be accepted as binding upon the Government and Parliament.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Osteopaths Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.38 am

Mr. Malcolm Moss (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It is a singular privilege for me to have a double opportunity this morning, first to present a private Member's Bill but especially to present such an important piece of legislation which will not only enhance dramatically the professional status of the osteopathic profession but will be a milestone on the road to recognition for complementary medicine as a whole.

I begin by thanking the King's Fund and its working party, and in particular Simon Fielding, who has been a great help to me in the past few months. I am glad that he is present today. I thank officials from the Department of Health, who have given me every assistance possible, and Lord Walton, whose Bill I have taken over because his original Bill fell in the Lords earlier this year. I thank hon. Members of all parties who have supported the Bill, and I especially thank Opposition Members who will speak in its support today.

Some consternation was expressed to me just before Christmas when it was discovered that I was about to embark on a week's skiing with the Lords and Commons ski team. There was the prospect either that I would be standing here with one or more limbs in plaster or that I would be flat on my back, which would not have been the most auspicious circumstances in which to present the Bill.

Osteopathy is a system of diagnosis and treatment which lays its main emphasis on the structural and mechanical problems of the body. It is not regarded as an alternative to conventional medicine, but rather as a complementary therapy, offering patients an additional option in the treatment of certain conditions affecting the body's mechanical functions.

Osteopathic treatment predominantly comprises gentle manual methods. It utilises a diagnostic procedure similar to conventional medical examination, but it pays especial attention to the patient's musculo-skeletal system. Osteopathy is the most widely used of the complementary therapies. I am sure that many hon. Members have availed themselves of the services of an osteopath at some time, and many are here today to support the Bill.

It is estimated that there are now well over 2,000 osteopaths practising in the United Kingdom, and that they are visited by 100,000 patients every week. Given its growing popularity and widespread use, it is of key importance that there should also be safeguards for the public which will ensure, for example, adequate clinical training for all those who are entitled to call themselves osteopaths.

An essential element of the training is to equip practitioners with the ability to recognise conditions for which osteopathic treatment is inappropriate and cases in which the patient should be referred to a registered medical practitioner. The final essential component of the safeguards needs to be the provision of effective disciplinary procedures to ensure that the profession achieves and maintains the very highest standards.

[Mr. Malcolm Moss]

I was encouraged in my decision to take the Bill forward by the support now given by the medical profession to osteopaths in their quest for statutory registration. For some time, the British Medical Association has accepted that there is "an organised, reputable and coherent body of knowledge underlying osteopathic practice".

The BMA has also stated its belief that the increasing practice of cross-referral between general medical practitioners and osteopaths has been of immense benefit to patients.

The support has not always been so warm. Until the mid-1970s, doctors were prevented from referring patients to any practitioner who was not medically qualified. I very much welcome the change of heart which is demonstrated by the increasing interest of doctors in osteopathy, and by an increasing willingness to refer patients to osteopaths. There is also a growing public interest in a variety of complementary therapies, not least osteopathy, which leads me to believe that the Bill is very timely.

The Bill is modelled on the recommendations for statutory regulation presented in the report by the King's Fund working party on osteopathy, which were enshrined in the Bill presented by Lord Walton of Detchant in the previous Session. I know that the osteopathic profession would wish to join me in paying tribute to the King's Fund working party—and especially to its chairman, Sir Thomas Bingham—for its considerable contribution in advancing the cause for statutory regulation of osteopaths.

I appreciate that, at first glance, the similarity between my Bill and Lord Walton's may not be evident. That is primarily because the two pieces of legislation were penned by different hands. However, I can assure the House and the profession that both the fundamental principles and the key purposes of the two Bills are identical. The first purpose is to establish a representative governing body for osteopaths and the second is to set in place a fair and practical system of statutory regulation for the profession.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I welcome the legislation, and especially the part to which my hon. Friend has just referred. Does he agree that a professional body in medicine established now has an opportunity to set new standards for such professional bodies simply by being newly established and by not carrying with it the bag and baggage of some of the older professional bodies in medicine, which have sometimes seemed over-protective of their members?

Mr. Moss: The Bill breaks new ground in setting standards of regulation that have not yet been met by some of the other medical groups. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) will realise as I continue my speech that a great deal of thought has gone into the Bill, not only to make it a landmark for future legislation to encompass more medical groups, but to incorporate in it some clauses that existing medical groups that have regulation may want to take up at a later date.

I also assure the House that the Bill encapsulates the recommendations for initial registration made in the working party's report to enable, as far as possible, osteopaths in current practice to qualify for registration. The Bill also extends the provisions to enable certain other practitioners who might not otherwise have been able to meet the conditions for registration to be registered.

I shall explain in greater detail later the different ways in which practitioners will be able to qualify for registration. I have mentioned the point now about extending eligibility to illustrate not only how the Bill is firmly rooted in the working party's recommendations, but how it builds on that solid foundation. That reflects the input in policy from across government, the experiences of similar statutory schemes such as the General Medical Council, our European obligations, competition laws and aspects of human rights.

The primary object of the Bill is to set in place a professionally led, statutory registration scheme for osteopaths. It would be similar to those existing for many other professional groups, including all the key health professionals. The scheme would be achieved primarily through the establishment of a General Osteopathic Council, which would have the statutory responsibility to develop, to promote and to regulate the profession of osteopathy throughout the United Kingdom, and to set educational standards and standards of professional conduct.

The Bill would also establish four statutory committees of the General Osteopathic Council. The first would be the education committee, which would have the responsibility of promoting high standards of education in osteopathy and of providing the general council with advice on all matters concerning education, training and examinations in osteopathy. The three other committees would be the investigating committee, the professional conduct committee and the health committee, which collectively would provide the fitness-to-practise machinery.

The three committees would provide the key function of ensuring that an allegation made against an osteopath concerning his professional conduct or competence to practise was properly investigated and dealt with effectively. The committee's remit would also cover allegations that a practitioner had been convicted of a criminal offence, or that he or she was unfit to practise for reasons of ill health.

The statutory scheme would replace the current system of voluntary regulation. That has worked exceptionally well for the majority of practitioners, and it has played a key role in paving the way for statutory regulation. However, by its very nature, a voluntary system is unable to enforce standards of competence or conduct. If a practitioner chooses not to participate in the scheme, the regulatory body is completely powerless to exercise any jurisdiction over that individual's practice.

That fundamental weakness brings into sharp focus the need for the statutory scheme. As the law stands, anyone can call himself or herself an osteopath and set up in practice. There is no obligation to undergo any formal training or to comply with standards of professional competence. Members of the public therefore have no guarantee that a person holding himself out as an osteopath is properly qualified and competent to do so. The only recourse that patients have in the event of mishap is through the common law.

Under my Bill, the system of voluntary regulation would be replaced by a single statutory body capable of enforcing standards of training, education, proficiency and professional conduct throughout the profession in the United Kingdom. The body would also have powers to require anyone wishing to practise as an osteopath to conform to those standards, be registered with the statutory council and submit himself to its authority. The statutory council would thus have the unique ability to unite the profession and sweep aside the current fragmentation.

The achievement of statutory regulation would, I believe, herald the dawn of an exciting new era for the osteopathic profession. It is essential, however, that, in reaching out for the prize of tomorrow, the profession does not let go the trophies that it holds today.

I have mentioned that the current systems of voluntary registration have provided the solid foundation for a statutory scheme, but, even assuming the successful passage of the Bill, it could take up to two years before the machinery to drive the statutory scheme is fully in place. I therefore urge individuals in the profession, many of whom are here today, not to abandon the current schemes prematurely. The successful transition to statutory regulation will depend heavily on their continued support and maintenance.

I emphasise that the statutory scheme would be not only led but regulated by the profession. For that reason, 12 of the proposed 24 members of the General Osteopathic Council would be osteopaths elected by the profession itself. Eight of the remaining members would be non-osteopaths, appointed by the Privy Council. Those members would represent wider interests and, in particular, the views of patients. That would help to increase the breadth of experience within the general council and ensure that the profession had a firm and balanced basis on which to develop in future.

The other four members of the general council would include a person with experience in medical education, nominated by the Secretary of State, and three members appointed by the education committee to represent the interests of training institutions in the United Kingdom. The balance of different members is mirrored in all other statutory regulatory schemes; the scheme, like all its counterparts, would be overseen by the Privy Council.

Eagle-eyed Members may have spotted an omission from the Bill—there are no arrangements for establishing the very first General Osteopathic Council. It is not possible for the arrangements currently in the schedule to apply to the first general council because, at the start of the scheme, there will be no registered osteopaths to be elected or to vote. Special transitional arrangements will therefore need to be provided, and I propose to specify them in an amendment to the schedule in Committee.

What I have in mind is that the initial osteopathic and lay members of the general council would be appointed by the Privy Council. That is in keeping with the practice followed in the establishment of other statutory schemes, and was endorsed by the working party in its report.

To ensure that the general council reflects a balance of good professional opinion, experience and practice, the initial osteopathic members would, of course, be appointed after consultation with those bodies that administer the current scheme of voluntary registration. The individuals would not, however, be representatives of any particular organisation—nor would they be beholden to any sectoral interests. Instead, they would be selected on the basis of their individual ability and merit and would, in effect, be ambassadors for the profession as a whole.

The working party on osteopathy regarded the primary objective of any scheme of regulation to be the benefit and protection of patients. Having studied statutory schemes governing other professions, the working party concluded: "for all practical purposes there is no viable alternative to the statutory registration of osteopaths which should be open to inspection by members of the public."

That view was supported by all the organisations consulted by the working party, and I hope that it will be supported by the House today.

A statutory register of osteopaths would therefore form the core of the regulatory scheme. The register would be maintained by the registrar appointed by the general council. In future, all practitioners wishing to call themselves osteopaths would be required to be registered on the register. That requirement would be backed up by a provision in the Bill making it a criminal offence for an unregistered practitioner to use that title or any variation of it.

The closure of professional title was one of the key recommendations in the working party report. It is also a central provision of the Bill. I emphasise, however, that the offence will be related to the use of the title "osteopath". The Bill does not in any way seek to prohibit the use of osteopathic techniques by other manipulative therapists such as physiotherapists, or prevent them from telling their patients that they are using such techniques.

That brings me to the nub of the scheme—the proposed criteria for registration, which will clearly be of central concern to many people, not least those in the profession itself. As this is such a crucial part of the regulatory scheme, I should like to explain in detail the different categories of registration proposed under the Bill—and, in particular, the transitional arrangements that would apply.

Application for registration would be on a strictly individual basis. Membership of a particular professional body would not, therefore, confer any automatic right or advantage on an individual, although it is, of course, intended that the statutory scheme should embrace, so far as is practicable, practitioners currently registered under the system of voluntary registration.

The Bill provides for the "full" and "conditional" registration of existing practitioners. That is based on the recommendations made in the working party report, although "conditional registration", as referred to in the Bill, is what the working party called "provisional registration". The different title that we have selected more accurately reflects the conditional nature of that category of registration, and also offers the profession scope to introduce a more familiar system of provisional registration, along the lines of pre-registration for doctors, if it so wishes.

Entitlement to full registration is founded on the same principles of good character, qualification and experience as outlined in the working party's report. The provisions are intended to enable as many osteopaths in current practice as possible to qualify for registration, without compromising the key principle of providing the public with adequate and effective safeguards against inexperienced and untrained practitioners.

The Bill does, however, impose an additional requirement: practitioners would also have to be in good physical and mental health. A similar provision exists in the Dentists Act 1984. The intention is to enable the registrar at the outset to refuse registration to an applicant whose known state of health raises serious doubts about his ability to practise. Without such a provision, the registrar might have no other option but to register the practitioner and hope that he would be able to secure an early suspension of the osteopath's registration by immediately referring the matter to the health committee.

For an initial two-year transitional period, commencing on the day on which the register opens, a practitioner who does not hold a qualification recognised by the general council as one that equips him or her with the standards of education and training required for the safe and competent practice of osteopathy may still be entitled to full registration. That would be on the basis that he or she can satisfy the registrar that, for at least five of the preceding seven years, he or she has spent a substantial part of his or her working time in the safe, lawful and competent practice of osteopathy.

That arrangement follows the working party's recommendation and acknowledges that experienced practitioners who may not have the benefit of a properly structured course of training but who have been practising safely and competently in the name of osteopathy for many years should be brought within the scope of the regulatory scheme.

The Bill does, however, require that such practice should have been "lawful". That provision has been included so that the General Osteopathic Council is not, say, placed under an obligation to register an overseas practitioner on the basis of what might have been illegal practice in his home country. Conditional registration would be simply a transitional arrangement, with applications for that category of registration being permitted only during the two-year transitional period which I mentioned a few moments ago. I have already said that conditional registration is modelled closely on the working party's recommendations for provisional registration.

The purpose of conditional registration is to enable registration of practitioners who do not hold a recognised qualification, and who are unable to muster the five years out of seven safe, lawful and competent practice of osteopathy required for full registration. It is not in any way intended to create a two-tier system of registration, but was recommended by the working party as a mechanism to ensure that as many practitioners as possible are included under the Act.

Practitioners who are registered with conditional registration would fall into two categories. The first will be those who just fail to meet the five years out of seven criterion for full registration. Those practitioners will be eligible for full registration if they have spent a substantial part of their working time in the safe, lawful and competent practice of osteopathy for a total of four years out of the six years preceding the opening of the register. In addition, they may be required to undergo a test of competence and give an undertaking that, within a specified period, which would not exceed five years from the opening of the register, they will complete any further training and acquire such additional experience as specified by the registrar. I should add that, if a practitioner were found to be fully competent in the skills and knowledge required for full registration, no additional training would be specified, and he would be able to apply to have his registration suitably converted.

I said that the grounds under which practitioners will be able to qualify for registration had been extended to include a group that might not otherwise have been eligible. To be more accurate, practitioners in that group were more likely to have fallen between two stools. It had been assumed that all qualifications would be either recognised or rejected for recognition. On that basis, if a practitioner were told that his qualification was not a recognised one, he could still hope to qualify for registration on the strength of current or recent practice if an application were made within the two-year transitional period.

As a result of representations made to me, it became evident that practitioners may possess qualifications from an institution that has perhaps ceased to exist and that they may not have been in current or recent practice—because, for example, they have been bringing up their family or caring for sick or elderly relatives. Such practitioners face a potentially no-win situation.

On the one hand, the general council and the education committee might not have been able to find sufficient information about the qualification to decide whether it should be recognised. On the other, the practitioner might have no means of being able to satisfy the practice criteria for registration. Such practitioners will therefore be unable to get on the register unless they obtain another recognised qualification, although they may be perfectly competent. Although that group is expected to comprise only a small number of individuals, the Bill now extends the provisions of conditional registration so as not to exclude them.

Consequently, practitioners who are unable to satisfy the practice criteria for either full or conditional registration will still be eligible for conditional registration if they hold a qualification for osteopathy that has not been refused recognition, although it is not a recognised qualification. Practitioners who qualify for registration on those grounds will be subject to the same conditions of further training and acquiring the additional experience which I described earlier.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): I wonder whether my hon. Friend could clarify one point. Is it intended that osteopaths will be required to carry professional indemnity cover during the preliminary period?

Mr. Moss: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point, which I shall come to later in my speech. It is an important part of the Bill, and I will explain its ramifications later.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): On such an important Bill, which affects the welfare of millions of our fellow citizens who suffer from back pain, is my hon. Friend aware that there are no less than 16 hon. Members present in the House but only two Opposition Members, although it is Friday? Does that not show that Conservative Members have a much greater interest than Labour Members in such an important Bill?

Mr. Moss: I am not sure whether that comment means that Conservative Members have a greater interest in such matters, or that they suffer more from back pain.

I have referred several times to recognised qualifications. I am aware that feelings of uncertainty exist in certain quarters about how that aspect of the scheme will operate. It may help if I begin with the European dimension. European Community qualifications will automatically be recognised by virtue of enforceable Community rights or obligations.

The recognition of other qualifications will depend on whether the General Osteopathic Council, in consultation with its education committee, considers that such qualifications meet the standards of education, training and proficiency specified by the general council for the safe and competent practise of osteopathy. To ensure that such decisions will be impartial, no qualification will be afforded recognition until the general council has sought and secured the consent of the Privy Council.

While I am on the subject of professional education, I should mention that, although it will be the responsibility of the education committee to satisfy itself that those schools whose qualifications have been recognised continue to meet the required standards of proficiency, it will not be for the committee or the General Osteopathic Council to prescribe how the curriculum is taught.

Diversity of approach stimulates innovation. In medical schools, considerable differences in emphasis exist for specific elements of the curriculum and the way in which they are taught. However, they all produce safe and competent doctors. Therefore, it is essential that a similar diversity be allowed to flourish under the osteopaths statutory scheme.

The newest category of registration is provisional registration. As I have already mentioned, care must be taken not to confuse provisional registration as provided in the Bill with the concept of provisional registration set out in the working party's report and Lord Walton's Bill in the last session.

An initial year of supervised practise is rapidly becoming the norm in a growing number of professional groups. It offers practitioners the advantages of being able to widen gradually their field of experience, especially in the running of a practice, and have the support and advice of more experienced colleagues readily available.

I appreciate that provisional registration does not exist in the profession's current system of voluntary registration. However, it may be one which the profession would wish to adopt in time. One of the disadvantages of a statutory scheme is that, once it is set in place, it can subsequently prove to be difficult to amend. Therefore, I have tried to provide now for the future.

The provision in the Bill is an enabling one. It will give the general council the necessary scope to introduce a system of provisional registration at a later date if it so chooses and after it has consulted the profession and provided Parliament with an opportunity to scrutinise its proposals.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Can my hon. Friend expand his arguments and explain why he decided not to incorporate in his Bill the requirement of a provisional registration state as opposed to leaving the option open for the future if the council chooses to implement it?

Mr. Moss: Initially, we felt that the Bill incorporated a great number of different clauses which advanced the progress and tightness of the regulations. It was important to get the basics on the statute book, introduce conditional registration, which is a new idea, and make provision to enable the profession to introduce the provisional category at a later date if it so chooses. It is questionable whether the profession can accommodate the changes in one go during the early period—certainly the transitional period. It is much more sensible to get the basics in place and then allow the profession to move in a direction which it so chooses at its own pace.

Provisional registration will apply for the initial year of registration. During that time, osteopaths will be permitted to practise only under the supervision of a fully registered osteopath. For many practitioners, that will coincide with their first postgraduate year. However, the provisions in the Bill are sufficiently broad to include practitioners who are returning to the profession after an absence of some years—because, for example, they have been bringing up a family—and those who are applying for registration for the first time. Again, that is recognised as good practice among many professions and is a matter which the general council may wish to consider if and when it ever decided to go down this road.

Before leaving the subject of registration, I should like briefly to mention three other matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) raised a point about professional indemnity insurance. That was considered by the working party to be of such key importance in securing better protection for patients that it recommended that such insurance should be held as a condition of registration. Unfortunately, making that a statutory requirement could distort the otherwise free workings of the insurance market, potentially to the detriment of both insurers and osteopaths.

In order to square that circle, the Bill would empower the General Osteopathic Council through its rules of registration to require professional indemnity insurance to be held by practising osteopaths. The general council would also have the power to check that a practitioner had renewed his cover at the appropriate time and, most importantly, to initiate disciplinary proceedings in cases where he had not.

Linking the need to hold insurance with the right to practise would give osteopaths who have retired or are taking time out to bring up a family the possibility of maintaining their registration without having to take out what would otherwise be unnecessary insurance cover.

The second matter is post-registration training. The working party recommended that a practitioner's continued registration should be made subject to him or her satisfactorily completing post-graduate training or refresher courses. In that way, members of the public could be assured that practitioners were keeping up to date with the latest techniques and developments in their field. That is one of the many areas in which the working party's recommendations broke new ground in the realm of professional self-regulation.

However, the working party also recognised that that recommendation could not be introduced immediately, because the profession's training and education resources would need to be devoted to existing practitioners who will hold conditional registration during the first few years of the scheme.

In order to avoid the need to make a specific amendment to the Act at a later date, clause 16 of the Bill will permit the General Osteopathic Council to introduce a scheme of post-registration training in the future if the profession so wishes. However, once again, the general council would first be required to consult the profession and, in this case, any other parties that it might think appropriate, such as other groups of health care professionals. The council would also have to obtain the consent of the Privy Council and give Parliament an opportunity to scrutinise the detail of its proposals before it could introduce such a scheme.

The third postscript on registration involves fraudulent registration. The Bill contains a provision similar to section 39(1) of the Medical Act 1983 to enable the general council to erase from the register the name of a practitioner who obtained registration by fraudulent means. However, the register would have in addition to that power, the power to impose an immediate suspension of a practitioner's registration while the allegation was being investigated, if he was satisfied that such action was necessary for the protection of members of the public.

I hope that the House will agree that all the provisions to which I have referred would form a fair and just system of registration and would provide the cornerstone of a statutory scheme. They seek to bring as many bona fide practitioners of osteopathy as possible within its scope. That is not only of key importance to practitioners but would benefit the public, as it is far better to have all the practitioners of a profession governed by a single statutory body capable of enforcing appropriate standards of practice.

The other essential component of the regulatory scheme is a mechanism to ensure that high standards of professional conduct and competence are maintained and that members of the public are not put at risk by practitioners who are unfit to practise for reasons of ill health. That would be provided by the General Osteopathic Council's investigating, professional conduct and health committees. Broadly speaking, those comittees would perform the same function as their counterparts in other schemes. Allegations would initially be considered by the investigating committee. They would then be referred, as appropriate, to the professional conduct or health committee for further investigation and action. However, I should like to highlight some important differences in the powers that the committees would be able to exercise—differences which illustrate yet again where the osteopaths scheme would break new ground.

For the first time under any statutory scheme governing the health professions, professional incompetence would be specifically identified as a trigger point for disciplinary investigation. I know that other professional groups—in particular the medical profession—are considering the introduction of a similar concept for its members. Their solutions may be different, but the osteopaths can take justifiable pride in being the first health care profession to make the concept an integral part of its statutory scheme.

Another matter on which the osteopaths scheme scores a first is the breadth of the powers of the professional conduct and health committees to take immediate action to suspend an osteopath's registration where they considered such action to be necessary for the protection of members of the public. The power proposed for the investigating committees—the ability to impose an immediate suspension of up to two months—would be similar to that exercised, for example, by the General Medical Council's equivalent committee.

However, for the first time, the professional conduct and health committees would be able to impose their own suspension where they considered such action to be necessary to protect members of the public and to do so before they investigated the allegation. Although likely to be exercised only rarely, the power might be used, for example, where the allegation made against an osteopath was also the subject of a series criminal investigation. In such a case, the professional conduct committee might choose to defer its proceedings until after the criminal proceedings had been dealth with. In a similar way, the health committee might decide that an allegation about an osteopath's health was such that he or she posed an obvious and definite risk to his or her patients.

In making provisions for those powers, the Bill also ensures that the practitioner's rights are protected. For example, before a suspension order could be imposed, a practitioner would first have to be given an opportunity to appear before the relevant committee to state why he or she considered such action to be unnecessary. The pratitioner would be entitled to be legally represented at such a hearing and would have an additional right of appeal to the courts.

Like their counterparts in other statutory schemes, the professional conduct and health committees would be able to suspend an osteopath's registration or impose conditions on his or her right to practise if they determined that the allegation against him or her was proven. The professional conduct committee would in addition be able to admonish the osteopath or order his name to be erased from the register.

Another first for the osteopaths scheme is the proposal to give the professional conduct committee the explicit power to impose conditions on an osteopath's right to practise following a period of erasure. As the Bill reinforces the powers of fitness-to-practise committees in those ways, the public will be able to exercise the utmost confidence in the statutory scheme and be assured that it affords them the highest level of protection of any of today's regulatory schemes.

I have mentioned briefly that the Bill makes provision to safeguard the human rights of osteopaths. That is of key importance. I can assure the House and the profession that great care has been taken to ensure that the panoply of appeal provisions within the Bill are founded firmly on the principles of natural justice and reflect European law on human rights. In that way, members of the profession can likewise be fully confident that the statutory scheme would rigorously protect their interests and be one in which they can take justifiable pride.

I mentioned that, in keeping with other statutory schemes, the work of the General Osteopathic Council and its four statutory committees would be overseen by the Privy Council. In the unlikely event that the council failed to perform its functions under the Act, the Privy Council would have the power to direct it to perform any of its functions that the Privy Council considered that it had failed to fulfil. As a final resort, the Privy Council would be able to step in and take over the functions of the council and do anything that it could have done under the Act.

Let me end where I began. Due to the sterling work of the working party on osteopathy, the profession has a well thought out and carefully structured scheme that reflects the most up-to-date thinking on professional self-regulation. I hope that the House and the profession will agree that the proposals will not only provide the means to enable the profession to control its destiny and set its future direction but secure better patient protection, safeguard the interests of the public and provide a model for other statutory self-regulatory schemes for the 1990s and beyond.

10.19 am

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): I must declare an interest as I am one of two parliamentary advisers to the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on introducing the Bill. Although I do not suffer from back pain—having voted for the Maastricht measures so far—I suspect that many of our colleagues may well need the services of professions that specialise in the manipulative therapies, something of which the Conservative Front Bench is only too well aware.

The Chartered Society of Physiotherapy is supportive of the moves by its sister profession to introduce regulation. There are estimated to be about 2,000 osteopaths, the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy has 24,000 members and there are about 700 chiropractors, which demonstrates that at least three professions are intimately involved with such work.

Physiotherapists work in hospitals and in private practice and about a third of their number are actively involved with the manipulation of the back and the neck. Among physiotherapists there is a view that it would have been better for the three professions to come together for regulation rather than moving separately, but that does not mean that the Bill is not welcome.

There is a substantial overlap between osteopaths, chiropractors and physiotherapists, and the latter do everything that osteopaths can do and considerably more.

Physiotherapists are regulated by the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act 1960, which is now rather out of date. It was introduced when physiotherapists principally worked in hospitals and doctors prescribed their work for them. Their regulatory framework is therefore seriously outmoded and needs to be updated. For that reason, I believe that the King's Fund rejected using the 1960 Act for the regulation of osteopaths and that there is now a case for the urgent revision of that Act.

The Bill will introduce modern, regulatory structures for osteopaths and we should like those provisions to be extended to physiotherapists as soon as possible. We congratulate the osteopaths on achieving the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East said, it will be the first profession to have that modern structure, which is very welcome.

There is concern that the protection in clause 29 of the title osteopath might lead to problems for other professions, including medical practitioners and physiotherapists, as it might prevent such professions from claiming to use osteopathic techniques. My hon. Friend may wish to return to that subject in Committee so that there may be a clear understanding that other professions are already using such techniques and that they should not be prevented from making such a claim although they are not osteopaths. A comment on that subject from my hon. Friend the Minister would also be welcome.

Title protection is to be given to osteopaths, but the title of physiotherapist is not protected and anyone can practise as such or claim to be a physiotherapist. Only the terms "state registered physiotherapist" or "chartered physiotherapist" are protected by the 1960 Act, so the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy looks at the Bill with some envy and would like equal protection to be given to the short titles of all the professions involved. If that could be achieved it would be in the public interest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East mentioned the disciplinary procedures in the Bill, which are very welcome. Physiotherapists feel that they do not have sufficient powers to discipline their own profession or, for example, to investigate the claims of overseas practitioners in physiotherapy. Again, he is setting out procedures that will be helpful to the profession and we should like that to be reflected in the Minister's remarks.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East and the working party of osteopaths for their work. I urge all the professions practising such techniques to get together so that we can set down new regulations for them all as soon as possible, as that will be in the public interest.

Ms. Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I extend my support and that of my party to the Bill, which is a most welcome response to the King's Fund report on osteopathy and the subsequent Bill that was introduced by Lord Walton in another place in December 1991. I also thank the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) for his work thus far on the Bill. I hope that he steers it through the House to a successful conclusion.

Osteopathy came to Britain at the turn of the century and the first attempt to put it on a statutory footing was in 1931. Just over 60 years later it looks as if we shall at last be successful—another fine example of the British Parliament responding rapidly to new ideas and changing circumstances.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I thank the hon. Lady for her comments on the Bill, and must add to her reflections about its popularity. A MORI poll has shown that osteopathy is the most popular complementary medicine, and 63 per cent. of those polled were very satisifed and only 9 per cent. dissatisfied.

Ms. Lynne: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. Osteopaths responded to Parliament's inaction by establishing registering bodies and it is to their credit that the profession is among the leading advocates of statutory regulation.

The Bill is of particular importance, as it represents the first statutory recognition of the role of complementary medicine in the health of the nation. I hope and expect it to become a model for future Bills.

It is well known that the Chiropractic Advancement Association is hoping for official regulation soon after the Bill is enacted. Initially, it was thought that chiropractors could be included in the Bill introduced in December 1991. The Government have given some indications that they might soon be recognised, but I am a little concerned about the statement by Baroness Hooper, in a Lords debate on complementary medicine in May 1990, that an appropriate level of maturity is required on the part of the relevant professions before legislation would be considered. I should have thought that when professions are immature they can do the most harm and that that is when they need the most regulation. While I recognise the practical difficulties of proceeding along the path of regulation too soon, I hope that the Government will take a more active role to bring the various complementary therapies into a statutory framework.

The key points in the Bill are those dealing with the registration and education of osteopaths. Both aspects of the Bill are greatly to be welcomed. I am particularly pleased about the proposal that the General Osteopathic Council may require osteopaths to have further training after registration.

While it is clear that only accredited qualifications will be acceptable, and that educational establishments will have independent assessors, the Bill does not state that such establishments will be accredited. That would seem to be a logical extension of the existing proposals and it might clear up any confusion for anyone wishing to train as an osteopath.

In addition to my general comments, I have some specific remarks to make on the Bill. The Bill contains no definition of osteopathy. Only after detailed consultation was it decided that there were sufficient differences between osteopathy and chiropractic for them not to be covered by the same Bill. A definition is important because, without it, I cannot see how an effective code of practice can be established.

I should like the general council that the Bill will establish to ensure that, in drawing up the code of practice, there are the widest possible consultations with users of the service and their representatives. Once produced, the code of practice should be made easily available to members of the public, preferably free or via public libraries, but, if necessary, at a reasonable cost as stated in the Bill. The Bill does not say whether a "reasonable" cost is reasonable in the view of the council or the user.

I naturally agree with the establishment of a register of osteopaths, but, as in the case of the code of practice, the register should be easily available for inspection. The Bill allows for that to happen, but does not say where the register will be available, although I assume that it may be at the general council's offices. Perhaps consideration should be given to making it available at major libraries. I should also like to see a provision in the Bill or a declaration from the general council stating that osteopaths must display their registration at their place of work and clearly indicate their category of registration.

There should also be further protection for prospective patients. Last year in the United States, for instance, guidelines for quality assurance and practice were laid down. The document that was produced ran to some 200 pages. In particular, it was recommended that practitioners provide a written diagnosis for the patients and tell them what to do if the treatment does not work in two weeks and when to ask for a second opinion. In addition, particular emphasis should be placed on making it clear to patients how a complaint should be made.

With so many functions proposed in the Bill, I am concerned that the general council may not have enough resources to carry them all out effectively. I presume that the council is expected to be self-financing and I am therefore a little worried that it may have difficulties performing all its tasks. Experience in America, where legislation has been in place for more than 20 years, is that practitioners do not have the time or training to administer such a body effectively. I hope that that question will be dealt with in this country.

Could some light be shed on whether cranial osteopathy will be covered by the Bill? An article in The Guardian on 12 January says that there is some debate among osteopaths themselves about its value.

Despite the points that I have raised, the Bill is a major step forward and points the way for many complementary therapies. I urge all hon. Members to support it.

10.31 am

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I must declare an interest as a patron of the National Back Pain Association, the headquarters of which is in Teddington in my constituency. I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on this excellent Bill. I wish it every success and I hope that it will go on to the statute book without delay. However, my hon. Friend's speech dealt largely with internal, structural and technical matters to do with the osteopathy profession. It was almost as if he had received a large amount of briefing from that profession. It is important for the House to see the wood as well as the trees with which he dealt so extensively. I know that he will not mind if I say that much of what he said was on Committee points.

The whole purpose of osteopathy is to relieve back pain in people. Osteopaths are not an end in themselves but a means to an end. Back pain is a scourge and a pestilence which afflicts millions of our fellow citizens, including the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), and myself.

Lady Olga Maitland: May I add to my hon. Friend's comments the fact that in 1979, 11·5 million working days were lost through back pain? That was a great loss to the country and cost our social security system enormous sums.

Mr. Jessel: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I believe that the figure is even greater. The figure that I have seen is 230,000 people per working day. Multiplied by the number of working days, that comes to considerably more than 11·5 million. There is doubtless a substantial loss to the country in terms of days off work, and I believe that, proportionately, women are affected even more than men.

A huge amount of pain and discomfort is caused, but because the causes are complicated and it is not a "glamour" welfare cause such as a disease affecting children, heart attacks or cancer, which cause death—[Interruption.] It is a little trying for me to have my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East carrying on a conversation just four yards away from me.

Because back pain affects such a large number of people and is not a "glamour" welfare cause afflicting children or resulting in death, it is difficult to get the body politic or the public generally to pay as much attention to it as it deserves, despite the large number of people whom it affects. That is why the debate on the Bill is welcome, even if it is somewhat narrow. I happen to go to a chiropractor and I think that they are at least as good as osteopaths, if not better. I am sorry that they could not be included in the Bill, but I hope that there will be as little delay as possible before a Bill is introduced on chiropractic.

The Government's White Paper, "The Health of the Nation", published last year, singled out five key areas for priority action: coronary heart disease and strokes; cancer; mental illness; AIDS; and accidents. However, the document also referred to five other candidates with a strong claim to key area status next: rehabilitation; the health of elderly people; asthma; drug misuse; and back pain. The inclusion of back pain in that list followed a meeting between Mr. Stanley Grundy CBE, founder of the National Back Pain Association, his director Dr. Mervyn Bryn Jones, Lord Joseph and myself with my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), the Secretary of State for Health in the last Parliament. The meeting was to stress the great importance of back pain.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will be kind enough to explain the position of that second grouping of five priority areas, and say what he thinks the Government can do to focus attention on it and to make progress as fast as possible in dealing with the scourge of back pain.

My hon. Friend the Minister has shown a tremendous interest in the problem of back pain, having attended and addressed the association's conference in central London last November. He has also seen Mr. Grundy several times, and I understand that my hon. Friend hopes, within his busy programme, to find time to visit the association's headquarters before long.

The association promotes research, whether by osteopaths, doctors, or chiropractors; it establishes branches throughout the country to promote interest in back pain, to provide means by which people can exercise, and to spread information; and it publishes educational material—such as a most useful recent manual for nurses on the correct way to lift patients. The national health service suffers a considerable loss of nurses' time when they hurt their backs lifting patients. I understand that 5,000 copies of that manual have already been sold.

Can my hon. Friend the Minister make it clear that general practitioners who are health service budget holders may use their budgets to refer patients both to osteopaths and to chiropractors? Will he also make clear the position in respect of value added tax on fees paid privately, whether under insurance policies or otherwise, both to osteopaths and to chiropractors? For many years the Department of Health has discussed that question with the Treasury, which decides in the light of legislation whether VAT should be attached to such fees. The Treasury has sought advice from the Department as to what is and is not deemed medical, because that affects whether or not VAT is applied. The Department has in turn referred the matter to a somewhat moribund body called the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine. The medical professions as well as the supplementary professions are represented on that council, and for years that body has put a stop on exempting osteopathy and chiropractic from VAT.

Mr. Moss: My hon. Friend has introduced a most important point. I wonder if he realises that osteopaths are obliged to charge VAT on their bills to patients while physiotherapists are not?

Mr. Jessel: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's clarification. It is nonsensical that physiotherapists approved by that council do not have to charge VAT while osteopaths and chiropractors, who are not so approved, must do so. I hope that the Department will indicate that if the Bill becomes law it will draw that matter to the attention of the Treasury so that it can be reviewed without delay.

If the Bill is passed and osteopaths become, in the eyes of the law, members of a profession, I hope that it will not go to their heads. In Britain, professionalism has an up side and a down side. The up side is that members of any profession—barristers, solicitors, accountants, doctors or dentists—endeavour to uphold standards. The down side is that they become somewhat introverted, in that they care about one another's good opinion rather than that of the public. Barristers care mainly about the good opinion of other barristers, doctors about the good opinion of other doctors, and so on. They tend to assume that qualification, which is essential in any profession, is so all-important that nothing else much matters. It is thought that a person who is qualified must be good and one who is not qualified must be no good at all.

Professional qualification is a necessary condition, but it is not a sufficient condition for professional competence. It remains vital for any professional, if he or she is to be good at his or her work, to possess flair, zest, and insight, among other gifts. I hope that there will not be so much harping on professional qualifications to the extent that those other qualities are played down. That would not be in the interests of the public. I hope that osteopaths will regard their professional status as a means of improvement and not take it to mean that everything has now been done. It is only a step.

10.45 am

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on his good fortune in the ballot and on his choice of Bill. I was grateful for his invitation to be a sponsor, because, as he knows, I am particularly interested in the greater recognition of another so-called complementary profession—chiropractic. From my personal experience and that of many of my constituents and others, I am as fully convinced of the benefits of chiropractic as I am of osteopathy. I am privileged to have the Anglo-European College of Chiropractic in my constituency, which I hope right hon. and hon. Members will visit.

Both osteopathy and chiropractic were founded in the belief that many everyday disorders are caused by spinal defects impeding the work of our immune system. I welcome the Bill not only for the undoubted benefits that it will bring to patients in the proper regulation, registration and, above all, recognition of osteopaths but because it will pave the way for a similar Bill for chiropractors, which the King's Fund working party will also draft—based on what we hope will be the successful outcome of this Bill. I hope that it will be taken on board by one of my ballot-lucky right hon. or hon. Friends in the next Session.

I take this opportunity to express my deep regret that the complementary professions have been denied recognition for so long because of the failure of successive Governments to pass appropriate legislation on their behalf. Instead, each of those professions is being advised to pursue its own Bill, such as that before us. That will take years, which I find totally unacceptable. I am certain that any Government initiative to legislate for other uncontroversial complementary professions, given their ever-growing use and appreciation by patients—who find them successful where NHS-prescribed conventional surgery or drugs have failed—would be widely welcomed. Unfortunately, as my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) implied, the so-called orthodox professions, as represented on the Medical Research Council and the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine, continue to withhold their sanction and support —thus sabotaging proper recognition of those who are properly qualified, to the detriment of patients.

In so doing, they are allowing unqualified cowboys and unscrupulous quacks to do untold damage to those members of the public who use them, and who find it extremely difficult to obtain legal redress. It is time to end that closed shop in the medical profession, which inhibits such competition.

I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will stop sitting on the fence of Government neutrality towards the complementary professions. He could do that by renewing his Department's grant to the Research Council for Complementary Medicine; its recent termination is incomprehensible, given the enormous sums that are rightly spent on orthodox medical research and the amounts spent by other European Governments on research into complementary medicines. Moreover, the termination of the grant is contrary to the recommendations made some years ago by the Department's own working group on back pain.

My hon. Friend the Minister could also announce that the Government now intend to extend the Professions Supplementary to Medicines Act 1960 to include complementary medicines, and he could invite the research council to make appropriate recommendations to him. As my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham pointed out, after 33 years there is now an overwhelming case for a review of the Act. Alternatively, my hon. Friend the Minister could announce a Government inquiry into the most popular complementary medicines, to subject them to scientific validation with the ultimate aim of integrating orthodox and complementary medicines. Such integration has already taken place in the Netherlands.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East has made an outstanding case for the benefits to patients that would undoubtedly result from the legislation. The statutory recognition of osteopaths would encourage more patients to use their services—especially now that fund-holding GPs can pay for them out of their own budgets: I commend the action taken last year by the Minister's predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell), to allow them to do so. The Bill will, I hope, encourage health authorities, hospital staff and doctors to work more closely with the osteopathic profession. As osteopathy, chiropractic and other such therapies do not require such expensive equipment as national health service treatment, and also do not require increasingly expensive drugs, their statutory recognition would result in enormous savings in the health service, despite patients having to bear the cost of treatment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham rightly enjoined the Minister to urge our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider whether the cost of alternative treatment should be exempt from VAT.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): My hon. Friend and I have travelled down the path of complementary medicine for many years. Does he agree that the new arrangements for fund holders could be used to enable patients to receive the complementary and alternative treatment that they want through their local GPs? I believe that that is already happening to some extent. Appropriate arrangements could be set up with complementary and alternative practitioners.

Mr. Atkinson: That is still a back-door method. My hon. Friend and I have been working for years to try to bring about proper recognition of complementary medicine: I pay tribute to the work that has been done to enable Bills such as this—and, we hope, subsequent Bills —to establish such recognition. He was engaged in that work long before he became a Member of Parliament.

I hope that the Bill will also encourage companies to become more aware of the opportunities for them to refer employees to osteopaths or chiropractors. Widespread absenteeism resulting from back pain is costing the national economy an enormous amount. I am sure that if the Bill is passed, more and more operators of private health insurance schemes will be encouraged to reimburse subscribers for the cost of osteopathic treatment. I also believe that increasing use of osteopathy and other complementary treatments will lead to greater accuracy in the diagnosis of disorders that still baffle the NHS, such as allergies and ME.

I hope that the Bill will be given an unimpeded passage through both Houses. Let me again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East—and Lord Walton on his pioneering work in introducing a similar Bill last year in the other place. I also pay tribute to the work of the King's Fund.

I hope that a similar Bill to deal with chiropractic will follow this one—or that, better still, the Government will present a Bill to give proper statutory recognition to all the complementary medical professions, for which an increasing number of our constituents are voting with their feet.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): There is no doubt in my mind that, indirectly, I owe my seat in the House to the work of chiropractors and osteopaths. Fifteen years ago, I suffered an accident and broke three vertebrae in my back. Having lain in bed for several months, I was put back together by such practitioners, and I therefore owe them a particular personal debt.

I note with interest that other hon. Members—for instance, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and my hon. Friends the Members for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn)—suffer from back problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton mentioned the impact of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill: having looked at next week's business, I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House may need the services of osteopaths and chiropractors, but not every Conservative Member may agree with that.

Apart from the treatment that I received at the time of my accident, the treatment that I have received in subsequent years has been very important. My message to the public is that the disciplines of osteopathy and chiropractic can be enormously beneficial.

I also speak as treasurer of the all-party parliamentary group for alternative and complementary medicine. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who is sitting beside me on the Back Benches——

Mr. Cash: For ever.

Mr. Tredinnick: I had better not comment on that.

However, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's work on alternative medicine, and to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson). I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford and I were the only two Members of Parliament who attended the launch of the King's Fund by the Prince of Wales in December 1991. We were also involved in the attempt to take Lord Walton's Bill through the House of Commons; it fell at the last general election.

I welcome the Bill particularly because I think that it will shake out the tiny minority of charlatans in the profession. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East referred to unqualified quacks, and there are certainly a few unscrupulous people around. The Bill will also provide an understandable framework, and will encourage the use of osteopathy to relieve the pain described by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham. I understand that he had an accident that hurt him quite badly, and he has probably suffered considerable pain over the past two weeks.

The Bill will also give confidence to people who were wondering how to solve their back problems. Only yesterday, I spoke to a senior Canadian Member of Parliament who suffers from muscular and skeletal pain. I asked him why he did not see an osteopath or chiropractor. He said, "I am not sure about these people; they are not regulated."

That is the nub of the problem: if people were made confident by regulation, more of them would take advantage of such treatment. We have already heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) about the large number of people who are attracted to osteopathy, and I believe that, with regulation, many more will follow.

In my experience, GPs have no great understanding of back problems unless they are specialists. A close supporter of mine in the general election campaign suddenly developed great back pain. She was advised to rest for two weeks, which was not possible during the campaign. She went to a osteopath who was a chiropractor, and within a day some relief had been given and she was back on the road.

Just after Christmas, my five-year-old daughter was acting out the part of a children's play with a big cushion on her head when she suddenly developed acute pain. She was checked by a doctor who, fortunately, found nothing serious. The doctor said, "The problem will go away with time; children at this age are very resilient." I took her to an osteopath in Leinster square who was open on the Saturday after the new year, and two osteopaths kindly treated her. She came away an hour later and has not mentioned that back pain again. Those are practical demonstrations of how people can benefit from such treatment.

Over the years, there has been a marked shift of opinion towards alternative and complementary medicine and osteopathy. In its 1986 report, the British Medical Association dismissed alternative medicine as a passing fashion. A number of surveys showed otherwise, and gradually medical opinion has shifted ground. For example, a 1986 Which? survey suggested that osteopathy was the most widely used complementary therapy, and 82 per cent. of patients interviewed claimed to have been cured or improved by the treatment.

Another Which? survey last November reported that each year one in four readers visited an alternative practitioner, which includes osteopathy—twice as many as the 1986 survey—and were highly satisfied. Four out of five users claim to have been improved or cured by alternative treatments; three out of four would use this form of treatment again.

Those findings confirm the results of the 1989 MORI survey, which revealed that 93 per cent. of users were satisfied with chiropractic treatment and 83 per cent. of users were satisfied with osteopathy. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam dropped 20 per cent. when she gave her figure. The figure that I have is 83 per cent., not 63 per cent. Some 80 per cent. were satisfied with homoeopathic treatment. The MORI survey showed that homoeopathy, osteopathy and acupuncture were the most widely used alternative medicines.

Mr. George Kynoch (Kincardine and Deeside): My hon. Friend has used the term "alternative medicine" several times. Does he intend to use the term "complementary medicine"? Many of the forms of treatment that he has mentioned are complementary rather than alternative.

Mr. Tredinnick: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. I have used the term "alternative medicine" as the shortened version of "alternative and complementary medicine". He will recall that I referred to the fact that I am treasurer of the all-party group for alternative and complementary medicine. There is a debate about what is alternative and what is complementary, but I certainly speak for both.

Last November's Which? survey quoted a study in which four out of five medical students said that they would like some form of alternative training incorporated into their course.

I argue that the Bill is not the end of a road but very much the beginning of a new relationship between alternative and complementary medicine, including osteopathy, and the health service. I am delighted to see my old and hon. Friend the Under-Secretary in his place on the Front Bench. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not too old."] I think that I can count him as an old friend; we have known each other for 25 years.

I firmly believe that the Bill is the start of a new relationship between alternative and complementary medicine and the health service. With the greater recognition and regulation that the Bill will give, it should be possible to achieve greater integration of the work of osteopaths and other alternative practitioners within the health service.

The previous Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell), made a significant contribution towards achieving that integration when he ruled in the last Parliament that GP fund holders could employ alternative practitioners, which of course includes osteopaths, if they took clinical responsibility. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will see fit to go further and make it possible for other general practitioners to use the services of alternative and complementary practitioners. I believe that that is very important. I tell my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, in the presence of its chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, that the all-party parliamentary group aims to achieve full integration of most of the various alternative disciplines in the health service.

The House will consider other Bills in the future. At one stage, chiropractors hoped that their work would be included in the Bill. The different schools of chiropractic, such as the McTimoney school and others, have taken tremendous strides towards bringing their disciplines together in an understandable framework.

Mr. David Atkinson indicated assent.

Mr. Tredinnick: My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East nods in assent.

They have put their house in order, as requested by the Department, and I hope that the next Bill will be for chiropractors.

Other disciplines such as acupuncture may benefit from such regulation. My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton referred to physiotherapy, which is important. In addition, there are disciplines such as aromatherapy. I have the largest factory of aromatherapy and essential oils and the largest practice in the world in my constituency. I opened its new premises yesterday. It used to work out of an attic in a disused hosiery factory, but it now has a splendid new building. It is training not only lay practitioners who express an interest but is teaching medical practitioners; nurses are being taught these skills. The work of aromatherapy is relevant to osteopathy because before treatment an osteopath can use oils such as roman chamomile, juniper berry, lavender and sweet marjoram to relax and warm up muscles.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Ooh, nice!

Mr. Tredinnick: I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) might find this amusing, but it is not amusing to someone suffering from pain.

My hon. Friend makes the point well: any hon. Member who had talked about osteopathy or chiropractory in the House 10 years ago would have been laughed at. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton, as I strike him with a rubber mallet, that these disciplines, which may seem a little weird to the majority, will eventually become mainstream.

Some say that by iridology, the study of the colours of eyes and shape of pupils, one can diagnose different ailments that affect the body. I venture to suggest that that and phrenology, the study of the shape and condition of the head, will eventually come within the scope of the health service.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will find a tremendous opportunity to save costs if he pursues this route, because it has been found that alternative practitioners who are medically qualified issue far fewer prescriptions. Furthermore, homoeopathic prescriptions are less expensive, and homoeopathic preparations are increasingly available in the huge number of homoeopathic shops that are bursting into bloom all over the country as a result of public demand. This move is market-led—I say that although I do not want to upset the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), whom I have in the past seen stand on a bench to make a point.

The serious point to all this is that cost savings can be made, much happiness can be given, and many problems can be solved by alternative and complementary medicine, including osteopathy. I appeal to the House to take the alternative and complementary medicine much more seriously than it has been taken. I welcome the Bill, which is a major step forward. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss), and look forward to the successful passage of the Bill through all its stages.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) not only on promoting the Bill but on the way in which he has tackled the subject. Over the past nearly 20 years, I have been the legal adviser in relation to complementary and alternative medicine. I started in the days when, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) said, one could not talk about it easily because people either did not know about it or thought that it was based on quackery, which it was not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) played an important part in the beginnings of the objective analysis of complementary medicine. He served on the Committee—which took evidence—that examined a private Bill, in which I also happened to be involved, back in about 1975. That Bill was aimed at driving acupuncturists out of business and was strongly attacked. My hon. Friend listened to the cross-examination of witnesses from both the medical profession and acupuncturists. The Committee unanimously concluded that the acupuncturists had a good case. I give that as an example of the way in which Parliament has helped to break down the barriers and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and to other distinguished Members who have joined me in the all-party group on complementary and alternative medicine, of which I have the honour to be joint chairman with the right hon. Earl Baldwin of Bewdley. I should declare an interest in that I give continuing legal advice on these matters.

Let me also pay tribute to Simon Fielding, who is here in the House under the Gallery. I have known him for a long time and those who know about the Bill and the work that he has put into ensuring that osteopathy should be——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he has been here a long time and should be aware that he is not supposed to refer to people in the Gallery.

Mr. Cash: I have made my point, but I withdraw the reference on that basis.

I congratulate the Department on the way in which it has moved in relation to complementary and alternative medicine. The atmosphere has changed greatly and much diligent and effective thinking has been given to those matters. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister will be giving the Bill the additional support that it will require to ensure that it gets on to the statute book.

I have no intention or desire to go through all the points that have been made by my hon. Friends the Members for Cambridgeshire, North-East, for Bosworth, for Bournemouth, East, and for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). However, I wish to get one or two points on the record because there has been a significant change in the policy on osteopathy over the past 20 years. Back in the mid-1970s, the BMA handbook said that doctors should have nothing to do with osteopaths because osteopathy was not a science. This was put in extremely strong language. The General Medical Council took a rather different view. The Bill is a testament to the work of osteopaths and demonstrates how attitudes in the medical profession have changed substantially in the past 20 years.

The BMA set up an inquiry seven years ago in which there was a general attack on complementary and alternative medicine. I tabled an early-day motion, which about 150 Members of Parliament supported, and we saw off that attack pretty well. I do not wish to cast aspersions on the medical peofession in this context because there has been a learning curve. There was bias, but there has been a significant change in the attitude of doctors towards osteopathy and other complementary therapies.

I intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East to speak about general practitioner fund-holding arrangements to which I strongly believe that serious attention should be given. We had an interesting meeting the other day with Baroness Cumberlege, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, in which some of those ideas were developed. We have already heard questions about whether grants could or should be made. The withdrawal of grant aid was not a sensible move, and I strongly opposed it. However, through the aegis of the Medical Research Council, further funds could and should be made available.

Osteopathy, along with chiropractic, acupuncture and herbal remedies, has to be taken seriously. Therefore, we must give those sectors a reasonable amount of help because they have nothing to fall back on. It is not as though they have the large funds of the Medical Research Council behind them. Those who know just how large those funds are will agree that reasonable help should be given, and my urgent plea is that it should be, because that would be in the interests of everybody, including the medical profession. My hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) is a doctor.

Mr. Kynoch: No.

Mr. Cash: I am sorry. I thought that my hon. Friend was a doctor.

Mr. Kynoch: I should declare my interest. My wife is a doctor. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that the medical profession has accepted osteopathy because it is seen as a complementary rather than, as it was portrayed years ago, an alternative medicine. Is not that an important point?

Mr. Cash: I agree. It is very important to stress that aspect, because there is a mutuality. Each can learn from the other and there is a learning curve all round. The Bill represents the culmination of a great deal of hard work on that learning curve.

Important questions arise in relation to other member states of the European Community and their approach to these issues. If we pass an Act of Parliament, we should bear in mind that if there were an extension of competence in the Community to embrace health generally and that fell within the single market—as the herbal remedy question does at the moment—an application of article 100a through a directive could, in theory, override the provisions of the Bill.

I leave that point on the table for consideration. We must bear in mind the fact that we can work together in the European Community with other member states as we want to and not be disadvantaged, as might be the case if a regulation or directive of the type that I have described were to emerge. I exhort my hon. Friend the Minister, as he has a good nose for such things, to keep a watchful eye on that aspect of complementary and alternative medicine in its application to the United Kingdom.

I trust and believe that self-regulation in osteopathy is about to become a reality. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East, all hon. Members involved in the exercise and everyone in the complementary field who has helped to push the Bill along deserve credit for what they have achieved.

We should remember what happened to George III around 1800 and the way that he was treated. By the 1840s and 1850s, things had begun to change. After the Medical Act 1858 was passed, huge arguments developed between different parts of the medical profession. Each side believed that it knew best. The lesson that we must learn from the way in which medicine has developed is that it must do so on an open and reasonable basis, learning from the complementary side as well as giving to it.

On that note, I strongly recommend that the Bill should reach the statute book. I congratulate everyone concerned and the Department on the helpful way in which they have accelerated the Bill's progress.

11.22 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): On behalf of the Government, I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on his success in the ballot and on his choice of Bill. I begin by stating that the Government fully support the Bill and hope that it will also receive the support of the House.

Osteopathy was developed by an American doctor called Andrew Taylor Still and first came to Britain around the turn of the century. It was brought over by a group of American-trained practitioners who later formed the British Osteopathic Association. The first osteopathic training institution—the British School of Osteopathy—was founded in London in 1917 by Doctor J. Martin Littlejohn who had studied under Andrew Taylor Still.

Today, the medical profession regards osteopathy as truly complementary to the treatment provided by medical practitioners and one which enhances the range of possible treatment options available to patients. Given the increasingly common instances of cross-referral between general practitioners and osteopaths, it would not be unusual these days for an osteopath to be treating a patient who is currently receiving medication from his or her doctor.

Each week, around 100,000 men and women from all walks of life and from across a wide section of the population consult an osteopath. About half of them do so because of low back pain. Of those, nearly 90 per cent. claim to be cured or to experience an improvement in their condition as a result of treatment.

However, the gentle manual manipulative techniques which comprise osteopathy have also proved to be effective in the treatment of tension headaches, neck and shoulder pains, for many types of joint strains such as in the wrists, elbows, knees, ankles and feet—indeed, anything to do with the biomechanics of the body and its mechanical functions.

For example, many women choose osteopathic treatment as an alternative to drugs for the relief of aches and pains and other discomforts often associated with pregnancy. Sportsmen and women often consult an osteopath following injuries or to help alleviate problems that have previously prevented them from performing at their best.

However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East has already said, at the present time anyone can call himself or herself an osteopath and set up in practice. There is no obligation for practitioners to undergo formal training of any kind or to comply with any standards of professional competence or ethical practice. Members of the public, therefore, have no guarantee that a person calling himself or herself an osteopath is either properly qualified or competent in the practice of osteopathy or in the skills of differential diagnosis to know when osteopathy is inappropriate or when medical attention is more properly and, perhaps, more urgently required.

Mrs. Judith Chaplin (Newbury): My hon. Friend the Minister has just said that it is important that there is a correct standard of qualification. Will he reconsider the way in which qualifications are supported by the Government? A constituent of mine gained a place to study physiotherapy for which her fees would have been paid under the mandatory award system. However, she also gained a place at the British School of Osteopathy where she would have received only £695 a year towards her fees. If we want the high standard of qualification necessary to put in place the admirable benefits of the Bill, we must ensure that there is proper support for those who wish to study in this area.

Mr. Sackville: My hon. Friend has made an important point which we should certainly address.

While it is widely accepted that patients should have the freedom to choose whom they consult, the osteopathic profession is concerned that there should be adequate safeguards. Under the terms of the Bill a single statutory body—the General Osteopathic Council—will be established to develop, promote and regulate the profession of osteopathy and to set educational standards and standards of professional competence. The general council will also be the shop window of the profession and will play a key role in helping to raise the profile of osteopathy, especially during the formative years of the scheme.

As has been said, the osteopathic profession has been seeking statutory regulation for the past 60 years. Throughout this time no fewer than six private Members' Bills have been introduced to Parliament in an effort to achieve this goal—this compares with the 20 attempts it took to pass the first Medical Act—and that demonstrates a determination and perseverance which have become the hallmarks of the profession.

In 1935, an Osteopaths Bill introduced by the late Viscount Elibank, successfully gained its Second Reading in the House of Lords. It was then referred to a Select Committee where it was felt that "a sufficiently strong case had not been made for the proposals in the Bill at that time".

As a result the Bill was withdrawn, but its supporters responded swiftly to a suggestion made by the then Minister of Health for the establishment of a voluntary register of osteopaths which should require its members to achieve a level of excellence in training, practice and professional behaviour. In June 1935, a decision was taken to implement this recommendation and in 1936 the General Council and Register of Osteopaths was formed. While that body governs the majority of professional regulated osteopaths, there are also a number of other, smaller bona fide osteopathic registering bodies which regulate and represent the interests of their members. I believe that it is a cherished hope of all those groups that one day their roles might be superseded by the establishment of a single statutory regulatory body which would incorporate the breadth and experience of expertise contained in all branches of the profession. The Bill will, I hope, make that longed-for day a reality.

In 1985, Lord Glenarthur, the Under-Secretary of State in what was then the Department of Health and Social Security, outlined the criteria that the Government expected professions of non-conventional medicine to fulfil before being considered suitable for statutory regulation. The osteopathic profession has been fulfilling those criteria now for a number of years.

However, without doubt, the watershed came in 1988 when the Prince of Wales hosted a luncheon at Kensington palace attended by Health Ministers, presidents of the royal medical colleges and the president of the General Medical Council. At that lunch, the presidents discussed the difference between the therapies that the medical profession considered alternative to orthodox medicine and those that they regarded as complementary. At the end of their discussion, the presidents said that they believed that the way was clear to proceed with proposals to secure the statutory regulation of the osteopathic profession.

It was following a suggestion from his royal highness that the best way forward might be to set up a working party to consider the case for legislation that, in the autumn of 1989, the King's Fund set up its working party on osteopathy. It was chaired by Sir Thomas Bingham, who was then a Lord Justice of Appeal and is now Master of the Rolls.

The King's Fund working party report was launched at a major press conference on 3 December 1991. The conference was attended by the Prince of Wales and a stunning array of dignitaries, royal college presidents and elder statesmen of the medical profession. The Prince of Wales paid tribute on that occasion to the many years during which the osteopathic profession had been providing high standards of responsible care and conduct which, he said,

"had been of real value to a large number of people".

He congratulated the working party on its report and expressed his hope that, after all its hard work, legislation would follow at an early date. On 17 December Lord Walton introduced the Osteopaths Bill, which the working party had appended to its report, as a private peer's Bill in another place.

Before leaving that subject, I again express the Goverhment's thanks to the working party's chairman, Sir Thomas Bingham, its members and the King's Fund. The working party unquestionably made a significant and central contribution to the osteopaths' pursuit of statutory regulation. The policy underpinning the proposals in the Bill are modelled principally on its recommendations which have provided a fair, sound and practical basis for statutory regulation of established practitioners and provide the public with safeguards for the future.

As the House already knows, the King's Fund has set up a further working party to consider proposals for the statutory regulation of the chiropractic profession. That working party is also chaired by Sir Thomas Bingham and we look forward to receiving its recommendations when it reports shortly. The Government's gratitude to Sir Thomas for his interest in complementary medicine has already been recorded.

I also add my congratulations on the sterling work performed by Simon Fielding in the profession's quest for statutory regulation. Mr. Fielding, himself an osteopath, has worked ceaselessly for that cause virtually all his professional life. He was a key member of the King's Fund working party and also played a vital role in persuading my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East to sponsor his current Bill. It is not only fitting but justly deserved that he has recently been appointed chairman of the General Council and Register of Osteopaths.

I have mentioned Lord Walton's Bill in the previous Session. It attracted all-party and Government support and brought to life the recommendations presented in the working party's report. The Bill went on to complete a successful Committee stage before the dissolution of Parliament last March and, in its own right, played a pivotal role in the profession's quest. I am pleased that the noble Lord has agreed to steer the latest Osteopaths Bill on its journey through another place following what we hope will be its successful passage through this House.

I shall now deal with the current Bill, the seventh and latest. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East has already outlined the purpose and content of the Bill and its major provisions. The regulatory system proposed for the osteopathic profession is, of course, modelled closely on that which exists for other major professions, including key health care professions. It also follows the principles for statutory regulation recommended by the King's Fund working party. However, I can confirm that, thanks to the working party, it embodies the most up-to-date thinking on professional self-regulation and will, as my hon. Friend said, provide a model for others to follow.

The Bill explicitly designates professional incompetence as a basis for a disciplinary investigation. I know that other professions, in particular the medical profession, are also investigating ways of introducing that concept for their own members. The solutions reached may be different for the different professions, but I believe that osteopaths can take credit for the fact that the scheme that they propose seeks to provide the public with the protection that the provision can offer from the outset of the statutory scheme.

Similarly, the Bill contains a provision for the introduction of compulsory refresher training as a condition of continuing registration. Again, I know that that is in line with current thinking in a number of health care professions, offering the reassurance to the public that the practitioners whom they consult are keeping up to date in their fields.

Perhaps one of the most important elements of the Bill is the creation of an offence of using the title "osteopath", or any variation of the term, without being a registered osteopath. I know that that provision is of interest to many related professions. I reiterate the fact that that is not intended to prevent other professionals such as physiotherapists using osteopathic techniques in their practice or telling patients that they are using such techniques.

The offence provides for closure of title, not closure of function. I hope that my remarks will provide some reassurance for those involved. I know that other professions are anxious to secure the closure of their professional title. Our advice to them is to follow the example of the osteopaths and to seek their goal through private Member's legislation.

As careful readers will have noted, the Bill also contains a panoply of appeal rights at various stages of the proposed disciplinary procedures and as part of the registration process. The Government's view is that they are desirable and necessary to fulfil our obligations in human rights terms. The Bill also reflects our European Community obligations in relation to the recognition of professional qualifications.

Added protection for the public is provided through the exemption of registered osteopaths from the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. That will bring osteopaths into line with other health care professionals and will mean that practitioners will be required to declare all their criminal convictions, including spent convictions, if asked to do so when applying for registration. The General Osteopathic Council will also have the power to ensure that practising osteopaths hold professional indemnity insurance and to take disciplinary proceedings against a practitioner who fails to comply with that requirement.

Nothing in the Bill affects the rights of members of the public to consult osteopaths directly or the osteopaths' professional freedom to treat patients. With all its statutory powers, the General Osteopathic Council will not be able to interfere with the free market in terms of the scale of fees osteopaths may charge. Should the need ever arise, powers of intervention are provided against any anti-competitive practices that the General Osteopathic Council may contemplate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East has already drawn attention to the fact that the Bill is expected to have only minor implications for public expenditure. That would arise only in the unlikely event of the Privy Council having to exercise its default powers over the General Osteopathic Council. I confirm that assessment.

The passage of the Bill is not related to the availability or otherwise of osteopathy on the NHS, because, as with all other services, the purchase of osteopathy is a matter for local decision based on the assessed health needs of the local population, competing priorities and resources. However, we hope that statutory regulation will stimulate the continued growth of the profession and will encourage more people to consider osteopathy as a career.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Does my hon. Friend believe that the Bill will make osteopathy more easily available on the NHS—perhaps as easily available as conventional treatment is?

Mr. Sackville: I cannot go further than what I have just said, which is that the Bill will further encourage district health authorities to consider making osteopathy available. It will remain a matter for local choice.

Mr. Jessel: Will general practitioners who are budget holders be able to use their budgets to send their patients to osteopaths if the Bill is passed?

Mr. Sackville: General practitioners have the right to employ osteopaths. I confirm that that is already the case.

The statutory regulations will help to foster closer working relationships between doctors and the profession. I reiterate the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East about the professional and lay members of the first General Osteopathic Council. They will be appointed by the Privy Council after consultation not only with the bodies that currently administer the systems of voluntary registration, but with those that reflect wider views, such as those of the public, of educationists and of the medical profession. The initial members will be appointed on the basis of their individual merit, and for their ability to help to secure the highest standards of clinical practice and to bring out the best ideas from all quarters of the profession.

I underscore the importance of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East, that the profession should not upset the stability it currently enjoys through the premature anticipation of future change. It is important that individual members of the osteopathic profession continue to support the existing schemes of voluntary registration right up to the time when the new General Osteopathic Council takes on its statutory responsibilities. Failure to do that would result in a loss of public confidence in the profession, it would undermine all that has been achieved so far and it would call into question the professional integrity of those who abandoned a scheme that had brought them and their profession to the brink of achieving their ultimate goal.

I thank hon. Members who have taken part in the debate, in which a number of interesting points have been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) mentioned apparent anomalies in terms of VAT. I shall investigate the matter and write to him. My hon. Friend also mentioned the various key areas and targets set in the White Paper "The Health of the Nation". Further targets, as he probably knows, are under discussion, especially on the question of back pain in which my hon. Friend expresses great interest. He will know that the clinical standards advisory committee is studying the area as one of its special areas of interest. I hope that we shall have more to say on that. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham also mentioned the question of GPs with which I have just dealt.

I welcome what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), who has taken an active interest in the House in complementary and alternative medicines. I reiterate his hope that the Bill will take alternative and complementary medicine a little further down the road of acceptance by the medical profession.

We also heard a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who is taking a rest from his usual nightly exertions in the House. Some of us were relieved to hear him say that he would leave the European ramifications of the Bill on the table. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East is grateful for that. Yet again, I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing the Bill.

I should declare a personal, family interest. I have just discovered—to my shame, only a few minutes ago—that my late father was the president of the General Council and Register of Osteopaths—[Laughter.] He was a dark horse. I was aware that he was active in another place in promoting the interests of the profession, but the fact that he reached such heights has only just come to my attention.

The osteopathic profession has been running the race in pursuit of statutory legislation for more than 60 years. The Government believe that the case presented by the profession is deserving and justifiable. The King's Fund working party report and the Bill introduced by Lord Walton in the previous Session have taken the profession down the back straight. It is our hope that the Bill will bring the profession not only round the final bend and along the home stretch, but across the finishing line where it can hold aloft the long-sought prize of the Osteopaths Act 1993.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): My remarks will be briefer than I had intended because many hon. Members have made the points in the debate. It is not worth detaining the House on legislation for which clearly there is so much support.

It is a shame that the Minister drew an analogy between complementary medicines and crossing the finishing line in a horse race. It should have been Government policy to address the important points made today about complementary and alternative medicine. There should have been a positive lead from the Government on how to incorporate the valuable contributions made to the NHS by those medicines.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) has received many accolades this morning. I congratulate him on the Bill, and on his thorough and clear explanation of the range of the Bill, of its intentions and of the clear benefits, especially for osteopaths. Qualification for registration is important. It is important that it should be an offence for anybody to call himself an osteopath without being registered. The whole point of the legislation is to provide protection for the patient.

I hope that, when the Bill is in Committee, the important points made by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms. Lynne) will be taken on board. The Bill will then be improved as it makes its speedy way through Committee.

The hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) referred to chiropractors and physiotherapists as well as osteopaths. Physiotherapists have made the same points to Opposition Members, expressing their support for and envy of the provisions envisaged for osteopaths. I sincerely hope that we shall make rapid progress in addressing those matters.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) made an important contribution to the debate, in which he drew attention to the suffering and problems that back pain causes. Back pain is not a fringe consideration: it affects people's lives, work and ability to take part in other activities. We do not pay enough attention to that fact and I hope that, in considering "The Health of the Nation" and improvements in the national health service, we shall bear it in mind.

Before I speak glowingly of osteopaths' contribution, I have been advised to give as my definition of osteopathy that which appears in the King's Fund report, which makes clear the complementary nature of the discipline. Page 10 of the report states:

"Osteopathy is a system of diagnosis and treatment which lays its main emphasis on structural and mechanical problems of the body. It is not an alternative to conventional medicine but a complementary discipline which offers patients an additional treatment option for certain conditions which can affect the body's framework. In short, osteopaths are concerned with the biochemics of the body and the maintenance of proper mechanical function."

This is not a debate about complementary medicine, although we urgently need such a debate, as complementary medicine should be available within the NHS.

In expressing its support for the Bill, the British Medical Association has made it clear that it recognises the regulation, education and training of osteopaths in the United Kingdom as most important and believes it to be entirely appropriate that those wishing to practise osteopathy should have to register to do so. It welcomes the establishment of such a register as a guarantee of professional conduct and integrity, which will also afford greater protection to the patient from the potential harm of treatments by unskilled and unauthorised practitioners. The BMA goes on to say that it is currently investigating the control and practice of a wide range of complementary therapies. I suggest that this House, too, should turn its attention to that matter.

A senior clinical tutor at the London College of Osteopathic Medicine tells me that Bernard Shaw performed the opening ceremony at the association's clinic in Vincent square in 1927. I shall not be giving a complete history of osteopathy—although I must say that I am surprised that the Minister omitted his grandfather from the history he gave, and I am glad that he was informed of the fact in time.

On top of his many other talents, Bernard Shaw was a health enthusiasts. Indeed, the reference in the introduction to "The Doctor's Dilemma" to the doctors who were not registered by the General Medical Council but who were "rather more successful" than some of their registered colleagues is thought to refer to doctors of osteopathy.

Many people use osteopathy, and the Bill is intended to ensure that greater protection is afforded to them as patients. A study published in this month's British Journal of General Practice draws together some important evidence about the work of osteopaths:

"Most of the estimated four million consultations per year in the United Kingdom for complementary medicine are for pain. There are 1,706 registered osteopaths, more than any other group of complementary therapists. Of general practitioners in England, 72 per cent. refer patients to complementary therapy, most commonly for manipulation".

Some practices are already sufficiently convinced of the benefits of osteopathy to offer the service free of charge to their patients within the national health service.

Osteopathy is a little-researched adjunct to conventional primary care. It seems to me that we should be considering the role that it has to play in primary care. It is predominantly used by patients in their working years, especially those with spinal problems, which are often self-limiting. The study reported in the British Journal of General Practice suggests that three visits were usually sufficient to improve the symptoms, and that in respect of women, who attended more frequently than men, the improvement was considerably more marked.

The Bill makes no difference to the availability of osteopathy under the NHS. In considering "The Health of the Nation", we must examine the arguments—and remember the speech made by the hon. Member for Twickenham. Osteopathy has a very good success rate, particulary in relieving spinal pain. In addition to regulation and registration, we should urgently consider including osteopathy in an extended primary health care team and, in the acute sector, as part of the muscle and joint team—rheumatology, orthopaedics, physiotherapy and occupational therapy.

Mr. Tredinnick: Is the hon. Lady aware that a recent survey showed that, in some hospitals, it was found more effective to send patients suffering from back pain to an osteopath rather than giving them the traditional out-patient care? Does she agree that that further illustrates the effectiveness of osteopathy and tells us how important it is that it should be further integrated into the health service?

Ms. Primarolo: I have not seen that survey, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we should not neglect the skills, talents and abilities of osteopaths to deal with some types of back pain and spinal injury but should use them to the full. That would have clear benefits not only for patients but for the NHS.

The study to which I have referred shows that spinal joint strain—back problems—shows significantly better symptom improvement at four months with osteopathy than with drug therapy. We must investigate this matter further because if it is true that osteopathy is more effective, there will be bonuses to patients and the NHS alike. For instance, if, in some cases, the complementary use of osteopathy rendered drug therapy unnecessary, there would be a significant saving to the NHS drugs budget. The drug therapies prescribed are often both expensive for the NHS and traumatic for the patient. I do not suggest that the process should be automatic—merely that the possibility needs to be investigated. Moreover, if that were shown to be the case, the dreadful side effects that sometimes result from the use of drug therapies might be prevented.

There is a strong case, on the basis of prevention, health promotion and cure, for examining the role of osteopathy and the other forms of complementary medicines that are available. We agree with the Government that the Bill should have the wholehearted support of the House and that its Committee stage should proceed as quickly as possible. The Bill demonstrates the way forward for incorporating complementary medicines into the national health service—a debate which the House should have had a long time ago. I hope that after prodding from the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East we will not shirk the consideration of other complementary medicines. Again, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the excellent debate which he initiated this morning.

12.1 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I am glad to have the opportunity to add my voice to the supporting choir of hon. Members on both sides of the House, and many organisations and individuals outside the House, in welcoming the Bill. I add my congratulations to those already extended to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss). I wish him well, and I wish the Bill a speedy and successful passage through the House.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms. Lynne) reminded us of the lengthy process before the Bill came before us. Undoubtedly, that lengthy time is regretted. Perhaps the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) were over-generous in not being more regretful that the Government have not found the opportunity over the years to introduce this measure and that they rely on my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East to make amends for that.

Without detracting from the applause which is rightly due to my hon. Friend, I wish to refer to one or two parts of the Bill on which it would be profitable to have a lengthy debate in Committee. I shall be selective; I am aware that other hon. Members have referred to many of the salient features of the Bill. Important business is to follow this debate, and undoubtedly one or two other hon. Members also wish to catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye.

I shall refer to the register and the principles of registration. Essentially, the kernel of the Bill is the establishment of a register of lawful practitioners and how such a register will be operated. I do not for one moment quarrel with the principle of the establishment of a register. I think that it is right, and I welcome it.

I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East that it is right to enshrine two categories of registration. One category is for those practitioners who fully and immediately satisfy the qualification, experience and character requirements. It is right that there should be a category of provisional registration for practitioners who do not fully and immediately satisfy the requirements.

In an intervention to my hon. Friend I suggested that perhaps the Bill would be better if it incorporated provisional registration. I accepted my hon. Friend's reply. In an ideal world, the Bill would incorporate provisional registration, but I accept that perhaps it would be too much to ask the profession to accept that innovation initially, as well as many other innovations.

I seek further reassurance that there will be sufficient protection of the interests of patients during the two-year transitional period. Conditional registration is defined in clause 4(2)(d) which deals with practitioners who are deemed not to have spent a substantial part of their working time over a period of four or more years in the lawful, safe and competent practice of osteopathy. I doubt whether there is sufficient protection for patients while a register is being compiled in the transitional phase.

After studying the Bill carefully, I am not sure how the disciplinary measures in clauses 19 to 24 will apply during the registration period before the register is complete. If the House permits my hon. Friend to speak again in this debate, perhaps he can clarify the extent to which the regulations in clauses 19 to 24 will be applied before the register is completed.

I believe that clause 4(2)(f) requires greater clarification because it seems to hang at the end of the clause. That provision says:

"gives the required undertaking."

In the previous 93 lines in the Bill, there is no reference to any undertaking. What is meant to be undertaken, by whom and in what circumstances? It is hard to follow that provision, and I seek clarification on it.

There is another potential conflict in the Bill. I am aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) urged us not to raise Committee points on Second Reading. However, we will not all have the opportunity to participate in the Committee. The potential conflict is between clauses 3 and 4 and the clause which relates to allegations of criminal conviction. Is the concept of the lawful practice of osteopathy in clauses 3 and 4 inclusive or exclusive of unlawful practice overseas? The distinction that unlawful overseas practices are included is made clear later in the Bill. Is that also the case in clauses 3 and 4?

Moving away from the question of the register and the process of registration, I should like to address the issue of post-registration training. It can be argued that the general council should give a greater statutory commitment to post-registration than the Bill provides at present. As hon. Members will know, the working party dealt with that measure in paragraph 47 on pages 28 and 29 of its report. For the sake of brevity, I will not quote the relevant sections of the report. It is available for hon. Members to read if they have not already done so.

Clearly, the working party approached the issue of post-registration training with the view that significant demands should be imposed on the council. In the course of its inquiry, the working party diluted its understanding and its demands until we have the wording in the Bill. Clause 16 would be much better if it read not that:

"The General Council may make rules requiring registered osteopaths to undertake further courses of training" but rather "shall make". The working party said that that had changed and that the efforts of the council and the education and training would be directed at raising conditional registration to full registration. That can be accommodated by introducing a time factor—by saying that the post-registration training should start after a certain length of time, following the implementation of the register. I hope that the House will re-examine the "shall" and "may" factor in clause 16.

I shall select one point from those which I intended to make about which I feel strongly. I refer to clause 19(1)(c). The allegations against a registered osteopath which will trigger the disciplinary machinery include the allegation that he has been convicted of a criminal offence. Lord Walton's Bill provided that overseas convictions should be included. This Bill is restricted to criminal convictions in the United Kingdom. In the helpful notes that my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East gave to many of us, he offers justification for that:

"Given, however, the differences that exist between the United Kingdom's judicial system and those of other countries it is felt that this could prove too difficult to implement without the Professional Conduct Committee assuming the role of quasi-judicial body, which is not what it is intended to be."

With great respect to my hon. Friend, I quarrel with him on this point. I can clearly envisage criminal offences committed overseas which his Bill would exclude from consideration but which would seriously affect the right of someone to practise osteopathy in Britain. Therefore, I urge that that point be reconsidered. It is in the interests of the patients, and therefore in the long-term interests of the profession, that it is reconsidered. The point which Lord Walton sought to make in his Bill should be restated in this Bill.

I stress that I warmly welcome the Bill. It is long overdue. However, I feel that there are one or two points on which we could have further profitable debate.

12.9 pm

Mr. Moss: With leave of the House. I should like to thank hon. Members on both sides of the House for their excellent speeches in the interesting and wide-ranging, as well as long overdue, debate that we have had on this important matter. I thank the Labour and Liberal Front-Bench spokesmen for their speeches and support. I assure the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms. Lynne) that the matters that she raised will be examined in detail in Committee. I hope that she will be a member of that Committee and bring her expert knowledge to it.

I also thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his speech and for the support of his Department. In all undertakings one usually looks for a sign of the outcome. When my hon. Friend revealed his auspicious link with the osteopathic profession through his illustrious forebear, I knew that, rather than the winning post rushing forward, here was a star on the route to Bethlehem which told me that my Bill would have an easy passage through this morning's proceedings and the Committee stage. I thank my hon. Friend for all his contributions to the Bill.

I thank the sponsors of my Bill, many of whom have been present this morning. I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) and for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) for attending the debate. I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe), and for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant), the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), my hon. Friends the Members for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) for agreeing to sponsor this important legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) rightly said that the physiotherapists were worried that they did not have a protected title—something which the Bill gives to the osteopathic profession. But I point my hon. Friend in the direction of the inadequacy of the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act 1960, which needs some improvement. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) also referred to that Act.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham also raised the important issue of value added tax on osteopaths' bills. Physiotherapists do not have to charge VAT. I was delighted that my hon. Friend attended the debate this morning. He, too, was a member of the Lords and Commons ski team in Devosse. He fell in a race with the Swiss parliamentarians and ended up in Devosse hospital. I was told that he was receiving excellent physiotherapy treatment under water. One wag in our party was heard to ask how long he had to hold his breath for that treatment.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East for his speech. He referred to chiropractors. I assure him that the King's Fund is to report on the position of chiropractors, in the spring, we hope. There is every sign that the model that we have discussed today will be adopted for that profession.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick). I welcomed his speech as the treasurer of the all-party parliamentary group on complementary medicine. He spoke eloquently about the progress and growing acceptance of complementary medicine, and rightly said that the Bill could be an important forerunner of legislation for other groups in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is the chairman of the all-party group. He recognised the sea change in attitude among the public and in the British Medical Association to complementary medicine. I confirm that by reading from a letter from the BMA which I received the other day:

"The BMA supports the legislation which seeks to regulate the education and training of osteopaths in the United Kingdom. We believe it is entirely appropriate that those wishing to practise osteopathy should have to register to do so and would welcome such a register as a guarantee of professional conduct and integrity . . . The BMA's Board of Science and Education is currently investigating the control and practice of a wide range of complementary therapies and will produce a comprehensive report in June 1993."

So my hon. Friend was right to point out that there has been a dramatic change in the attitude of the medical profession.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) made a detailed speech. I am mindful of all the issues that he raised. I assure him that if he tables amendments on the points that he made, they will be considered carefully in Committee.

Judging from the speeches of support that have been made today, it appears that the Bill will achieve its Second Reading. That is testimony to the tremendous efforts of many people associated with the osteopathic profession over many years. If congratulations are in order, it is entirely due to them.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Medicines Information Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.15 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is an important Bill which has all-party support, as the list of sponsors on the back of the Bill shows. Several other Members of Parliament have spoken to me to say that they support the principles of the Bill. Outside Parliament the Bill has the support of the National Consumer Council, the Freedom of Information Campaign and Social Audit. Significantly, it is also supported by a wide range of medical and patients groups, including the British Medical Association, the Association of Community Health Councils, the Patients Association, the Association for Consumer Research and MIND.

I also understand that the Government, committed as they are in their manifesto to greater openness and providing more information for patients, are sympathetic to the principles behind the Bill. The Secretary of State was reported in a newspaper two days ago as saying that she thought that the Bill ought to get a fair wind. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster told the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on Wednesday that he was broadly sympathetic to the aims of the Bill, charged as he is by the Prime Minister with the duty of creating more openness in government.

The purpose of the Bill is to remove the all-embracing secrecy that surrounds all aspects of the licensing of medicines, both human and veterinary. Section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 prevents the licensing authorities from giving any information about the licensing process. That means that at present the licensing authorities cannot disclose the safety studies that they obtain from manufacturers, including the results of trials of new medicines on patients. They cannot disclose their reasons for granting, suspending or revoking the licence. They cannot disclose the advice received by Ministers from bodies such as the Committee on Safety of Medicines and the Veterinary Products Committee. They cannot disclose the results of inspections showing whether pharmaceutical plants comply with quality control and hygiene standards.

Indeed, when Members of Parliament ask questions of Ministers they come up against a brick wall. For example, when my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) asked what was being done to deal with the problem of counterfeit medicines, he was told by the Secretary of State that section 118 prevented an answer being given to him. That is the problem which faces all of us when we want to ask questions on behalf of our constituents about drugs and their side effects. That is unacceptable.

Section 118 prevents doctors and medical experts from examining the safety aspects of drugs that they prescribe, which is even more important than the problem facing Members of Parliament when they represent their constituents, and could be to the detriment of patients. While we all accept and admire the benefits that can be derived from modern medicine, powerful drugs, by their very nature, also carry risks. A proper balance can be struck only if we get all the available information about the risks and benefits. We rest our case on the fact that, under the present licensing system, one cannot achieve a proper balance. Doctors are made familiar with the benefits of drugs by the drug companies and receive a book on drugs being produced and licensed, but, because of the secrecy surrounding the licensing system, it is much harder to establish a full picture of the risks.

May I use a visual aid, Madam Deputy Speaker? There is a drug called Retrovir—I always find it difficult to pronounce the names of modern drugs, but I think that that is correct—and I now show the House the information about it provided for doctors by the industry. As hon. Members know, information about licensing is much more open in the United States of America, and I also show hon. Members the information provided there about the same drug—the summary basis of approval.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Could the hon. Member give a brief description of the information, as I think he knows that it is not in order to use a visual aid which cannot be translated into writing?

Mr. Radice: Yes, Madam Deputy Speaker, I understand that. I was trying to point out that if a doctor in Britain receives a description from the industry it is likely to be very brief, whereas a doctor in the United States, with the benefit of a more open licensing system, has access to much more information and can therefore draw a more effective conclusion about the balance between the benefits and risks of medicines.

In some instances, the lack of information could be harmful. I am not trying to be sensational, but I shall quote four examples to the House and it is important for hon. Members to understand the problems that can arise.

First, in the case of the painkiller for arthritis, Opren, we did not know that the drug had been inadequately tested on the elderly patients who were the most likely to use it. Later, 7,000 people contacted the Opren action group to report side effects from the drug and to find out more information. However, they were not able to get the information because of the problems inherent in our licensing system.

The anti-depressant drug Prozac is another example. In 1991, Norway and Sweden refused to licence the drug on the ground that the manufacturer Eli Lilly sells the product only in 20 mg capsules. Some patients need only 5 mg, but the product is not available in that dose, which was why the licence was refused in Norway and Sweden. However, Prozac is licensed in the United Kingdom and is widely used at the recommended dose of 20 mg, rising to a maximum of 80 mg. The secrecy over information means that doctors cannot judge why it is recommended here at levels which are apparently regarded in other countries as excessive for some patients.

Another example is in veterinary medicine and has already been mentioned in the House of Lords. There is growing concern about the toxic effects on humans of using organo-phosphate sheep dips, which have been licensed since the 1970s. Under the present system there is no way to find out whether any trials were conducted on the dips before licensing and, if they were, what they showed.

In 1991, the licence of the tranquilliser Halcion was suddenly withdrawn. Neither patients who were taking the drug, which had been available for about 10 years, nor the doctors prescribing it were allowed to know the reasons behind the withdrawal of the licence.

By reducing the secrecy surrounding licenced medicines and by providing more balanced information, the Bill will lead to more rational prescribing, which will benefit doctors, pharmacists and publications such as the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin, from which many doctors get their information. Also, it would have the benefit of making the licensing authorities and the industry more accountable. It would be good for consumers to have full confidence in the medicines that they take and in the regulatory system under which those medicines are licensed. The Bill will also ensure that patients either directly or indirectly, which is the more likely, will have access to information about the potential risks and benefits of the medicines that they take, which is essential.

The Bill, and the model that it suggests, follow the precedent set by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the case of pesticides, introduced in 1986, which is to be extended. Like the Bill, the pesticide arrangements involve making a detailed evaluation available, which often amounts to about 90 pages, as well as access to the full data on request and it bars commercial requesters, which is important. We are trying to follow a model which has been set up and is working in this country. In a sense, that strengthens the case for the Bill.

I shall briefly describe the main elements of the Bill. Clause 1 is definitional and clause 2 requires the Minister to maintain an index, which can be held in any form—electronic or otherwise. The index would identify three types of information: first, it would identify drugs that are subject to certificates and licences under the 1968 Act; secondly, it would identify types of information to which the public would have access; and thirdly, it would identify convictions under the 1968 Act.

Clause 3 is important because it is central to the Bill. It establishes a right of access to information on licences in force; the summary and evaluation of drugs—notably information about the safety and effectiveness of drugs; information considered by the licensing authority before granting a licence or before suspending, varying or revoking a licence; advice given by bodies such as the Committee on Safety of Medicines; and inspection reports on the manufacture and premises of firms that produce drugs.

May I make it clear that all information available under the Bill will be subject to two safeguards. I realise that a number of hon. Members and the drug companies are worried about that. The two safeguards cover, first, trade secrets and, secondly, the fact that the information will become available only once the product has been licensed and launched.

Clause 4 establishes, subject to ministerial approval, a wider right of access to information and extracts of information about the safety, quality and effectiveness of medicines, which may be necessary if the summary and evaluation are not detailed enough.

Safeguards are considered important by the industry and the country as a whole. Clause 6(2) excludes information about the manufacturing process that would damage commercial interests. It also excludes information about a product being developed, which has not yet been licensed. Clause 8 continues to make it a criminal offence to release information about the manufacturing process or a product being developed.

Clause 5 allows Ministers to exclude from wider access under clause 4 any person acting on behalf of a commercial interest. The Minister must be satisfied that the person has no commercial interest and may require legally enforceable undertakings to that effect.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): May I first declare an interest? I advise a pharmaceutical company, so there should be no misunderstandings on that. I am particularly worried about what the hon. Gentleman has just said, because the safeguards in the Bill seem to be weak in the extreme. Although undertakings may be given, it would not be the first time if such undertakings were not adhered to. What real safeguards is the hon. Gentleman putting into the Bill to prevent someone who has signed an undertaking from passing that information on to copyists or, in some ways more frightening, to an animal liberation outfit that could gain information about animal testing? That is of considerable concern to people working in the industry.

Mr. Radice: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns, but the Bill is modelled on the pesticides arrangements and they have not led to the problems that he suggests might arise. After all, he must bear in mind the fact that some of the companies that produce drugs also produce pesticides. I am well aware of the problem. If the Bill is given a Second Reading, I hope that he will give his advice and help in Committee so that we can tighen up any weaknesses in the Bill. I hope that he will consider what I have said in a sympathetic light.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I do not have an interest to declare, but I have major pharmaceutical companies in my constituency. A great deal of investment in the United Kingdom industry comes from foreign companies. It is feared that a regime such as that outlined by the hon. Gentleman will deter investment. It is not just a question of its implications in practice; it would deter further investment and thus undermine the prosperity of the United Kingdom's pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. Radice: My understanding is that the very open system of regulation that operates in the United States has not deterred investment by foreign companies. I am not convinced that the problem is as serious as the hon. Gentleman suggests, but clearly we should examine that aspect. I do not believe that companies will have anything to fear if their drugs are properly tested. The trend that the hon. Gentleman suggested has not been seen under the pesticides model—neither does it occur in the United States.

If foreign companies want to market their products in the United Kingdom, they will have to license them here, which means that we shall have access to their data. That will ultimately be useful to United Kingdom companies. Again, that matter can be reviewed in Committee. It does concern me, and it is important that we get it right.

Clause 3(2) and clause 4 make it clear that information will be available only after the product has been licensed and launched. The Bill also provides protection for other groups. The identity of patients, doctors, and researchers undertaking animal experimentation will not be disclosed.

The industry has suggested that the Bill could become a counterfeiters' charter. We have tried to bar commercial interests, on the pesticides model. Only extracts will be published, not full data, and information about the manufacturing process and about products under development and not yet licensed will not be divulged. All those safeguards should be taken into consideration.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of cost. That matter is for discussion and for the Government to decide. As the Bill bars commercial interests, the cost is likely to be far smaller than in the United States where, because commercial interests are not barred, the system is more expensive. I suspect that the system proposed by the Bill would not be very costly. I pray in aid again the pesticide arrangements, which are not costly. Costs can be exaggerated as an argument against giving the Bill a Second Reading.

In any case, as I have made clear, I fully expect the Bill to be amended in Committee. I have had helpful discussions with the Department of Health at six meetings over a number of months, but they have not yet been concluded. The Government have not produced any firm, detailed proposals of their own, so the Bill is inevitably in draft form. I do not pretend otherwise. I would of course have responded before Second Reading if the Government had made their intentions clear and said what they wanted. I could not, so perhaps some of the Bill's imperfections—if it has any—are not entirely of my own making or that of the Bill's sponsors or outside groups that support it.

I hope that those who have problems with the Bill will sit on the Committee and try to improve it, so that we can introduce more openness in regard to important licensing decisions, while protecting the legitimate commercial interests of drug companies, which I am anxious to do.

The Bill will give doctors more information about the medicines that they prescribe, and will let patients know more about the possible side effects of those medicines. The licensing agencies will be able to explain the reasons for their decisions and pharmaceutical manufacturers will have the discipline of knowing that the safety of their medicines will be subject to wider scrutiny. That will be good for doctors, patients, the licensing authorities and, I believe, the pharmaceutical industry. I hope that the House will give my Bill a Second Reading.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I welcome the Bill, in the light of the experiences of a number of my constituents and many other people who have written to me about the often permanent damage to children's skin which has resulted from long-term application of steroid creams to combat eczema. A recent Sunday Express campaign exposed the extent of those sad cases; I believe that the Bill will do much to reduce them by providing GPs, patients and their families with more information about the products concerned. It will also concentrate the minds of GPs who prescribe ointments without regard to either their efficacy or their effects on patients.

The ointments most frequently mentioned are Betnovate N, Dermovate, Eumovate and Propaderm A. They should of course be used sparingly; certainly they should not be persevered with if they are not working. Unfortunately, the Sunday Express and I have been informed of all too many cases of such prescriptions being repeated by GPs—sometimes for years—without any evidence of their efficacy. Permanent scarring has resulted; skins has become almost transparent in places, with blood vessels and veins becoming clearly visible. We can only imagine the psychological distress caused, to, in particular, young people of both sexes. Indeed, suicides have been known. Other side effects are obesity, owing to the cortisone ingredients absorbed into the bloodstream, and a loss of natural immunisation against infection.

Some GPs are clearly unaware of those dangers, and some do not appear to be particularly interested when patients discover alternative therapies—for instance, homoeopathic or aromatherapeutic herbal medicines—that succeed, often within weeks, where pharmaceutical products have failed, as well as being much cheaper. Producers will claim that they provide the widest possible advice on the application and administration of their products—which, in any case, must satisfy the Committee on Safety of Medicines before a licence can be issued.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will investigate the worst of the cases of which I have been informed. I shall send him the details.

I am sure that the Bill will go a long way towards ensuring that such sad and unnecessary cases of suffering are never repeated, and I hope that it will be given a clear passage. I congratulate the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) on introducing it.

Ms. Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I welcome the Bill, which is a positive step towards ensuring that patients and doctors have more information. We should ensure that we get rid of the secrecy that surrounds so many areas of our life.

I know several patients who have been to doctors and been prescribed treatment without being told of the side effects. They have seen their doctors numerous times and said, "I am suffering from this," but quite often their doctors do not know what the side effects are. That is why I support the Bill, which will bring our legislation into line with the extremely good legislation of the United States, under which people are able to discover the side effects of treatment.

I know that some European countries do not have such strong legislation. If the Bill is passed, we should put pressure on our European colleagues to ensure that legislation is introduced across Europe. That would go some way to allay the fears of some Conservative Members that competition would be difficult and that people would not want to invest in this country. It would help if we could make legislation apply across Europe.

I can understand the fears of the pharmaceutical industry about, for example, trade secrets, but that is covered by the Bill. Perhaps, as the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said, the Bill's provisions need tightening, but that can be addressed in Committee. The most important thing to remember is that people's health is paramount, as the Government suggest in their White Paper "The Health of the Nation". People should take more responsibility for their health care needs. If the Government believe in the proposals set out in the White Paper, they should support the Bill.

Some drugs have been withdrawn. The tranquilliser Halcion was withdrawn in 1991, but none of us has been told why. We are unaware of the side effects of similar drugs that are on the market. More drugs are being produced without our knowing their side effects, but we need to know in order to protect our health and that of our constituents. It is unacceptable to use the trade secret argument when the health of people should be paramount.

I should like to give my wholehearted support to the Bill. Obviously amendments will be tabled in Committee, but I should like to give the Bill the support of my party.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I had not intended to speak, but I repeat that I advise a pharmaceutical company in Kent. I make no apology for offering the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) some of the fears of the industry. I know that he has been approached by companies and by the industry's association, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry, in various letters and meetings.

Mr. Radice: I have had meetings with the industry, but more meetings, particularly at the Committee stage, would be extremely useful.

Mr. Couchman: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's assurance on that point. It is important that, if the Bill gets its Second Reading and goes into Committee, a better Bill emerges.

The pharmaceutical industry is one of our success industries. Our companies lead the world. Four out of 10 of the world's leading products come from the British industry, which is a strong industry that provides the country with a substantial trade surplus of £1·2 billion. Not too many of our industries are in that happy state. It is important that we maintain the investment confidence of the industry. I am worried about that confidence, given that, unhappily, the Bill is being presented at the same time as the Department is threatening an extension of the limited list provisions, which is also seen as a threat to investment by the pharmaceutical industry.

One reason why this country has attracted industry from overseas is the strength of our research and science, and our development of the pharmaceutical industry. It is a shining example to other manufacturing and research-based industries. I am worried that, as a result of the unhappy concomitants of the perceived threats to the industry, investment decisions prejudicial to the United Kingdom will be taken.

I hope that I may be able to take up the invitation extended by the hon. Member for Durham, North to join the Committee, but I am also tied up with a number of other Friday Bills, which may have to take precedence over his for my services.

I see the Bill as a threat to the intellectual property rights of the research-based pharmaceutical industry. In my intervention in his speech, I told the hon. Gentleman that the safeguards in the Bill to prevent dissemination of information are weak. They are seen as highly threatening because of the danger that generic copyists, or even people who might make fraudulent applications for product licences, as has happened recently in the United States, might get their hands on the information. Research workers in the industry are also worried by the prospect that their safety could be threatened by the Animal Liberation Front, which has extreme views on people doing research in the industry.

The hon. Gentleman placed great store on comparisons with the pesticides industry, but the two are not the same. The pesticides industry does not have the same amount of generic competition as the pharmaceutical industry, and the scale of the industries is also different. The pesticides industry has an annual turnover of £700 million, whereas that for the pharmaceutical industry is almost 10 times bigger. In addition, although innovative pharmaceutical manufacturers receive limited patent protection, no such protection exists for vaccines and products of bio-technology.

I am also concerned that the European agency proposed for pharmaceutical licensing will not come here if we pass the Bill. That would be regrettable, because, in respect of the pharmaceutical industry, we lead in Europe. It would be a great benefit if the European Medicines Evaluation Agency were to be located in this country when it is formed.

The hon. Member for Durham, North pre-empted my second intervention in respect of the cost of the legislation. At the moment, the pharmaceutical industry pays money to the Medicines Control Agency for product licences, because it perceives the licence as a service provided by the MCA to the industry. The industry would view the Bill as a disservice rather than a service to it. It would certainly be highly unlikely to be a willing contributor to the cost of the dissemination of the information.

Therefore, the hon. Member for Durham, North must recognise that the people who seek information under the Bill will have to pay for it themselves—which could amount to more than just the cost of providing a large quantity of photocopied material—or the cost will fall on the taxpayer. I am sure that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) will have something to say about the likelihood of the Treasury wishing to pay for information to be disseminated at a time when the Treasury is seeking to curb the drugs bill.

I have probably said enough now to show the industry's concerns. The industry is taking steps to disseminate more information about medicines. It would much prefer to see a basis whereby the Medicines Control Agency acceded to the EC initiative to provide summary bases of approval in respect of all newly licensed medicines. That certainly seems to be a way forward to provide more information to doctors and to patients.

While I wish the hon. Gentleman's Bill a fair wind, I hope that, in Committee or on Report, if necessary, he will be prepared to accept amendments that truly safeguard the rights and justified commercial interests of an important industry—the pharmaceutical industry.

Mrs. Judith Chaplin (Newbury): Like motherhood and apple pie, we are all in favour of as much information as possible being given to as many people as possible in all aspects of life. Having worked in government, I know that many papers that cross one's desk marked "confidential" probably need not have been confidential. I welcome the fact that the Government are committed to much more open government in all its aspects and to extending the information that is provided to people. However, there must be a balance. We should not go to the opposite extreme and remove confidentiality, when there are valid reasons for it. As other hon. Members have said, there is a risk that the Bill could damage commercial interests.

Most medicines take many years to develop. I believe that the average time is 12 years. Their development involves substantial costs. Up to £150 million can be involved in the development of a medicine. Even when medicines are developed and licensed, many are not commercial successes. Therefore, there is a high cost to the pharmaceutical industry in respect of developing medicines which we all want to deal with illnesses that afflict us today.

Patents can cover 20 years, but they are registered at the beginning of the process. Therefore, medicines are not protected for a particularly long period. The Bill could provide competitors with an unfair advantage. Indeed, it could damage the pharmaceutical industry in this country and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) said, the pharmaceutical industry is a very important industry in this country.

I have examined the Bill carefully, and I do not see how clause 5 can be enforced or effective. I am always worried about legislation which cannot be enforced correctly.

For example, people involved in industrial espionage do not pull a hat down over their faces and put on dark glasses. One cannot tell who is a spy and who is an ordinary person making innocent inquiries about the ingredients of a medicine. Therefore, it is extremely unlikely that the clauses which seek to prevent commercial spying will be effective. If they are not effective, there is the risk of damage to the industry in this country, and the risk that it will go elsewhere.

It has been suggested that it would be acceptable if similar legislation were in force across Europe, but that would still not be sufficient to prevent companies from manufacturing in other countries and therefore reducing the amount of work they carry out here. It is extremely easy for most of the companies involved, many of which are in any case international companies, to re-base where they do the bulk of their work, which could do great damage to our balance of trade if several moved overseas. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) said, there is a great trade surplus from the pharmaceutical industry, and we need to keep it here.

We also need to protect the jobs provided by the industry—about 80,000 direct and about 200,000 indirect jobs. Even more important, we must keep the research and development skills of people in the industry. By that I mean research and development not only in the industry itself but in universities and elsewhere. We should not wish skilled people to go overseas, which would be a possibility if there were a threat to the industry. The Labour party shares those aims, so I am sure that the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) has borne them in mind when considering the Bill.

The Bill leads us to ask whether the current secrecy is too great. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Durham, North that it is, but that does not mean that we should go to the other extreme and give too much information. I hope that I have made it clear that I would not wish us to go to the extreme proposed in the Bill, but there is no reason why the data sheets, or compendiums, about medicines available to people should not be re-examined to ascertain whether more information can be given without running the risk of damage to commercial interests.

Mr. Radice: I hope that, in making her measured speech, the hon. Lady has taken on board the fact that we are discussing safety studies, not general information about the manufactured product or the development process. I should have thought that safety studies should be available in the public interest.

Mrs. Chaplin: I agree that more detail should be available of studies and tests that have been carried out and what effects have been recorded. However, the difficulties relating to Opren or some medicines for eczema appear to have occurred because of inadequate testing rather than the lack of information available on them. It is absolutely right that there should be wider discussion about such tests, but that does not mean giving information that could damage the competitive advantages of those who have produced a drug.

I agree that section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 must be reconsidered, but not to the extent of an excessive removal of restrictions, which could lead to a greater threat of our industry going overseas. I also agree that the Medicines Control Agency should give details on, for example, why it has withdrawn a drug, further details of standard testing and what has been decided about different aspects of a drug. All these issues could be reconsidered so that more information could be given, enabling people to decide for themselves whether a drug's side effects are too great.

I have some doubt about whether that is the best approach. All of us know that, when looking at an encyclopedia of the 100 most common diseases, many people decide that they have at least 90 per cent. of them, and that their death is imminent. I am concerned about people being made nervous about a medicine which they could take quite safely and which would benefit them.

I believe that an area of information can be expanded without going to the extremes that appear in the Bill. The Bill requires substantial alteration before I can support it.

1.4 pm

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) on introducing the Bill, which is principally designed to push back the frontiers of secrecy. Incidentally, the Bill seeks to reverse a measure passed by a Labour Administration in 1968. I am glad that the Bill commands obvious support in the House and beyond. I support the basic principles behind the Bill and although I have some reservations of detail, none would stop my general support for the Bill.

There are two particular reasons why I am keen on the Bill. I am strongly committed to freedom of information. I believe that all information should be freely available unless there are overwhelming reasons against that availability. That point should be as relevant to all appointed statutory bodies, such as those governing the safety of medicines, as it is to elected bodies.

The spirit that applies is the same as that eloquently set out by Lady Thatcher in her maiden speech in this House. She said:

> "The public has the right, in the first instance, to know what its elected representatives are doing."—[Official Report, 5 February 1960; Vol. 616, c. 1350.]

She was speaking on what became the Public Bodies (Admissions to Meetings) Act 1960. The public has an equal right to know what those appointed to guard its safety on medicine and drugs are doing and why they are doing it.

Freedom of information was further enhanced as a general subject in 1985 with the Local Government (Access to Information) Bill, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire). I was lucky enough to be able to support it in a speech in the House. The same principles that drove me to do that encourage me to support the Bill today. In both cases, there are exceptions to the general principle of freedom of information. The Bill recognises that and it specifically grants exclusions to genuine trade and commercial secrets. The Local Government (Access to Information) Act grants exclusions for personnel matters. It is right that the Bill should allow exclusions.

I attach great importance to the need to protect pharmaceutical companies in that way. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Durham, North seeks to diminish that protection. However, I have some doubt about the sufficiency of the Bill in that respect. The hon. Member has been gracious enough to say that he is willing to be flexible in that area.

We must be careful not to discourage the huge investment that pharmaceutical companies put into the commercially risky and uncertain area of research. It is difficult for companies to assess in advance exactly how great the resources need to be to bring a research project to fruition. In many cases, research projects do not come to fruition.

We must ensure that pharmaceutical companies, which are strongly based in this country, do not lose confidence as a result of the Bill to the extent that they seriously consider moving their operations offshore where they could use a safety regime that might not be as onerous in its requirement to publicise the information gained in research and in bringing the drug to the market.

I am a little worried, too, about the implications that may flow from the single European market. Directives governing such matters are, of course, in train, but we all know that, although on paper such directives may place the various countries of Europe on an equal footing, in practice, there are some countries whose regimes may be less onerous and therefore more acceptable to companies that are worried about such matters. I am not as convinced as some of my hon. Friends that that is a real danger. I agree that the possibility exists, but feel that the difference between the safety regime established under the Bill and the safety regimes of other countries would have to be very great to persuade companies to move offshore. Given that many countries are now moving to tighten their safety regimes, I doubt whether the differences would be sufficiently great for that situation to arise. It is, however, something which needs to be watched.

I am especially doubtful about the clause to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) referred, which permits access to certain information on a selective basis; access must be given only to people who the Minister is satisfied are not connected with the drugs industry. In the age of photocopiers and faxes, not to mention telephoto lenses and listening devices, it is hard to imagine that those involved in a highly competitive industry will for long be denied information that is available to other people—no matter how that information might be transmitted. We need to examine more closely the practice of that clause, rather than confining ourselves to the theory behind it.

Having made those cautionary points, I come to my second reason for supporting the Bill. More and more medicines are available and more and more are prescribed. The public are more aware and better educated than ever before about medical matters. That is a good thing and, as has been said, the process is being encouraged by the Government: the public are being urged to look in detail to their own medical care. They are rightly entitled to information about the drugs that may be prescribed to them. There have been some tragic safety lapses. It is only right, therefore, that there should be an effective and credible system to protect the public which is not just thorough and fair but is clearly seen to be thorough and fair.

At present, the system is not seen to be thorough and fair because of the restrictions imposed under the Medicines Act 1968, some of which are clearly absurd. To my mind, the restriction on reporting by factory inspectors on quality control and hygiene in pharmaceutical manufacturing plants is quite unacceptable. Information concerning manufacturing units in Britain that is not available publicly in this country because of the 1968 Act is available in the United States of America, so any argument against making such information available falls at the first hurdle.

Hon. Members who have asked parliamentary questions on entirely innocuous matters have been given no information because of the requirements of the Act. For example, on 5 February 1987, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) asked about the location—only about the location—of overseas manufacturing sites of Generics UK Limited that had been inspected and was given the answer that the information was not available because of the requirements of the 1968 Act. The Bill corrects such problems and, at the same time, makes vital information available to doctors, patients and the public. With such information, they can play an active role in monitoring the system not only of drug safety but the drugs themselves. They can feed back vital information which can play an important part in establishing whether the drugs in use are safe. That would extend not simply the feeding of information but the safety of medicines generally.

1.15 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): On the face of it, this Bill looks like a good idea. However, on close investigation, it could prove more harmful than all the benefits it could give. It could have devastating effects on the pharmaceutical industry which, without doubt, is one of the United Kingdom's greatest success stories.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) proposed the Bill in a most reasonable way. He said that he expected the Committee to be able to provide the safeguards. However, people who are anxious about safeguards expect them to be better spelt out and agreed with the industry involved, rather than the matter being left to the speculative results of the Standing Committee.

As with many other Bills with good intentions, this Bill, which gives patients and doctors more information on which the safety of medicines will be judged, is flawed because it increases access to commercially confidential information in a way that no other country allows. It is a recipe for ensuring that pharmaceutical companies in the United Kingdom will seriously consider leaving this country. I know that that is not the wish of the Bill's sponsors, but they must recognise the side effects which it could produce.

The United Kingdom has always recognised intellectual property rights. The Bill undermines those rights; they could be swept away with one blow. Industries that have built up commercial know-how and expertise, and which always believed that Britain would protect them, now find that properly patented rights are worthless. That is the danger with the Bill.

The sponsor of the Bill seems to recognise that both the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry, to which reference has been made, and the National Office of Animal Health Ltd. think that the safeguards in the Bill are meaningless. Those organisations live with the facts of that daily. The piracy of patented goods and products is an international problem, as any owner of a genuine Rolex watch will soon tell us. The Bill will immediately make confidential secrets and know-how international property. If it is to see the light of day, it must contain more meaningful safeguards.

Pharmaceutical companies in the United Kingdom cannot introduce expensive research, knowing that the patent protection which existed previously will be worthless. The potential loss of employment in companies, universities and medical and veterinary schools will be considerable. People outside Britain sometimes think that we can never have a successful industry without a politician wanting to interfere with it, for very good reasons, and ruin it by a side wind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) said that there is hope that the European Medicines Valuation Agency will be sited in the United Kingdom. There is expertise here on which it could draw. We could say goodbye to any such prospect if the Bill were passed.

Of course patients should receive more information about the benefits and risks of medicines prescribed to them. Patient information is growing in Britain and we all welcome that. Of course regulatory authorities must have access to the facts on which newly patented medicines are approved. But a Bill giving access to all safety, quality and efficacy data in support of a product licence application would be open to abuse and commercial exploitation by competitors.

Mr. Radice: It is not all the information. It is a summary of the information. It is the information provided by the licensing authority. While I have every sympathy with the anxieties of the industry, it does not help to exaggerate in the way that the hon. Gentleman has just done.

Mr. Alexander: I am not a spokesman for the industry. I have studied the Bill. I have no commercial interest to declare. The hon. Gentleman has made his points and I am making mine.

It is all very well to say that the information could not be passed on to a person with a commercial interest in that product. But how can anyone prevent the information from being passed on? That is the nub of the objections to the Bill. I understand that, apart from Denmark, no country has comparable legislation or proposes to introduce it.

As a result of the Bill, British and foreign-owned companies would no longer make product licence applications to the United Kingdom Medicines Control Agency. That is a genuine fear. They would be sensible to go elsewhere. Another of Britain's major industries would fade away as a result of well-meaning politicians interfering in matters about which industry knows best.

As our pharmaceutical industry obtains product licences in Britain, British patients are often the first to benefit from new medicines. That advantage would also be lost if the Bill proceeded. We could forget the prospect of foreign companies considering pharmaceutical research and production in Britain if they had not already obtained licences.

The industry produces a trade surplus of £1·2 billion for Britain. The Bill would put much of that at risk. The danger is as strong as that. The National Office of Animal Health Ltd. has described the Bill as "well meaning but potentially damaging and dangerous".

For that reason, I cannot give it my support.

1.22 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I have listened to the debate with tremendous interest and sympathy. I congratulate the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) on having the spirit and enterprise to concentrate on removing secrecy where it is not needed. We have covered a tremendous amount of ground in that regard. The secrecy element of section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 is clearly outdated.

In the anxiety to make good a weakness, there is a tremendous danger that we could throw out the baby with the bath water. As other hon. Members have said, we must be careful about hitting the pharmaceutical industry too hard and therefore killing the golden goose—if I may use two metaphors in a row. This is almost a case of overkill.

The United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry is the best in the world. It is the fourth largest exporter after Switzerland, Germany and the United States of America. It employs, directly and indirectly, more than 300,000 people. That is many jobs. The industry made about £550 million worth of capital investment in 1990. Four of the world's top-selling medicines were developed in Britain. The industry's exports are valued at nearly £3 billion, making it the second largest contributor to Britain's net balance of trade after power generating machinery.

In short, we owe the industry a debt for its research, investment and innovative science, which raises a valid question about the balance between the interests of customers, the consumers, patients, doctors and the industry. I acknowledge that the hon. Member for Durham, North and his sponsors recognise that that is a sensitive area which must be examined. The problems have been highlighted by my hon. Friends the Members for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) and for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) and I make no apologies for repeating some of their concerns. We should consider the industry's fears that commercial interests could be adversely affected if it has to make all the data available, as set out in clause 4. It sounds reasonable enough to say that information on safety, quality and efficacy should be given, but that could cover a wealth of information which could be poached by an industrial rival, such as detailed results from clinical trials.

I should like to know what the hon. Member for Durham, North means by a "summary"—I think that that would allow abuses of the system. The Bill does not go far enough to safeguard commercial interests. Under the 1968 Act, volumes of information could be made publicly available because companies have freely submitted information in the knowledge that it would not be revealed to a competitor or a third party. As the data are so detailed, it could be abused by potential counterfeitors. Companies might use the information as a basis for a fraudulent licence application, as has happened several times in the United States in recent months, where such material is available under freedom of information legislation. That might also happen here as the Bill could aid potential generic copyists here or abroad. An example of such a case in America was when Bolar and Vitarine were charged in 1990 with undercutting Smith, Kline and Beecham in a generic drug scandal. PharmaKinetics was charged with fraud in a similar case in 1991. Those are serious occupational hazards.

The safeguards in the Bill against data being used and exploited are flimsy and easily open to abuse. The Bill seeks to give access to all data to everyone except "a person with a commercial interest in the industry". Who will decide who is a suitable person? How does one prove that they are not? How can one assess someone's intentions? The Bill is fraught with dangers, which could result in legislation and plenty of work for the lawyers, but I am not sure that it would have much benefit for other people.

The Bill states that it will keep from the public only genuine trade secrets, such as techniques for manufacturing drugs, but people will have access to information on the rest of the trials submitted if it can be shown that they wish to further "public discussion" of the safety and efficacy of the drugs concerned. It would therefore be wise for the sponsors to stiffen the safeguards against the misuse and exploitation of such information.

We must bear in mind companies' reactions if they are faced with the almost crippling requirements in the Bill. They would take off elsewhere and that would be a great shame, as the industry has such high standards in this country. That would mean that our launch pad for the pharmaceutical industry would never be the same again.

The hon. Member for Durham, North mentioned parallel legislation in the pesticides industry. However, pesticides manufacturers are not subject to the same intensity of generic competition as the pharmaceutical industry, so it is not a real parallel.

In spirit, I welcome the proposed Bill, despite my remarks. Section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 is a suitable case for treatment. There are benefits, but, as with all drugs, they must be taken with care.

1.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) on introducing the Bill. He was characteristically well informed in his assessment of the Government's attitude. We do not object to the principle of the Bill.

First, may I give a little background to drug regulation in this country? The drug regulation system in the United Kingdom is one of the most stringent in the world and provides the nation with the reassurance that the medicines they take are safe, efficacious and of good quality. That is something we should be grateful for. But this has not always been so. The pharmaceutical market remained comparatively free from controls until the early 1960s, when the promotional claims for a specific drug were seen to be tragically inaccurate. The Medicines Act 1968 provided a framework for the regulation of the safety, quality and efficacy of all medicinal products and was designed to close regulatory loopholes that allowed a drug such as thalidomide to be given to women in early pregnancy, with consequences of which we are all sadly too well aware. The Act achieves its aim by a number of integrated controls but chiefly by means of a licensing system that grants, renews, refuses or revokes permission for the supply of medicinal products for human or animal consumption. Those controls include the manufacture, distribution, marketing and advertising of medicinal products.

However, medicines regulation is an area where there are extensive restrictions on the disclosure of information. Under section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968, the disclosure of information supplied to the licensing authority is generally forbidden. The only exception to that is where there is a "duty" to do so—either as part of the function of licensing or where public health or safety are at risk. That is because there is an underpinning common law obligation to respect the confidentiality of the information presented by companies seeking marketing authorisations. There is also a duty to maintain the anonymity of individuals whose identities may be known because they have taken part in clinical trials or post-marketing surveillance studies. The amendment to section 118 is at the heart of the Bill.

The hon. Member for Durham, North has already eloquently outlined the benefits of the Bill as he sees them, and I need not take up the House's time in repeating them. None the less, it is worth making it clear that the Government are committed to promoting greater openness in government. To make more information available to the public in the field of medicines and medicines control in general would no doubt contribute a positive step in that direction. I recognise that the Medicines Act has been regarded and quoted as one of the long-standing statutes that provide for little or no information to be provided publicly, and I am sure that it is right to view very positively the prospects for opening up to public scrutiny at least some of the information held by the United Kingdom Medicines Licensing Authority. I am sure that steps in that direction are, in principle, something which the Government would wish to consider very positively.

The Bill would require the licensing authories dealing with both human and veterinary medicines to publish detailed information about their decisions and make available on request full information about the safety, quality and efficacy of medicinal products. Again, I am sure that access to increased information would represent a very important contribution to public information in an area that impinges on the day-to-day lives of virtually every member of the community.

Information about the medicines that people are taking, their side effects, and warnings that need to be given are important pieces of information with which individuals can balance the risks against the benefits of medicines. The consumer safety information provided with applications for veterinary medicines for use in food-producing animals, the residues of which might enter the food chain, is also very important. In addition, and importantly, doctors and vets could obtain more information about the medicines that they prescribe to enable them, too, to learn more about the medicines, benefits and their potential side effects, so that they would be in a position to give fuller advice to their patients and users of animal medicines.

[Mr. Tom Sackville]

Access by the public to information on adverse drug reactions is also a potentially important development. Great care would need to be taken in ensuring that the data that are available to individual members of the public are fully validated, and presented in a balanced way which avoids the risk of unnecessary public anxieties—or, worse, patients being panicked into no longer taking medicines that are in fact remarkably safe and efficacious for them. Where animal medicines are involved, withholding them could lead to animal welfare risks. In addition to information on medicines, their benefits and their risks, the public could also benefit greatly from more informed discussion in the scientific and medical community and also by patient and consumer bodies of the advantages and risks of particular medicines. Again, that would contribute to ensuring that medicines are prescribed and used appropriately.

However, the issues are more complex than might at first be apparent. Against the advantages that greater freedom of information would bring, some of which I have just outlined, we also need to consider some potential disadvantages and dangers. Some of the proposals in the Bill as drafted may go further in providing information than is necessary to permit informed analysis of the medicines available. Clause 4, for example, would require all data files to be opened up.

We need to consider very carefully the additional burden that the proposals would put on the pharmaceutical industry and the very real risks that the Bill, as drafted, would run in endangering the information—some of which is commercially highly sensitive—that companies have lodged with the licensing authority. There is also the danger that the United Kingdom may get too far out of line and prejudice its position as the European Community develops systems for the future licensing and control of medicines.

As everyone knows, the pharmaceutical industry is one of the jewels in our trading crown. It is a buoyant industry. United Kingdom drug manufacturers have produced a large balance of trade surplus over the decades. The United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry is the third largest exporter of medicines in the world. In 1990, the value of exports topped £2·2 billion. However, these are difficult times for all manufacturers and I am concerned that at a time when we are determined to reduce the burden government places upon industry, the Bill could increase them. Not only would there be the additional cost of establishing the scheme, which would add significantly to the fees industry pays to license human medicines——

Mr. Couchman: I touched on that aspect during my speech. Is my hon. Friend saying that he expects that if the Bill reached the statute book the industry would have to pay for that imposition on it?

Mr. Sackville: That would be a matter for discussion. Either way, it would become a burden on industry—directly or indirectly.

There would also be the additional cost, which cannot be estimated but could be very significant, that industry and the Government would face in ensuring the security of commercially sensitive information. The threat of legal challenge should not be underestimated; nor should the level of open-ended legal costs. In that respect it is worth bearing in mind the experience in the United States, where every year three or four significant judicial reviews are undertaken in the medicines field alone.

As currently drafted, the Bill provides for, among other things, unlimited access to data. There are a number of exclusions, including most products that are under development—although not animal medicines being tested in field trials in food-producing animals. The industry has expressed concern that that will inhibit the research and development work necessary to bring new products on to the United Kingdom market. Details of the manufacturing process itself are also excluded. While those definitions may look straightforward, as has already been said, in practice a good deal of work and difficulty could be involved in identifying the data to be excluded. That could add significantly to burdens on the industry, and to the regulatory authority's costs, which in the United Kingdom, uniquely, are provided entirely by the industry through fees.

The provisions seek to prevent persons with a commercial interest from obtaining sight of data that has been classified as commercially sensitive would surely be open to abuse. The definition of "commercial interest" is so narrow that it would seem to enable those who are prepared to make a living out of buying and selling commercial information to do so, particularly in view of the potential benefits to be gained from obtaining a competitor's confidential data in a multi-million-pound industry.

Mr. Radice: Has the Minister any evidence that such practices have taken place under the pesticides regime?

Mr. Sackville: I have no specific information, but I can imagine the potential scope.

In the United States of America, for example—where freedom of information legislation exists—commercial interests have sprung up to provide competitors with data. The Americans—one can see why—do not think it feasible to try to limit either access to information for those with a commercial interest, or the uses to be made of the data. They take the view that the most practicable approach is to restrict the type of information to be made available, rather than trying—inevitably, unsuccessfully—to restrict the number of people with access, or the use to which it will be put without its being necessary for the competitors to disclose their interest. An obvious benefit of that approach is the reduction of the threat of the legal challenge, which is significant in any event even with those provisions in place.

I know that the industry supports, in principle, the right of patients and animal owners to be more fully informed about the benefits and risks of licensed medicines prescribed for them by their doctors and veterinary practitioners. Currently, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry and the National Office of Animal Health make available data sheets in the form of compendiums, and I know that the Pharmaceutical Association of Great Britain is planning to do the same for non-prescription products. Although those publications are compiled specifically for prescribing practitioners and dispensing pharmacists, they are made available to public libraries and, on request, are sold to individual members of the public via bookshops.

On the human medicines side, I also know that the ABPI is committed to publishing in 1994 a compendium of "user-friendly" patient information leaflets designed essentially to meet the specific needs of patients. I am sure that that will provide very useful information, but although data sheets give a detailed description of the licensed medicine, they cannot give the reason why licensing decisions were taken, the risk/benefit ratio that has applied or data on adverse reactions. For veterinary medicines, the National Office of Animal Health has launched what it calls QEST—pronounced "quest"—initiative to provide user-friendly descriptions of each medicine, including a contribution from the Veterinary Medicines Directorate summarising the pre-licensing assessment.

It is vital to consider the European perspective. Although the European Commission has been asked to consider measures to improve public access to information by the end of 1993, it is becoming increasingly clear that other EC member states are showing little enthusiasm for more openness in the pharmaceutical field. It is argued that the Bill could put us out of step with our EC partners in terms of freedom of information. Even Denmark, which has had a freedom of information Act for some years, does not permit the disclosure of information that it considers to be commercially sensitive; nor does it open its data files to public scrutiny. I shall leave the hon. Member for Durham, North, with his enthusiasm for European matters, to say what he thinks of that, but the point that cannot be underestimated is the potential for United Kingdom applicant companies to choose not only to submit their product licence applications to one of the other European Community regulatory agencies but to make new investment decisions to the United Kingdom's disadvantage. They may not wait until the new EC proposals come into force in 1996.

The Government are committed to making more information available. We are conscious that medicines and medicines control affect the day-to-day lives of virtually everyone in this country and therefore seek to be as open as possible. The Medicines Act 1968 has been seen as providing a virtual block on the making available of relevant information, but that is not entirely true. For example, it provides no bar to the disclosure of information necessary to protect public and animal safety. It must be acknowledged, however that the pharmaceutical industry sends an enormous amount of commercially sensitive data to the licensing authority. This has been protected by the requirements of the Medicines Act and by the common law presumption that confidentiality would be maintained. Information on medicinal products is potentially highly sensitive commercially and there is a risk that without adequate safeguards the provisions of public information could be seriously abused.

The pharmaceutical industry is concerned about the commercial sensitivity of the data that it provides and about the additional burdens that the Bill could place on it and the extent to which it would be taking the United Kingdom out of line with other member states. This is a particularly crucial issue at a time when new EC licensing systems are in the process of being agreed, under which there will be a choice about where medicines licensing business is placed. We should not wish to see the position of the United Kingdom, as the licensing authority or a centre of pharmaceutical excellence, jeopardised.

I said that we do not object to the principles of the Bill. A number of its aspects on more freedom of information in the medicinal licensing field would be beneficial, but we would have difficulty in accepting a number of specific aspects in their present form.

1.47 pm

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): On behalf of the Opposition, I support the Bill. The previous Bill on which my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) and I worked together was on electricity privatisation, at the end of which he said that one day I would speak from the Dispatch Box. Neither of us thought that the first time that I would do so in this Parliament would be in support of his Bill. It gives me much pleasure to do so.

It is the second occasion in 24 hours that the Under-Secretary and I have faced each other. Yesterday morning, we clashed swords about district health authorities, but, having listened to him this afternoon, I can say that we share more areas of agreement than disagreement on this Bill.

A number of key factors lead the official Opposition, the Liberal party and some Conservative Members to support the Bill, although the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) adopted a toe-in-both camps approach. I look forward to discovering in Committee which camp she will finally jump into, although I already have a view about that. I shall deal briefly with the objections of the hon. Members for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) and for Newark (Mr. Alexander), which fell into three general patterns. I do so because the Under-Secretary and I both represent constituencies in the region that is the heart of the pharmaceutical industry—the north-west. I am a member of the parliamentary pharmaceutical group and have been since I came to the House in 1987. Hon. Members on both sides of the House who support the Bill are not necessarily anti the industry. Indeed, a long-term supporter of the industry and of the development of its product base, its standing in the community and its ability to sell its products should support the Bill and its proposals on the availability of information.

The industry would do itself a disservice if it used the Bill to squeeze the Department and the Minister in its clashes over the pricing policy negotiations with the NHS. It would over-egg the pudding if it used the Bill as such a vehicle, and would also put out the wrong message both to the international community and the British public. For a long time, the British public has been a purchaser of pharmaceutical goods in their billions. That purchasing power of the NHS and the British public has been of the greatest benefit to the development of the industry in the United Kingdom.

Access to information has been denied by the draconian powers of section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968. As the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) said, that Act was passed by a Labour Government. I am trying to make amends for my forefathers. In the 1960s, 1970s and the early part of the 1980s, legislation from Governments of both parties leant towards curtailing the provision of information to the public. The Bill will enhance the ability of the British people to obtain information that will enable them to take decisions about their daily lives. Much of

[Mr. Ian McCartney]

British society is blighted by lack of information and secrecy about all aspects of life. That is another basic reason why the Bill should be given a fair wind.

The Bill will remove the blanket secrecy imposed by the pharmaceutical industry. Speeches in the debate have shown us what that has meant in respect of some of the difficulties that have arisen as a result of mistakes. Often, those mistakes have been identified through medical accidents that the provision of information would have prevented.

The Bill will immediately improve the quality of information provided to patients, the clients of doctors, to pharmacists and the veterinary profession. It will enable them to determine the potential risks and benefits of the medicines that we take or those given to animals that eventually end up in the human food chain. It will provide equality of access for national comparisons and for regulation. It is nonsense when United Kingdom companies have to produce information in the United States marketplace that can be looked at by their competitors but that information cannot be looked at by patients, doctors, vets and pharmacists in the United Kingdom. Even if he wished to give us that information, the Minister could not do so. The Bill would rectify that anomaly.

The Bill will improve the equality of access needed to monitor safety and efficacy. All those involved in the health business will want to retain that principle in the whole gamut of health care issues, including the prevention of sickness and the alleviation of illness. That is why it is vital that the Bill is supported not just on the Floor of the House today but in Committee. I hope that no one will table wrecking amendments aimed at preventing the Bill from becoming law. When we know that the Bill is right, we must not take steps in privacy in Committee to strangle the measure and prevent it from reaching the statute book.

The Bill will also develop more rational prescribing regimes and thus benefit doctors, pharmacists and the national health service. That is vital given that on 12 November 1992, the Government indicated in a press statement that negotiations are likely to commence in respect of further restrictions on drugs that doctors can prescribe and increased generic prescribing and negotiations with the industry in respect of the cost to be borne by the NHS for purchasing drugs from United Kingdom manufacturers.

If the Government intend to reduce the amount and type of drugs that general practitioners and pharmacists can prescribe, it is important that when GPs change prescribing patterns they have information to ensure that their decisions are professional in the sense that they can improve and monitor the drugs that they issue and that those drugs benefit the individual to whom they are prescribed.

Little or no academic work has been carried out by the Department of Health into the cost to the national health service of the side effect of drugs since the early 1960s. However, it is commonly accepted that hundreds of thousands of people receive corrective treatment and counselling to regulate the side effects of prescribed drugs. For many unfortunate citizens, that treatment and counselling will continue for many years.

The cost to the national health service is huge while so many of our fellow citizens are restricted by unnecessary and avoidable pain and suffering. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) supported that point and the Bill will seek to address that problem. It will not address the issue completely, but it will be a step on the preventive path to ensure that people are not prescribed individually or collectively drugs that are inappropriate to their condition and which, being inappropriate, cause them years of suffering thereafter. That is another important reason why the Bill should be supported.

I want now to consider the objections to the Bill. In some respects, the objections are legitimate in that no legislation that passes through this Parliament should fail to take account of the effects that it will have on those who need to operate within the constraints of that legislation. Legislation from this place should be the best possible legislation. However, it should not be part of the process of determining that legislation to be frightened off at the outset by interests which do not believe in providing the necessary information to promote the interests of patient care in the United Kingdom.

The objections raised today fell into three basic categories in respect of safeguards for the industry—intellectual property rights, patent product development and retail rights and research and development. All those are outwith the gambit of the Bill. They were all dealt with in two ways.

Intellectual property rights and patent product development and retail rights were dealt with exclusively in the previous Parliament when the Government, with the Opposition's support, provided additional safeguards to the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry with the patent legislation. Although the industry still believes that the legislation is inadequate, we cannot emasculate this Bill to try to improve product and patent legislation.

If there are problems with patent legislation here, in Europe or in the international context, the matter should come back here and we will examine it and try to improve legislation to ensure that the United Kingdom-based industry is not placed in a difficult position because of trading relationships.

Research and development is very important in the north-west and much of the resources involved in research and development are spent in constituencies like mine. Much of those resources do not arise through a partnership with the Government. Through the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme, the Government take account of the cost of development and production of drugs.

If, in advance of the negotiations, the industry wants more from the negotiations than the Government, the industry should be honest enough to state that. The industry should tell the Government precisely why it believes that the Government are not going to offer a proper deal for its products. However, it must not try to emasculate the legislation in an attempt to put pressure on the Government to give it a far better deal in the negotiations which will soon take place on a price regulation scheme. It is important that the industry gets a return on research and development, but it is also important that it recognises the need to ensure safety and that access to information on product development is available to doctors, pharmacists and the general public.

Mr. Couchman: Does the hon. Gentleman not understand that there is a perception that the Bill is an attack on the industry and that perception will prejudice investment decisions for research and development facilities in this country? Companies from abroad have no need to put their facilities in this country—they have done so for very good reasons, but the Bill will prejudice that situation.

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman's fears are unfounded. First, as I said, information is already freely available to competitors in the United States and elsewhere. Secondly, companies base their research and development in this country because the product base is excellent and there are massive customers in the form of the national health service and the British public who buy off-the-shelf medicines. We also have a massive work force who are probably the most expert and skilled in Europe; indeed, we are internationally renowned for our skills. Such circumstances could not be replicated outside the United Kingdom, certainly not in the short term, let alone in the long term.

We have a partnership with the industry—it provides research and employment opportunities, but, in return, the United Kindom mark, in the form of the health service and the public, provides it with billions of pounds of resources and a product base which is safe, unlike many of its international markets which come and go. The House will do nothing to undermine the industry's ability to maintain its research and development projects.

The hon. Member for Gillingham is an adviser to Pfizers and also an adviser to the Gin and Vodka Association. I do not know whether that means one has to have a double gin or a bloody mary whenever one takes a tablet from Pfizers, but it is interesting that he is an adviser to the drink and drugs industries at the same time.

There is common ground between our parties on the European evaluation project—I do not want to embarrass the Under-Secretary by repeatedly citing our agreement on it. The Government support the project and a submission from the north-west of England for it to be situated in the Manchester conurbation. Much work has been done to ensure that the project comes to the United Kingdom. It has the full support of the pharmaceutical group in the House, of which I am a member.

The House can be assured that my party will do nothing during the passage of the Bill to undermine the industry's ability to ensure that the project comes to the United Kingdom and that the industry benefits in terms of inward investment and the possible by-product of the sales of products in markets outside the United Kingdom.

The Bill deals with the important consideration of confidentiality and tries to ensure that it is not destroyed and that the levels of disclosure of information are appropriate by ending the blanket secrecy of section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968. The Bill deals exclusively with those issues and does not cover wider issues such as the exclusion of information, which are currently protected by other legislation.

It was wrong of the industry in principle and in tactical terms to cause a misunderstanding about the type of information that the Bill will be able to unlock to the public and the medical profession. Although the notion has been rubbished in some quarters today, it is true that the Safety of Pesticides Regulations 1986 are not a model to compare with this legislation. Let us compare the bulk expenditure and resources of the pesticide industry with those of the pharmaceutical industry. The issue is not about the purchasing power of each industry. It is about the principle of how information is released in the public domain without damaging or destroying the confidentiality required in the development and research of products prior to distribution in the marketplace. It is not an issue determined by the size of the market. The issue is how the market is developed and how products reach the market. The regulations provide clear guidance—[Interruption.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) is making it clear that before I sit down, I must commend the Bill. The Bill requires further and adequate consideration, but its principles should commend it to the House. I hope that hon. Members who are worried about the Bill do not take their concerns to the extent of trying to wreck the Bill's chances in Committee. Those outside the House would misread such an action and it would do a disservice to the Government and to their attempts through the White Paper to improve information to patients, to doctors and to the wider community involved in health. For those reasons, I commend the Bill and I believe that it deserves a safe passage through Committee.

2.5 pm

Mr. Radice: This has been a debate with many constructive contributions. I congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) on his notable speech at the Dispatch Box. I also congratulate the Minister on a positive contribution on the subject which has helped to put the debate into balance.

There has been general support for the principle of the Bill in the debate—with one or two exceptions—in the sense that most hon. Members agree that section 118 is outdated. The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland)—I refer to her words in an effort to get her on my side—rightly said that section 118 was a suitable case for treatment.

Concerns have been expressed on behalf of the industry about the Bill's impact on it. It is true that the industry is very important—the jewel in our trading crown, as the Minister said. That is why we have gone to such lengths in the Bill to try to safeguard the legitimate commercial innterest of the industry. However, we are also concerned about the safety of medicines and about freedom of information.

What we have tried to do—I believe that we have done it—is not to open up commercial secrets to competitors, as one or two hon. Members have suggested. We are trying to be more open about the safety of medicines and about safety trials. That is the Bill's purpose. Those who say that the Bill will lead to a wholesale plundering of commercial property are exaggerating greatly.

We shall look at all the details of the Bill. We must also consider the Bill in the wider European context. I point out to the Minister that a number of countries are adopting more open systems, so there will be pressure at European level for our Government to take similar action. It would be nice if we were in the lead on one or two issues rather than always opting out or following behind.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I very much support the Bill, so my intervention is not hostile. My hon. Friend must be aware that many doctors have problems in prescribing because of the restrictions on the NHS prescribing list. Will the Bill assist doctors in finding other medicines as a result of their having better descriptions of the contents of medicines?

Mr. Radice: I will not follow my hon. Friend exactly down that line. All I can say is that doctors will certainly have more information about the safety of drugs because they will be able to find out the reasons licensing authorities give for licensing and for withdrawing licences. That is the basic principle of the Bill.

Despite the criticisms, there is general agreement that section 118 of the 1968 Act is outdated. I even detect a consensus on the idea of publishing summary bases of approval.

If the Bill has faults, as I realise it may, I hope that they can be rectified in Committee. I hope that those who are interested will serve on the Committee so that we can build on the consensus that exists to produce legislation that has the support of the House and the general public and takes into account the legitimate concerns of the industry. I hope that the House will give the Bill its Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) (Amendment) Bill

2.10 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I beg to move, That the Bill be read a Second time.

I am sorry to say that we have nearly run out of time. I shall therefore give the shortest possible introduction to the Bill, in the hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will do his best in the remaining few minutes to state the Government's case regarding its provisions.

I introduced the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) Act 1980—known by publicans as the "Ban the Thugs Bill"—in an endeavour to control unruly villains by excluding them from the pub in which they had misbehaved for a period of, say, one year. The idea was that, if they went into the same pub while the exclusion order was in force, they could be removed by the police.

I am afraid that, for a number of reasons, the implementation of the Act broke down. It was not mandatory on the magistrates—apparently the same probably applies in this case—to use an exclusion order. Although magistrates clerks would have had the information, magistrates themselves apparently lacked it, and there was certainly no overwhelming attempt by the courts to serve exclusion orders. A certain amount of extra paperwork was involved. There was also the question of identification of the person who had been excluded and, if he attended the public house again, of the additional effort that had to be put in by the police to expel or—if he was violent—arrest him.

In 1980, it seemed that the original Act was sufficient, but I am afraid that we have now moved into more violent times. Every day we read in our newspapers of publicans, their staff and their other customers landing in the middle of a fracas simply because the people responsible are uncontrolled.

Perhaps I should tell the House at this point that the National Licensed Victuallers Association is no longer a national organisation. Since the end of 1992 its membership has reverted to regional bodies. That will make it even more difficult for the Home Office to introduce further legislation affecting the vast number of licensed victuallers.

The Bill was drafted hastily. The then NLVA ran out of money to pay the drafting solicitor so I was put in the difficult position of having to try to complete, with the minimum of help, what had already been started. I know that I may not measure up to the high standards of the Home Office in these matters. Nevertheless, the Home Office has kindly said in a letter to me that it will make it possible to send a reminder to the courts, though not anything that will create a priority——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hill: I am sorry, but time is too short. The Home Office would send a circular to make the courts aware of what was already enacted in 1980 with regard to the identification of those who had been excluded from public houses. I understand that the police and the licensed trade are already co-operating with the courts.

At one time there was a fear that there would be a sort of rogues gallery in every pub. That was not my intention.

I wanted the photographs, if any, to be put in the staff room or private part of the public house. In that way the public house would not become a rogues gallery.

On the question of where we go from here, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will tell me shortly. I am worried about an article in Justice of the Peace on 27 January 1990 which gave the impression that the 1980 Act was ineffective. I am not sure that that is so. I know that the Lord Chancellor's Department finds it difficult to keep up-to-date figures on the number of exclusion orders which have been issued. Certainly, the emphasis is that, once a magistrate knows about his ability to serve an exclusion order, he is only too delighted to do so because some of the cases that come before the courts are horrifying.

Having said very little, I rely on the sympathy of the House to ensure that the subject does not simply die. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will help me with that.

2.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): At the outset, I thank my hon. Friend for his clear, helpful and succinct explanation of the background to his Bill and what it seeks to achieve. My hon. Friend is a distinguished parliamentarian and a friend of long standing of the licensed trade. He has made a distinguished contribution to that sector of the economy for many years.

My hon. Friend explained that his purpose in introducing the Bill is to make a number of amendments that have been requested by his friends in the licensed trade and which he and they consider would strengthen the existing provisions of the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) Act 1980. He also seeks to make it a more effective response to the problem of violence on licensed premises.

The 1980 Act, which my hon. Friend played such a significant part in placing on the statute book, gives the courts a particular power to use against anyone convicted of a criminal offence which occurred on licensed premises and involved the use, threat or offer of violence. At its discretion, and in addition to any other sentence it imposes, a court may make an order prohibiting such an offender from entering any licensed premises it chooses to specify for between three months and two years without the express consent of the licensee or his staff.

A person who enters licensed premises in breach of such an order commits a fresh criminal offence which is punishable by a fine of up to £1,000 or imprisonment of up to a month, or both. A licensee is entitled to expel such a person from his premises and may demand the assistance of the police to do so.

I turn now to the detailed provisions of my hon. Friend's Bill. Clause 1 requires a court to consider making an exclusion order in all appropriate cases. It will give a court the power to provide that an exclusion order should apply to all licensed premises within a specified area—most commonly a licensing district—and make it clear that a licensee's consent to an excluded person entering his premises will be effective only if it is given in full knowledge that the person involved was the subject of an exclusion order.

Originally, it was my hon. Friend's intention that his Bill should require a court to make an exclusion order, applying at least to the premises in which the offence occurred, in every case where someone was convicted of a relevant offence. That would have been wrong in principle. It must be for the courts alone to determine whether to make an exclusion order in a specific case in the light of all the circumstances of the offence and the information pertaining to the offender. My hon. Friend is now prepared only to require the courts to consider making an exclusion order in relevant cases. However, it is unclear what that would achieve in practice. Courts are already expected to consider all the sentencing options at their disposal for a particular offence before passing sentence and they have their clerks to advise them in such matters. Therefore, the new provision seems unnecessary.

Similarly, given that the 1980 Act already places no limit on the number of premises from which a court may exclude an offender, we see no pressing need to amend the statute to provide that offenders may be excluded from all licensed premises in a designated area. Neither are we persuaded that there is any particular pressing need for the consent provision in this Bill.

My hon. Friend and his supporters have told us that not all courts appear to be readily aware of their powers under the 1980 Act and that too little use is made of it generally. I can tell the House that, to meet those concerns, we are certainly prepared to consider a fresh reminder to the courts about the 1980 Act. However, I must stress that any such advice could take the form only of a reminder of the powers that that Act gives to the courts. We cannot give the courts directions as to the sentence to impose in any particular category of case, as I know that my hon. Friend will appreciate.

The main purpose of clause 2 is to make the simple breach of an exclusion order an arrestable offence. This is objectionable in principle and disproportionate to the mischief concerned. Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, the power to arrest without warrant usually exists only where the maximum penalty for an offence is five years' imprisonment or more. The present maximum custodial penalty for simple non-compliance with an exclusion order is one month's imprisonment.

The position may, of course, be different if another offence is committed at the time in question or if the offender resists expulsion. The police might then be able to arrest the offender either on account of the other offence, or for obstructing a police officer in the execution of his duty. Any breach of the peace or public nuisance could also lead to an offender being arrested.

To make a simple breach of an exclusion order an arrestable offence would also be likely, in our view, to be of limited practical value. Since there would be no grounds on which an offender could be detained once he or she had arrived at the police station, they would normally quickly be charged and bailed and thus free, if they so chose, to return to the premises concerned almost immediately—back to the pub, as it were.

My hon. Friend and his supporters also believe, I understand, that to make a simple breach of an exclusion order arrestable would also, indirectly, bring about a greater number of prosecutions for breaches of such orders. This seems to us unlikely. The decision whether to prosecute an individual ultimately rests with the independent Crown prosecution service, rather than with the police.

As for clause 4, we do not believe that primary legislation, again including powers of arrest without warrant, is necessary to establish a scheme to secure the attachment of the photographs of excluded persons to exclusion orders. We readily accept the argument that to do so would enable licensees and their staff, particularly those unconnected directly with the offence that led to the imposition of the order, better to identify any excluded persons who might enter their premises in breach of an order. But we believe that this objective can, broadly speaking, be achieved administratively and, as my hon. Friend and his supporters are aware, we have already given some consideration to the ways in which this might be done. It is a valuable point.

In this context, there is justifiable concern that any photographs which it may prove possible to provide to licensees for this purpose should be treated with due care and attention. They ought not, in our view, to be publicly displayed for all to see, including customers. We believe that the best way to tackle this issue is to bring together representatives of the police and the various licensed trade organisations to discuss drawing up a voluntary code of practice and this we intend to do. I am grateful that my hon. Friend has prompted the Government in that regard.

I recognise that most—but, I hope, not all—of what I have said will come as a disappointment to my hon. Friend and his supporters in the licensed trade. I have to tell the House, however, that successive Home Office Ministers have made clear their attitude to these particular proposals, both in letters and at meetings over a fairly long period. It is not that we in any way condone or take a soft attitude to violence on licensed premises. We view it very seriously indeed and would expect the courts to do the same. At the same time, however, we believe that the particular changes to the 1980 Act that the Bill seeks to introduce are, as I have explained to the House, either wrong in principle, simply unnecessary, or achievable by other means short of primary legislation.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): I am grateful that I managed to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. The news that I was to address the mother of Parliaments has obviously travelled widely, as shown by the prayer cards that have been put in position for these Friday debates.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) on his success in the ballot and on bringing the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) (Amendment) Bill to the House. He is a senior and respected Member and has a long success list under the private Members' Bill procedure. As he said, he was largely responsible for the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Certain Persons) Act 1980, which the Bill seeks to amend.

I am sure that we are also grateful that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, Home Department is on the Front Bench. He stated the Government's position with his usual clarity, which was well matched by the clarity and precision of the letters that he and his staff have sent to all his Back-Bench colleagues, which is a lesson to one or two, but I shall not say which one or two.

That is the end of the good news for a few minutes because all future legislation will be subject to a little-known procedure—the Roger Knapman reduction of legislation regulations. They have not gone through the House formally but will mean that every time 10 Bills reach the stage of Royal Assent we shall have a debate to decide which Bill is the best and should proceed. In the unlikely event of a Labour Government, it will not be 10 Bills but 100; where the European Parliament is concerned, it will have to be one in 10,000, but we can usually manage that in a normal day.

The Bill has serious subject matter. I do not doubt that in some areas there is violence on licensed premises and I imagine that that is true in Stroud, Southampton and many other parts of the country.

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Test will agree that he is seeking to ensure—as we all are—that the police, publicans and everyone else is protected from violence in such circumstances. I was interested to read the article about my hon. Friend and his Bill in the Morning Advertiser on 16 December, although I am not a regular subscriber to that paper. As well as a description of the Bill, that issue contained two articles entitled, "Gun law anger" and "Pubs caught in orgy of terror". My hon. Friend therefore does the House, the public and the trade a service by introducing the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Minister has already made his views on the issues fairly clear, but I wonder whether he could agree with my first general point, that it is essentially for the courts alone to determine whether to make an exclusion order in any particular circumstance, because the circumstances of both the offence and of the offenders must vary from place to place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Test touched on two of the Bill's main amendments to the original Act. Am I right in thinking that the first amendment would require the courts to consider making an exclusion order in all relevant cases?

I look forward to studying the record because it is not yet clear to me what the new provision would achieve in practice. Am I right in thinking that the courts are already required to consider all sentencing options for an offence at their disposal before passing sentence?

Mr. Michael Stern: (Bristol, North-West): My hon. Friend has hit on a major concern about the drafting of the Bill, however laudable its general aim. If we start to tell courts to consider one sentencing option as opposed to another in a particular case, we shall inevitably face demands from pressure groups and interested bodies to consider other sentencing options in other cases or even the same case. I speak with the experience of being married to someone who has just gone through training as a magistrate. Ultimately, the courts will be presented with so many options in so many cases that we shall negate the entire procedure.

Mr. Knapman: As my hon. Friend lives in Bristol and I do not live far away, I hope to meet his wife, but not on the conclusion of her training. The point that he makes is precisely the one that I should have wished to make——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 29 January.

2.33 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I welcome this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the difficulties that are experienced by tens of thousands of small children throughout the country, their parents, and those who run play groups and nursery schools. It could reasonably be said that I want to talk about kiddie care being clobbered by callous councils.

Since the Government introduced new regulations applying to the Children Act 1989, there has been chaos in many parts of the country in which decent, nice, friendly mums and housewives and others run facilities for young children—particularly those aged between three and five. That is largely a voluntary activity. If done privately, it is often run on a shoestring, with few resources, thanks to the good will and tender loving care of those who take an interest.

There are thousands of private schools, and since the regulations became effective in October 1991 they have driven many of the people who run such schools crazy. Some are being forced to close down because they cannot afford to meet the new regulations. I am not blaming the 1989 Act or even the Government—although they introduced the regulations that qualified that Act to some extent.

The Government introduced guidelines that local authorities were meant to adopt with discretion and common sense, but they provided an opportunity for many social service departments to go absolutely crazy in demanding standards that are completely inappropriate and much too expensive.

When it comes to dealing with young children, one would think that, above all, a delicate touch would be needed. Instead, the typically heavy hand of bureaucracy is swiping them around the head. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister issued a direction to local authorities to lay off and to apply the regulations more sensibly, but the evidence reaching me does not suggest that his advice is being taken.

I want to reinforce the view that my hon. Friend the Minister has already taken—that local authorities must be made to be sensible. The Government would do better to withdraw the regulations, on the ground that there was never any great need for them in the first place. Nowadays, there are no examples of great abuse. Where abuse occurs, unfortunately it is in public sector nurseries and other organisations, in which highly qualified people in regulated premises still manage to run schools badly. Given the size of the semi-voluntary industry, it is extraordinaty how few complaints are made.

All child minders, nurseries, and nursery schools were required to be registered before the regulations were introduced, but the regulations require them to pay a licensing fee of £100. That is a lot of money to three or four mothers who are not doing it for the cash. There is also a fee of £75 payable for an inspection according to a new set of guidelines. That is where the trouble starts.

It is a good example of people being forced to pay for the rope that is used to hang them. As the regulations arrived at town halls, social service department busybodies called on all the little schools—many of them in private homes and village halls—and laid down the law. It gives me no pleasure, although perhaps some pride, to remind the House that I warned of that as a member of the Committee that considered the regulations. To their credit, many women Labour Members, who understood the reality of the situation, joined in my criticisms. Now that the regulations have been introduced, we must do something about them.

There is a huge difference between facilities resourced by the public sector—where money is often regarded as a bottomless pit—and those that are run on a shoestring, on a non-profit making and informal basis, by the private sector.

As I have said, the cost of registration and inspection is enough to cause problems. If I want someone from the gas board to spend an hour in my house inspecting the cooker, I am charged £20; if my premises had to be inspected under these regulations, I would be charged £75. That is only the beginning, because it is almost inevitable that something will be found to be wrong with the average domestic premises used for such purposes.

The guidelines contain standards relating to the space allotted to each child. They also contain regulations concerning sanitary facilities, staff ratios and the fitness or otherwise of the women—they are mostly women—who run such schools. In charge of making the necessary judgments are social workers, many of whom have no relevant experience and, indeed, are not formally qualified themselves. That is wholly inappropriate.

There are howling discrepancies in the staffing ratios. If a school is described as a nursery, it must have a ratio of one member of staff to five children; if it is described as a nursery school, the prescribed ratio is one to 13. Schools given other descriptions are required to have different staff ratios. Yet all the children attending such institutions are in the same age group: they are between three and five years old. That is ridiculous.

Nearly all the women who run the schools are experienced parents. Almost all have no formal qualifications, but they are told that they must acquire such qualifications or pay a qualified person. Paying a qualified person will of course cost money, and the fees will therefore have to rise; hardship cases—parents who can barely afford to pay £5 a morning for their children to attend nursery school—will be worst hit. The schools are not backed by charitable institutions that will find the money for those hardship cases, and mothers who may have to pay for several small children are driven away.

If a woman is forced to take a training course, she may have to travel some distance from home one day a week. She may have children of her own whom she cannot leave; if she manages to attend such a course, she will be instructed by some young person who will give her a formal description of common-sense practices that are second nature to a mother who regularly deals with small children. Telling such women about toilet training and tying shoelaces is almost an insult. A wholly inappropriate set of qualifications are being applied where they are not needed—and gaining such qualifications costs money.

The number of staff can vary enormously; so can the sanitary facilities. Most of the schools are in private homes, which will have a normal-sized loo and washbasin and a towel on the wall. Many others are in church halls, which are designed largely for adult use: the same conditions will apply there. Then along comes an inspector from the social services department, demanding that mini-loos be installed. Mini-loos cost a fortune—about £150—while an ordinary toilet can be picked up for £25. Mini-loos must be specially plumbed; they must be accompanied by mini-handbasins, mini-clothes pegs and mini-hand dryers—the children are not allowed to share a hand towel. No such conditions apply when the children are in their own homes, and, indeed, it is surely sensible to train them to climb onto a box step to use the toilet. After all, that is what they do at home.

Those requirements are not obligatory. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will tell me that the authorities are being over-zealous, but the women who run the schools do not know that; they feel that such action is demanded of them, and it is often for that reason, if for no other, that they decide to stop running schools in the premises that they have been using.

Some schools are being told that their outside play areas are unsatisfactory. The regulations call for soft surfaces such as grass and for areas to be fenced and gated. It is absurd to say that all these measures must be enforced. Sometimes a village hall will be surrounded by tarmac, which is perfectly all right for childen to play on if they are supervised, but schools are being told that they must have a soft play area or the children cannot go outside. In the summer, they must remain indoors. Any sane and normal person would think that that is another ridiculous requirement.

Most of the schools are run by women who have plenty of common sense and will not subject the children to danger. Schools are often held in an old village hall and those who run them are being told to install double glazing with shatter-proof glass, extra double ceilings, special curtains and more exits. People say that these schools should be safe, but they have not been unsafe for 25 or 30 years and will not suddenly become unsafe overnight. There have been examples of the fire inspector declaring a hall to be perfectly adequate but the social services officer saying that it is not. The many regulations mean that little schools can no longer afford to charge a price that parents can afford.

I agree with the Minister that quality is important, but that does not necessarily mean qualifications. It might mean common sense, experience and tender loving care —those are the qualities necessary in education, particularly for small children. Someone who has diplomas and certificates can be a complete idiot. Ten qualified people looking after a dozen children can create more chaos than three or four experienced mothers who know how to handle children and have been doing so for a long time. I do not deny that we want quality, but it cannot necessarily be qualified formally.

I discussed the problem with the Child Care Association, a voluntary body to which many private sector schools belong. The southern counties directory of day nurseries runs to 500 pages, which shows the size of this voluntary industry: it is big business. The association's secretary, Susan Hays, has had meetings with Baroness Seear in the Lords, who takes an interest, and with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health who takes an interest and is a mother herself. The association wants to do all the right things. It is not asking to be let off the hook but to have the regulations withdrawn.

My complaint is about not the Children Act but about the additional regulations that are being handled so badly. Heather Armstrong has been running a school in Orsett in my constituency for about 20 years. It is held in a typical old church hall building about half the size of the Chamber. It has three exits and 25 children attend four mornings a week. Heather Armstrong has three helpers who have been there 12 years or more. Those four experienced women have no paper qualifications. Along comes the woman from social services, who tells them that all the door handles must be raised to a point where the children cannot possibly open the door and run out. She tells them to install minature loos for boys and girls, basins, hand driers and little pegs. The village hall will not put up the money, and if the school is to do so it will have to raise £3,000 or £4,000. It charges £5 a session and the women draw £10 a day. It is charged £9 a day for the use of the village hall. That is the financial level with which we are dealing. It allows people in the village who are not well off and who have many children to use those much-loved, much-respected and much-needed facilities.

Now, the school has been told that the village hall authorities cannot implement all the regulations—there are others involving heating, play facilities out of doors and so on—so it will have to leave. After 20 odd years of being there, the school is being thrown out. The only other village hall has windows that are floor to ceiling and if the school uses that hall, the windows will have to be replaced with "shatter-proof" glass or the children must be corralled inside a fence in the hall so that they are nowhere near the windows. The whole thing is absurd.

Here we have a village with a much-loved little school, supported by the local people, having to raise £30,000 or more to build a facility. That is nonsense. It is not good enough and I am sure that the Minister did not intend it, but those women are now being told that they are running the school illegally and are liable to prosecution. What kind of a country do we have when silly regulations turn decent people, doing a sensible and useful job, into criminals?

That is one example, but there are others. Another woman who runs a nice nursery school has been told that all her ceilings must be double plasterboarded. Again, the school is run in a little hall and she has been told that she must have new emergency lighting, which will require the rewiring of the whole building. She must have additional fire doors put in, although there are more than adequate exits already. She has to have more partitions put up between toilets and she has to put in extra toilets. All those requirements and more are being demanded before she can get her school approved under the new regulations and she says that she has had in the authorities, including the fire inspector, who says that the facilities are not required. In the end, she has put the matter in the hands of a solicitor.

A woman in Wallsend has applied for registration under the new regulations. She recently borrowed money from the bank to expand the facilities and to take in more children, but she now faces bankruptcy because she cannot do so. I could go on giving names and examples from all around the country of people being driven mad for trying to perform a useful service to our community.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has expressed his concern about regulations and his determination that unnecessary regulations should be done away with because of their effects. He says that he will not put up with it and I believe him. I understand that he is having a meeting at Chequers next weekend. He might like to invite me down there so that I can give him good examples of regulations going mad. That example will be top of my list. I know that I can rely on my hon. Friend the Minister to put the case for me, and to do something to rescue those admirable activities from the dead weight of the state. The effects will not stop unless he intervenes.

It is no good hoping that the councils will take a more lenient view—they will not. Give a bureaucrat a regulation and he will stick to it like a leech. He will keep applying that leech to that little body of people doing a useful job until it sucks them dry. I know that the Government want to expand such facilities, to get rid of unnecessary obstructions and to reduce the effect of regulations. Here is an excellent opportunity for them to make a start. By and large, the problem will be solved not by qualifications but by common sense. We must support those who are prepared to give their time to do a useful job and who should be supported all along the way.

2.53 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tim Yeo): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) on securing this debate on such an important subject in the very week the Department of Health published its further guidance on the Children Act 1989 and day care services. I greatly appreciate my hon. Friend's characteristically colourful approach to the subject and her descriptions of the problem. Although with perhaps just the occasional hint of over-statement, she made a very powerful case.

My hon. Friend's application for this Adjournment debate was made before we issued our circular, which includes many important messages including some relating directly to the concerns expressed so eloquently by my hon. Friend. Although the circular contains many important messages, I am not sure whether my hon. Friend has had a chance yet to read it from cover to cover. I can assure her that there are no references to such things as the need for soft furnishings or soft floor coverings in play areas. I am not sure where my hon. Friend obtained her information about that.

I am happy to follow up specific cases where it appears that local authorities have taken decisions that clearly contravene our guidance. Where schemes have been refused registration, I hope that they have exercised their opportunity under the legislation to appeal against the imposition of unreasonable requirements on registration.

It is true that we have become more concerned about the rigid and unhelpful way in which some local authorities have applied the Children Act 1989. As my hon. Friend has said, we are very proud of the enormous and vital contribution that the private and voluntary sectors make in providing child care. We are also very proud of the huge army of child minders. We want those services to flourish and grow. Everyone, including parents with working commitments, must see that they can take advantage of the growth in services.

We also want acceptable standards in the facilities, and that must involve some form of statutory regulation. However, as we have made clear, it must be regulation with a light touch. There must be a framework which encourages people to set up services. We are afraid that some local authorities are creating too many bureaucratic hurdles which hinder expansion and may even reduce provision. We certainly do not want that to happen.

The legislation provides a sound basis for regulating day care services and it is possible for them to flourish against that background. However, the law perhaps enables some local authorities to be over-rigid and unhelpful. Although we do not believe that the law itself is unhelpful, we have revised the guidance that we issued only a year after the Children Act came into force.

The law requires local authorities to decide whether someone applying for registration is fit to look after children aged under eight and that their premises and equipment are also fit. That concept demands a flexible approach. It most emphatically does not prescribe qualifications or conditions that an applicant must meet before being registered. The Act does not prescribe standards for particular services.

We recommend that the staff-child ratios which are often quoted in connection with representations on such matters are the same for nursery schools as for maintained schools and classes. As my hon. Friend said, they are lower than those for day care facilities. They allow larger groupings than those recommended for day care settings because the hours of operation are shorter in a school than in a nursery, which may operate from 8 am to 6 pm.

The problem is that some—though not all—local authorities have been applying the Department's guidance too rigidly. That is clear from my correspondence. I have met people who run playgroups and day nurseries. I have also met child minders, and I have received representations from parents concerned about the possibility that their children might not have a service to attend. Some providers and child minders are apparently being told that they must spend a lot of money on new furniture or equipment, which might put them out of business. In some cases, the registration officer has not appeared to give proper recognition to the skill and experience of the person who has, sometimes for many years, offered a good service to children and a service with which parents were wholly satisfied.

We did not believe that the situation could be left to settle on its own because there was a risk that some services would close altogether—it was not merely a case of the teething problems that one would expect with new legislation. That is why we issued the circular.

The circular has five main messages. First, the Government wish to encourage an expansion of day care services of an acceptable standard. Secondly, the wording of the legislation presupposes that applicants will be granted registration unless the local authority has one or more positive reasons for refusing it. Thirdly, our guidance does not prescribe legally required standards for registration. Fourthly, the guidance draws attention to factors that local authorities need to consider when deciding about registration. Fifthly, local authorities should use their own perception of local need in addition to our guidance when deciding whether to register a particular facility. Finally, the circular states that the guidance has been applied over-strictly by some authorities, which have insisted on even higher standards than those suggested but without any justification for such a demand.

The key message in the circular is that the particular standards recommended in the Children Act guidance are not prescriptive. They are common factors which we think are relevant to deciding that someone is fit to look after young children. They should be used as points of reference, but not applied rigidly. We have reminded local authorities that registration should not be refused merely because, for example, there are not enough lavatories or because the facility does not comply in every respect with recommended space standards. Facilities that fail to meet those two requirements may in other respects be perfectly capable of providing an acceptable quality of care. I cannot stress to my hon. Friend too strongly that all local authorities must examine each case separately on its merits and must base decisions on an overall assessment of each application for registration.

As for private nursery schools, we have just issued a circular that tells local authorities to adopt a lighter touch to registration generally. It is fair for us now to wait and see how it works in practice before we rush to make further judgments about what may be needed.

The current problems with the registration of day care services was not caused, therefore, by the Children Act itself. What was wrong—I think that my hon. Friend was making the same point—was the way some local authorities applied the legislation and the use that they made of the guidance issued jointly by the Departments of Health and Education. The standards recommended in that guidance seem to have been treated as having a prescriptive force and to have been applied sometimes in an unhelpfully rigid manner. That does not help the expansion of day care services, which is what we want to achieve—with the voluntary and private sectors in the vanguard of that process—and it is especially unhelpful to the private day care sector, which we expected to be leading the expansion process.

The circular that we published on Monday this week will remove many of the difficulties experienced by my hon. Friend and her constituents and by people elsewhere in the country. Nevertheless, I undertake to keep a close watch on the issue, and we shall not hesitate to take further action against local authorities that continue to work in a rigid and unhelpful way.

On the narrower subject of private nursery schools and the Children Act, I will ensure that the House is kept informed about the discussions that we are having with the Department for Education about any appropriate changes that may be needed to the regulation of such schools.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes past Three o'clock.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Services Ombudsman

Mr. French: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases have been dealt with by the legal services ombudsman.

Mr. John M. Taylor: A full investigation has been conducted and a report issued in 823 cases. Of these 766 related to complaints about solicitors, 53 to complaints about barristers and four to complaints about licensed conveyancers. The legal services ombudsman has received a further 883 complaints relating to solicitors, of which 559 failed to meet the criteria for investigation, and 324 are either awaiting or under investigation. He has also received a further 58 complaints relating to barristers, of which 42 failed to meet the criteria and 16 are either awaiting or under investigation. In addition, the legal services ombudsman has received a further four complaints relating to licensed conveyancers, none of which met the criteria.

The legal services ombudsman has also investigated and reported on 560 cases which had been referred to the lay observer prior to 31 December 1990, but which had not been dealt with by him before the legal services ombudsman replaced him on 1 January 1991.

Mr. French: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many solicitors have been ordered to pay compensation as a result of intervention by the legal services ombudsman.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Since 1 January 1991, the legal services ombudsman has recommended that 50 solicitors should pay compensation to complainants. In addition, he has recommended that the Solicitors Complaints Bureau should pay compensation in 10 cases.

Mr. French: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many people have made a complaint to the legal services ombudsman in relation to their dealings with the Solicitors' Complaints Bureau.

Mr. John Mr. Taylor: The legal services ombudsman has received 1,649 cases relating to the way in which the Solicitors Complaints Bureau has dealt with complaints about solicitors.

Mr. French: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to increase funding to the office of the legal services ombudsman.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The allocation to the ombudsman's office for 1993-94, excluding the accommodation charge, will be approximately £547,000. The allocation for 1992-93, on a comparable basis, was approximately £508,000.

Poll Tax

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will issue guidance to magistrates on the use of their powers to require means inquiries or to waive charges in cases of hardship in cases relating to non-payment of poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Where an application has been made to commit a community charge defaulter to prison, magistrates are required to hold an inquiry into the debtor's means, and have the power to remit amounts due where a committal warrant is neither made nor its issue postponed. Guidance on the operation of the community charge regulations was issued to magistrates courts by the Home Office in 1990. It would not be right for me to seek to interfere in the way in which magistrates exercise their discretion in individual cases.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sees and Titles

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects to conclude consultation with the Roman Catholic Church on the official recognition of territorial sees and titles;

(2) if he will give a summary of action taken on consultations following the Prime Minister's statement on 18 May, Official Report, columns 5-6, about the consideration of official recognition of territorial sees and titles of the Roman Catholic Church;

(3) if he will make a statement on progress towards official recognition of territorial sees and titles of the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply he was given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 10 December, at columns 753-54.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in opposition to official recognition of territorial sees and titles of the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This department has received two letters expressing concern about the possibility of greater recognition being afforded to Roman Catholic territorial sees and titles.

Catholic Bishops Conference

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he provided a substantive reply to the letters dated 16 July and 7 October from the Right Rev. Monsignor Philip Carroll, General Secretary of the Catholic Bishops Conference.

Mr. Charles Wardle: An interim reply was sent on 28 July. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to be in a position to respond to the substantive points raised in those letters very shortly.

Remand Contract Units

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what prisons other than Strangeways have been the subject of funding for the remand contract unit in his Department for market testing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None at present, but we have already announced that new prisons will be opened up to competitive tender and further plans are being considered.

Prisoners

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to reduce the number of people in prison.

Mr. Jack: It is for the court to decide, within the framework provided by Parliament, whether a custodial sentence is appropriate in any individual case.

A new sentencing framework was created by the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which came into force on 1 October 1992. It is based on the clear proposition that the sentence passed should match the seriousness of the offence committed. It provides, therefore, that the use of custodial sentences should be confined to offences whose seriousness is such that only a custodial sentence can be justified and as a consequence enhances the role of non-custodial sentences. Pre-sentence reports are now mandatory in an increased range of cases, to ensure that courts receive relevant advice on the suitability of possible community sentences.

The range of community sentences available to the courts is expanded and strengthened by the Act; a probation order becomes for the first time a sentence of the court and a court may now impose a combination order involving both probation and community service.

National standards have also been introduced from 1 October to strengthen the effectiveness and consistency of supervision in the community by probation and social services, and to assure courts and the public as to the quality of that work. Central Government funding for the probation service has increased by over 25 per cent since 1990-91.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sentenced offenders aged (a) under 21 years, (b) under 18 years and (c) under 17 years were held in prison service establishments at the end of September, October and November and on the most recent available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The latest readily available information is given in the table:

Population of sentenced young offenders in Prison Service establishments by age: August, September and October 1992

	Number of persons
	Aged under 17	Aged 17	Aged 18-20	[1]Aged 21	All young offenders

31 October[2]	—	—	—	—	5,113

[1] Prisoners aged 21 who have not been reclassified from young offenders to adults.
[2] An age breakdown is not yet available for these dates.

Immigration

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arriving persons at United Kingdom points of entry have been allowed to go to temporary addresses while their cases have been considered in each of the last five years and the current year to date; and in each year how many have absconded.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information available is given in the table.

Number of Passengers at United Kingdom ports of entry

	Passengers granted temporary admission	Passengers who absconded[1]
1988	8,692	401
1989	13,744	475
1990	15,357	561
1991	13,220	601
[2]1992	13,786	445

[1] These figures include passengers who abscond from the control area or from detention as well as those who abscond from temporary admission. Data on the latter are not separately available.
[2] January to October.

Mr. Peter Shore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of (a) immigrants and (b) refugees that have entered the United Kingdom and other EC member states in each year since 1979.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information on persons accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom in the years 1979-91 is given in tables 18 and 9 respectively of the 1987 and 1991 volumes of the annual Home Office Command Paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics United Kingdom"—Cm 415 and Cm 2063. These figures are of persons subject to immigration control who are granted indefinite leave to remain here. Comparable information for other EC countries is not available.

Information on the number of applications received for asylum in the United Kingdom in the years 1979-91 is given in tables 1 and 1.2 respectively of Home Office Statistical Bulletins "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom 1989" and "Asylum Statistics, United Kingdom 1990-91"—issues 22/90 and 12/92. Available information on asylum applications to other EC member states is given in the table.

Copies of these publications are in the Library.

Juvenile Remand Prisoners

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many juveniles were held on remand in prisons and remand centres at the end of September, October and November and on the most recent available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The latest readily available information is given in the table.

Population of unsentenced juveniles[1] in prison and remand centres June, July and August 1992

30 June	54	19	73
31 July	44	22	66
31 August	51	22	73

[1] Persons aged under 17.

Wolds Prison

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken at the Wolds remand prison to establish a bail information scheme on the lines laid down in the operating contract.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The post of bail information officer is expected to be filled early in 1993, and the scheme will be operational shortly afterwards.

Police Supernumerary Posts

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of the supernumerary posts approved for the Thames Valley police for 1993-94; and how this cost will be met.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The cost of supernumerary police posts in the Thames Valley police is estimated by the force at £1·7 million for 1993-94. These posts will be funded in the usual way from specific grant paid by the Home Office and through the local authority funding mechanism.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the number of supernumerary posts allocated to each police force in England and Wales in each of the last five years, for the current year and for 1993-94 and the period for which they were allocated in each case;

(2) if he will list (a) the established number of posts of police officers and (b) the supernumerary posts he intends to permit in respect of each police force in England and Wales for (i) 1992 and (ii) 1993.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I shall arrange for a written reply to be sent to the hon. Member.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the criteria on which he bases his judgment as to whether any police force should be allowed to carry any supernumerary posts.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Applications for sumpernumerary police posts are considered, with the advice of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, against the following criteria:—

(i) whether the posts are affordable within the Department's provision for Police Grant for the financial year in question;
(ii) whether they reflect Home Office policy objectives and initiatives:
(iii) whether they meet a temporary need.

All such posts are subject to review at regular intervals.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what costs will be met directly by his Department in respect of supernumerary posts for each police authority in England and Wales for 1993-94; and what percentage of the total costs this represents.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Specific grant at the usual rate of 51 per cent. is payable on these posts.

Police Numbers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the names of all the police forces which have had an increase in police numbers for the coming year, giving the reasons in each case.

Mr. Charles Wardle: In light of the need to impose constraints on public expenditure, my right hon. and learned Friend has concluded that the costs of further increases in police numbers cannot be justified. He has therefore not approved an increase in establishment for any provincial force in 1993-94.

The establishment of the Metropolitan police will increase by 50 officers with effect from 1 April 1993. This increase was agreed to as part of the 1991 public expenditure settlement.

Rave Parties

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure the full recovery of policing costs for rave parties.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 11 December 1992]: I will write to the hon. Member.

Vehicle-related Projects

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 24 November, Official Report, column 548, what was the total cost of each of the vehicle-related projects in each of the last five years and estimated for next year, and the percentage paid, or budgeted by the Home Office in each year and in each case.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 30 November 1992]: As indicated in my reply to the hon. Member on 26 October, at column 457, the main programme of funding for motor projects began in 1989-90. The projects currently being funded were listed in my reply on 24 November, at columns 547-48. The information requested in relation to motor projects in 1991-92 and 1992-93 is as follows:

[2] Bradford Motor Education Project has two distinct elements; Probation Supervision element for which Home Office meets 100 per cent. of the cost; Crime Prevention element for which Home Office meets 50 per cent. of the cost. Each element is funded through different grant schemes.

Information on more general "vehicle-related" projects, or for previous years, could not be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Immigration (Local Government Grants)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reconsider his intention to reduce his contribution to the existing commitments under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 and to invite no new bids for 1993-94 and 1994-95; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 11 December 1992]: The Government remain firmly committed to the reduction of racial disadvantage, and the section 11 grant continues to play a central role in our programme. But we regret that in the present difficult economic circumstances it is not possible to maintain the planned levels of section 11 grant or to consider bids for new projects in 1993-94 or 1994-95.

EDUCATION

Drugs Prevention Week

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what sums were expended by his Department in respect of European Drugs Prevention Week; and for what specific purposes.

Mr. Forth: The information is as follows:

	£000s
i. Printing and publication of revised and updated version of the booklet "Drug Misuse and the Young"	[1]17·1
ii. Regional conferences for 14 to 19 year olds on drug misuse	[1]33·0
iii. Contribution to cost of TACADE/Local Government Drugs Forum National Conference on "Drugs Prevention: The Contribution of Local Government"	0·8
Total	50·9

[1] Estimates.

Grants (Diploma Courses)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether his Department will provide mandatory grants to assist students in Wales who have been accepted to study for diplomas in mechanical and electrical engineering, such as the higher national diploma.

Mr. Boswell: Under the Education Act 1962, mandatory awards are already available to eligible students on designated full-time or sandwich courses for the HND or DipHE at publicly-funded insitutions. Other full-time or sandwich diploma courses may be designated for mandatory awards if they are comparable to first degree courses. For diploma courses which are not designated, local education authorities have power to make discretionary awards.

Apostrophe (Correct Use)

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education at what age according to the provisions of the national curriculum children are expected to have attained the skill of the correct use of the apostrophe.

Mr. Forth: The curriculum order for English requires that pupils should learn about the use of the apostrophe between the ages of seven and 11. The order is currently under review, and one of the issues being addressed is how to define more clearly the grammatical knowledge which pupils must demonstrate in order to meet different levels of attainment.

Technology Schools Initiative

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he will announce the results of the technology schools initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: We aim to announce the allocations to be made under the technology schools initiative very shortly, and will place this information in the Library. This initiative has attracted great interest from schools and local authorities, and we have received many bids of high quality.

School Records

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about the requirement arising from the Data Protection Act 1984 on the headteacher and governing body of a school to be separately registered with regard to the holding of personal information on computer records when only one registration was previously required for the county as a whole on behalf of all maintained schools; and what proposals he has to lessen the consequent expense.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 11 December 1992]: Data users for the purposes of the Data Protection Act are individuals or groups of people who control the contents and use of a set of personal data. Any such data controlled by school governing bodies and headteachers for the purposes of their respective statutory responsibilities, should be registered accordingly with the Data Protection Registrar. The cost of registration was one of a broad range of pressures on local education authorities that the Government took into account in fixing education standard spending for 1992-93.

PRIME MINISTER

Green Issues

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Prime Minister who in his Office has been appointed to oversee and develop green issues; how many civil servants have been allocated new or additional responsibilities to deal with the management and development of green issues; and what additional allocation of resources has been made to support programmes related to green issues in his Office.

The Prime Minister: Responsibility for overseeing and developing green issues in 10 Downing street rests with the Cabinet Office. The Green Minister for the Cabinet Office is the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science. Within the Cabinet Office three civil servants are currently involved with the management and development of green issues. Various officials in 10 Downing street also deal with green issues among others. Any expenditure is likely to be met from existing funding.

Ministers (Legal Costs)

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what guidance he will now give to all Ministers of the Crown as to how bills will be met on their behalf for legal services to forestall or correct misleading and inaccurate press stories which might do damage to a Minister's reputation and would therefore have a bearing on the performance of his public duties.

The Prime Minister: Guidance for Ministers already exists in relation to libel proceedings and I have no plans to issue further guidance at present.

Antarctica (Whale Sanctuary)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with his European Community partners about the establishment of a sanctuary for whales in the Antarctic; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The forum for discussion on this matter is the International Whaling Commission—IWC—of which the United Kingdom and six other Community countries—Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, the Netherlands and Spain—are members.

The French proposal for a whale sanctuary in the Antarctic, put to the IWC at its 44th meeting in Glasgow last June, is due for detailed consideration when the Commission next meets in Kyoto in May 1993. The United Kingdom was one of those countries which encouraged the IWC to undertake further work on this idea. We shall play a full part in its further consideration in liaison with those of our Community partners which are party to the IWC.

Gifts to Ministers

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister what is the current financial limit for gifts to Ministers.

The Prime Minister: The guidance covering gifts to Ministers is set out in "Questions of Procedure for Ministers", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Somalia

Mr. Michael: To ask the Prime Minister what steps he has taken to ensure that northern Somalia, Republic of Somaliland, is given help appropriate to its current situation in the light of the United Nations decision to support military intervention in Somalia.

The Prime Minister: We have stressed the need to take appropriate account of the north in discussions in the United Nations Security Council; in meetings with the United Nations Secretary General and the under-secretary general for humanitarian affairs; in discussions at the United Nations donors conference which took place last week in Addis Ababa; and in recent meetings my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Chalker, the Minister for Overseas Development, has had with British non-governmental organisations working in Somalia.

Scott Inquiry

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Prime Minister which Government Department will publish the Scott inquiry report; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As I explained on 16 November at columns 74-75, Lord Justice Scott will be entirely free to decide on the publication of his report and of the evidence he takes. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will be responsible for arranging publication of the report.

Civil List

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 7 December, Official Report, columns 469-70, on the civil list, whether the charges to the Government Departments cover accommodation and support for security personnel; and how much is paid to the household's royal collection department and in respect of which building.

The Prime Minister: No charges are made to Government Departments in respect of accommodation and support for security personnel. The royal collection department pays charges for administration services but not for accommodation.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 7 December, Official Report, columns 469-70, on the civil list, what was the increase in charges paid by the Government in real terms in the period 1987-90; which Departments make the payments; and how much each pays.

The Prime Minister: There was no real-terms increase between 1988—first full year—and 1990 in charges to the Ministry of Defence, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport, the Scottish Office and the Treasury. As was implied in my answer of 7 December, the proportion of the royal household's expenditure so recovered is marginal—about 3 per cent. Detailed numbers could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Disabled Employees

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many (a) physically disabled and (b) sensorily disabled people are employed in his Department; and what percentage they are of the total work-force.

Mr. Key: The Department of National Heritage is still in the process of setting-up its personnel and other central management information systems and the information to answer this question is not yet centrally available.

Green Issues

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage who in his Department has been appointed to oversee and develop green issues; how many civil servants have been allocated new or additional responsibilities to deal with the management and development of green issues; and what additional allocation of resources has been made to support programmes related to green issues in his Department.

Mr. Key: I am the Minister responsible for overseeing and developing green issues in the Department of National Heritage. The management and development of green issues is undertaken by the implementation and review division of the Department. A departmental energy efficiency officer and a departmental green contact have been appointed in this division. Although the Department has not specifically allocated additional resources to support programmes related to green issues, these officers will ensure that proper consideration is given to environmental and green issues in all aspects of the Department's policies.

National Lottery

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what estimate he has made of the effect of the receipt by charities of proceeds from the national lottery on the level of receipts by charities from other sources.

Mr. Brooke: The Government intend that proceeds from the national lottery should represent an additional source of money for charities and other beneficiaries: receipt of lottery moneys will not preclude charities from applying to other sources for funding. Indeed, it would be desirable for charities receiving money from the lottery to have a broad funding base.

Indian Subcontinent

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many people have (a) arrived in the United Kingdom on flights originating in the Indian subcontinent and (b) departed from the United Kingdom on flights whose terminal destination is the Indian subcontinent in each of the last 10 years and for each month of this year to date.

Mr. Key: I am informed by the Civil Aviation Authority that the latest available information is as shown in the table. Figures for the years before 1986 are not readily available.

Terminal passengers[1] on flights with origin or destination to and from the Indian sub-continent[2]

Year	Arrivals	Departures
1986	357,587	342,146
1987	379,946	373,690
1988	408,452	382,935
1989	432,313	431,286
1990	476,700	449,993
1991	386,083	353,119
1992:
January	38,315	33,723
February	31,581	29,446
March	35,253	25,544

BBC Licence Fee

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what account he is taking in his consideration of the future of the BBC and the licence fee, of the position of pensioners in and out of sheltered accommodation with shared facilities and common boundaries paying for television licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: As I indicated in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) on 9 December, Official Report, column 683, the Government have repeatedly made it clear that they have no plans to amend or extend the regulations governing the concessionary TV licence scheme, which were thoroughly overhauled in 1988 after long and careful consideration. The long-term future of the licence fee and the arrangements for paying it are issues to be considered in the debate about the renewal of the BBC's charter.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Disabled Employees

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) physically disabled and (b) sensorily disabled people are employed in his Department; and what percentage they are of the total work force.

Mr. Mates: As at 1 January 1992 there were 1,262 staff in the Northern Ireland civil service—4·3 per cent. of the service—who were registered or who self-reported a disability. A total of 1,232—4·2 per cent. of the service—were physically disabled and 290—0·1 per cent. of the service—were sensorily disabled. Each of these figures includes those who are both physically and sensorily disabled.

A survey carried out in 1990 showed that, in the small home civil service group in the Northern Ireland Office, nine staff—4·3 per cent. of the group—considered that they had a disability, all of whom were physically disabled.

Potatoes

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about the present state of the ware and seed potato industry; what is the present state of the potato industry; how exceptional relevant weather conditions have been during the year; and if he will make a statement about proposals to support the potato industry in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: Representations have been received from two public representatives. Potato prices in Northern Ireland and throughout the European Community have been depressed as a result of increases in the area planted and yield of potatoes. While rainfall in the three months September to November has been below average there were no sustained dry spells. This resulted in difficult harvesting conditions. There are no plans to provide financial support for the potato industry in Northern Ireland.

NHS Surplus Properties

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what surplus properties were disposed of within the past 12 months by the Southern health and social services board; how much money was realised by the sales of these properties; and how much of this money was retained by the Department of Health and Social Services management executive.

Mr. Hanley: The following surplus properties in the Southern health and social services board have been disposed of during the current financial year:

Ballyards Castle Hospital, Armagh
Site at John Street, Rathfriland (3·75 acres)
Site at Armagh Road, Newry (2 acres)
40 Thornleigh, Shankill, Lurgan
Tandragee Health Clinic

The total realised is £343,112. This amount has been reallocated by the management executive to meet a number of high-priority pressures within the health and personal social services.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who have been empowered to issue public interest immunity certificates in Northern Ireland in relation to Court cases and coroners' inquests in each year since 1972.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Where public interest immunity has been claimed by the Crown in legal proceedings in Northern Ireland by way of a certificate, the certificate has been signed by a Minister in a position to assess the public interest asserted.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Citizens Charter

29. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make it his policy to introduce an independent audit of the Government's citizens charter promises and of its performance against the targets set.

Mr. Waldegrave: The citizens charter calls for all public services to publish targets and performance against them. Overall progress is monitored by the Prime Minister at regular seminars, and published in reports such as the recent White Paper.

35. Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received following the publication of the first annual report on the citizens charter.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have had a very encouraging response to the citizens charter report.

Market Testing

34. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the impact of recent European Court decisions on the future of market testing and compulsory competitive tendering, within the civil service.

Mr. Robert Jackson: There is nothing new in this. The fact is that both the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, and the Acquired Rights Directive which they implement in United Kingdom law, can already apply to transfers from the public to the private sector; and this has always been the case.

We are continuing with our programme to open services to competition across the public sector and advice will be taken on individual cases as necessary.

Charters (Sanctions)

36. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what general sanctions will apply when charters are broken; if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robert Jackson: All charters include information about what to do if things go wrong. Compensation may be payable in some cases, but in others alternative forms of redress may be more appropriate.

EC Officials

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer of 13 November, Official Report, column 1012, how many officials are employed by the European Commission; and how many and what percentage in each grade are nationals of each EC member state.

Mr. Robert Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 1 December, at column 316. The provision of detailed breakdowns of staffing figures is a matter for the European Community institutions.

Research

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what major international collaborative science programmes the United Kingdom research councils participate in.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom research councils participate in a wide range of internationally collaborative research, including laboratory twinnings, access to overseas facilities, and formal collaborative partnerships. The following list identifies internationally collaborative programmes or facilities with an annual subscription or other cost to councils of over £0·1 million.

Medical Research Council
European Molecular Biology Laboratory.
European Molecular Biology Conference.
International Agency for Research on Cancer.
Human Frontier Science Programme.

Natural Environment Research Council
World Ocean Circulation Experiment.
Earth Observation Satellite Programmes.
Ocean Drilling Program.

Science and Engineering Research Council
European Organisation for Nuclear Research (CERN).
Institut Laue-Langevin.
European Synchrotron Radiation Facility.
European Incoherent Scatter Facility.
European Space Agency (Space Science Programme).
Individual space projects eg Roentgen Satellite (ROSAT) Along Track Scanning Radiometer Infra-red Space Observatory.
Anglo-Australian Telescope.
Isaac Newton Group of Telescopes (La Palma).
James Clark Maxwell Telescope (Hawaii). EUROGAM (detector for nuclear physics experiments).
Hadron Electron Ring Accelerator (HERA).

All Research Councils
EC Framework Programmes.
European Science Foundation.
European Co-operation in Scientific and Technical Research Programme (COST).
NATO Science Programme (subscription paid by FCO).

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made on the fourth framework research and development programme.

Mr. Robert Jackson: The Commission submitted its working paper on the EC fourth research and development framework programme—FP4—to the Council of Ministers on 9 October, and Vice-President Pandolfi presented his ideas at the meeting of the Research Council on 12 October. EC Research Ministers had a wide ranging discussion on the subject at the meeting of the Research Council on 9 December. I expect the EC to make good progress on FP4 during 1993 as a result of these exchanges. A copy of the United Kingdom Government policy document setting out our views on the shape and content of FP4 has been placed in the Library.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Sarajevo

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on what action he is recommending be taken to assist non-governmental organisations to disburse to the citizens of Sarajevo medical and other humanitarian assistance.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Responsibility for co-ordinating the international community's response to the humanitarian crisis in Sarajevo and elsewhere in the former Yugoslavia rests with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Non-governmental organisations—NGOs—both international and indigenous, play an important part in that co-ordinated relief effort. We have provided significant resources to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees both directly, and via the European Community, in the form of cash, medical supplies, equipment and personnel, as well as providing grants to NGOs.

Bosnia

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will now assign an aircraft for aid flights to Bosnia.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The RAF has been flying into Bosnia since 3 July. When hostilities permit two or three sorties a day are flown to Sarajevo by RAF Hercules. A total of 3,400 tonnes have been delivered in this way by the United Kingdom so far.

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when it is planned that the next UN aid convoy will reach the besieged enclave of Srebenica; and if it will be carrying medicines.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Decisions on where and when to operate UN aid convoys in Bosnia are taken in the field by the staff of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the UN protection force. In doing so, they have to take into account the local needs, security situation, weather conditions and the availability of suitable vehicles. Now that the UNHCR staff have gained access to Srebenica they are better able to take account of local needs, including medical supplies, in planning future convoys.

Somalia

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he has made since September in providing a telephone link and other communications facilities in Hargeisa, Berbera and the north of Somalia generally, Republic of Somaliland.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Earlier this year the BBC world service in Somalia increased its output to broadcast missing persons letters for an hour over each week to the whole of Somalia including the north. On 12 December in recognition of the crisis in Somalia it began a new dawn service bringing local and international news including news of Somali matters at the UN to the whole country.
